INDEX TO VOLUME XI....NEW SERIES.

- DIRECTIONS.—Seek the title, first under a, an, or the; if not found there, refer to the subject, by some prominent word in the title. When a page has been misprinted in the volume it is enclosed in [ ] brackets, the true page following it. For articles in letter form, see letters. The * star preceding any given page, indicates that it refers to the subject under the News Department, or to some article with a different title from that given in the index—in some cases without a title. ## THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

INTRODUCTION.

The above title expresses the design of the following articles. It is to point out the harmony that exists between the four Evangelists, both as to the order of time in which the events occurred, that they record; and as to the language which they respectively use to express the same facts—and also to explain their language as to its peculiar idiom and phraseology, its precepts and doctrines. This will be done in the exercise of the best abilities of the writer, without claiming the credit of superior erudition, either literary or theological. And while it is not expected that the author's efforts will exhaust the sources of biblical criticism, or preclude the necessity of further investigation; yet it is expected, that, while his best endeavors shall be applied to the work before him, those endeavors will not have been applied in vain.

The reason for presenting a series of articles of this character, is, the absence of every thing of the kind among the believers in our faith, and the obvious utility of the information that, it is expected, will be conveyed.

As to explaining the Gospels, according to the order of time in which the events recorded occurred, as far as that order can be ascertained; so that the actions of our Saviour's life may be seen as they respectively occurred, there can, I think be no hesitation in saying, that it is decidedly the best method that can be adopted. It gives the clearest and most impressive view of the Saviour's history and character; one that will be retained, the longest in the mind, and excite the greatest respect and reverence for that Divine personage.

To accomplish this object, the respective statements of the Evangelists, of any particular event, and of all the events which any two of them have recorded, should be put down and explained together—the different terms which they severally use should be shown to convey essentially the same ideas, and to refer to the same time and event.

And when this is done, the sentiments which they express, or which they ascribe to the Saviour, should be pointed out and illustrated.—This is what is attempted in the following articles, and how well the writer will succeed must be determined by the result of his labors. Should any indications of a want of satisfaction on the part of the public generally, be given, the articles will be immediately discontinued. But should they appear to be generally acceptable, they will be continued, till the whole of the four Evangelists shall have been harmonized and explained.

Whatever errors may be detected in the criticisms and explanations that shall be presented, will be corrected, it is hoped, by those more thoroughly imbued with biblical knowledge, than the writer claims to be. And while such assistance is earnestly solicited, it is also confidently anticipated.

THE OBJECT OF INQUIRY.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

We are all of us inquirers, or ought to be.—We are not so anxious to find what is called truth, as to find what is truth. The name of a religious denomination ought not to close our ears, and to withhold the common civilities of life—nothing should cause us to do the latter, and nothing but a conviction, founded on something else than prejudice, the former. Johnson says, "Truth has no gradations; nothing which admits of increase can be so much what it is, as truth is truth.—There may be a strange thing, and a thing more strange. But if a proposition be true, there can be none more true." When we hear a speaker, then, we are not to ask, What order does he belong to? for let truth come from what source it may, it is truth, and truth is immortal without the aid of a party name.

I know I am called a Universalist, but if I show you what is noted in the Scriptures of truth, is it not as good as though it came from a Congregationalist, or Methodist, or Unitarian? What has a name to do with the communication of truth? And yet I am fearful that the cases are not few in which it has had a great deal to do. Eyes have been shut to the perusal of a book or paper, because they happened to discover the name of a Universalist! People have refused to hear a man, because the sound has gone out into the world that he was a Universalist! When the young have wished to go to our meetings, they have been forbidden, and when they have asked the reason, they have been told that it is wicked to hear a Universalist! How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? When will men "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good?" O, for a wide spread charity, for a deep felt piety, for a holy zeal in the cause of almighty God! For the days when the "wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fating together; and a little child shall lead them"—for the time when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. I.

INTRODUCTORY.

"Questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean."—MARK ix: 10.

A call having been made in this paper for articles upon the doctrine of the resurrection, I take the liberty of presenting my mite. My plan is, to write a series of numbers, mostly of moderate length, in which, commencing with my next, I design to glance at the opinions of the Jews, especially the Pharisees, respecting the resurrection in the days of Christ; 2. To revert to certain opinions now received among Christians, from which opinions I am compelled to dissent, giving a few brief reasons; 3. To present my own views, adduce the principal evidence by which I deem them sustained, comment briefly upon the principal passages of Scripture which have reference to the subject, answer objections, etc.

In descending upon opinions which I deem erroneous, it is my wish and design to pay all proper deference to the learning, talent, or piety, of those by whom such opinions are entertained and defended. In presenting and advocating my own views, I shall lay no claim to infallibility. In all, I hope to be governed by Christian charity.—Should my views be controverted in this paper, I will endeavor to defend them, unless I become convinced that they are erroneous; in which case I promise to publish a proper acknowledgment.

From an examination of the Scriptures with reference to the subject in hand, I am convinced that what is meant therein by the resurrection from the dead, is to be determined not so much by the literal meaning of the words and phrases employed in teaching the doctrine, as by certain circumstances accompanying such teachings, aided by certain considerations which naturally attach themselves to the subject. I shall, therefore, for the most part, forbear troubling the reader with verbal criticisms, especially upon Greek words, as I conceive that it is the usage of a word, and not its etymology, that determines its meaning; and that this usage may be learned from a translation nearly as well as from the original.

The reader of the following numbers will also do me an especial favor, and probably himself no injury, by observing and remembering the following statements, which I wish to introduce here in due form, once for all:

1. When I speak of the resurrection of the dead, I do not in that expression, unless otherwise stated, include the resurrection of Jesus Christ to immortal life, or the miraculous raising of other persons (as Lazarus, for example) to mortal life.

2. When I speak of the soul or the spirit of a man, and do not define the term, I mean the same as the mind, or that which possesses and exercises the faculty of thinking, whose organ the body is. I am aware that in the Scriptures, the word soul has often, and perhaps generally, some other meaning; and that this is sometimes the case with the word spirit, yet I use these words in the sense above mentioned, and synonymously, except when I state otherwise.

3. I claim to be, under God, the lawful proprietor of my own ideas and opinions, having, in the course of His providence, come into the possession of them, either by my own industry, by paying the market price for them, or else by the generosity of my friends. I am not conscious of having stolen an idea in my life—and if I have ever borrowed, without paying, I hope yet to make payment, if not to the lender, at least to the lawful heirs of his mental inheritance. This by way of forestalling the charge of plagiarism.

The resurrection of mankind from the dead, has ever, among Christians, been considered as a cardinal truth. Yet it is a humiliating fact, that except in the earliest age of Christianity, the Christian church, so called, have never been entirely agreed upon even the first point in the doctrine of the resurrection, namely, what the resurrection is. This being the case, it is scarcely a matter of wonder, that they should have believed differently respecting the time of the resurrection, the condition of mankind after it, etc. And perhaps there are as many different opinions upon the subject now, as at any former period.

In our own denomination, I apprehend that a greater diversity of belief obtains respecting those points which are embraced in, or are intimately connected with, the doctrine of the resurrection, than upon all other points in theology. And each particular shade of belief is advocated by men of talent and influence. For these reasons I think it more than probable, that among our brethren, the laity especially, there are very many whose opinions respecting those disputed points are quite unsettled. I know some that are persons of intelligence, whose minds, from the causes above mentioned, may, as respects stability of faith, be said to waver like a balance in equilibrio, agitated by the wind. It is principally on this account that I am induced to write. I can sympathise with such persons. My opinions respecting the resurrection were in an unsettled state for a number of years. But new light, as I deem, has broken in upon my mind; and I feel desirous to do, what by Divine assistance I hope to be able to do—throw out some hints which may prove useful as a means of enlightening the minds of others. At all events, of one thing I am tolerably certain: the readers of this paper will have the subject laid before them, and thoroughly investigated. For should my humble attempt turn out a failure, the publication of it will in all probability elicit from some abler pen, a more thorough and more ample exposition of the subject, than I have either time, opportunity, or talent to give it.

PERFECTIONISTS.

BY REV. WM. ANDREWS.

Among the numerous sects and multiplicity of opinions now existing and prevailing in our land, it is doubtless well known that there is a class of religionists distinguished by the title or name of Perfectionists.

Of all the distinguishing features of their system, I am not qualified to speak. I believe, however, that they hold, in common with many others, that natural death is a penalty attached to God's moral law, which penalty is incurred by transgression. They contend that dissolution is not the natural result of our physical organization or constitution, but rather a punishment inflicted in consequence of a neglect or violation of duty; that mankind may live entirely free from all moral impurity and imperfection, in a state of complete holiness and redemption from all the contaminating influences of sin and mortality, and thus escape all the painful effects of disease, and all those physical sufferings connected with the closing period of our earthly existence. All these qualifications, forming that pretended safeguard against the arrows of the "king of terrors," they claim to possess; and hence the distinguishing name or title which they bear. The natural influence of such views may be learned from the effects which they have had upon the minds of those who have embraced them; and that they have a direct tendency to charge their possessors with the most blind fanaticism and unreasonable presumption, will not be questioned, I think, after reading a statement of the following facts, the truth of which may be relied upon.

In the town of Hannibal, Oswego county, there has been a small society of Perfectionists, headed by a leader by the name of ——. In September last, a child about fifteen months old, belonging to their leader and teacher, was taken sick, remained in a low state for some time, and then died. During its sickness, the parents manifested not the least uneasiness, having apparently the most implicit confidence in its restoration. The father repeatedly asserted that the child would not die—declared that his assurance was based upon a direct revelation from the Almighty, and that he would stake his reputation as a teacher of truth, upon the fulfilment of his prediction.

But all their prayers and professed freedom from the seeds of dissolution, did not retain the spirit of the little sufferer within its earthly tabernacle, when the time arrived for it to depart to its Father and its home. It died. But strange as it may appear, none of those painful sensations usual in seasons of bereavement, were manifested by the deluded parents. Although they had the most positive proof before them, that their predictions had failed, and that their pretended revelation was no more than the production of a disordered and inflamed imagination, yet they were not unloosed from the strong chords of delusion, which had been thrown around them by the pallying hand of error and fanaticism. Notwithstanding their acknowledged disappointment, they now affirmed that they had had a special communication from God, in which they had been assured, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the sleeping tenement should be reanimated. The child was therefore, by their directions, left to remain on the couch where it expired, with eyes unclosed, without any change of clothing or covering from that usually worn, being fed occasionally with sweet cream, and no preparation made for its burial. The father and his deluded subjects exhorted the public to wait for the manifestation of the power of God, assuring them that that power would surely be exhibited. And even children who called in to see the corpse, were told that the child was not dead—that its spirit had only left the body for a short time—that it had gone on a journey to see its grandmother, and that it would return—and that in a few days it would be restored to health and activity, and ever remain in a state of perfection. In opposition to all the wholesome rules of civilized life, and contrary to all the entreaties of neighbors, it was kept in this situation from Tuesday until the Monday following. During all this time, and especially nights, the scenes enacted were allied to the ravings of a maniac. The most unreasonable and revolting exclamations and invocations were breathed forth by the family and those of kindred faith; the Almighty was called upon to vindicate his character and cause by the fulfilment of his promise, being told repeatedly, that if he did not raise the child, they would have no more confidence in him, but would burn up their Bibles, etc.—thus attracting the attention and exciting the curiosity of the surrounding inhabitants, who flocked around the scene of action, to listen to their wild ravings and disconnected, unintelligible jargon.

After a week thus spent, unsuccessfully, to the great annoyance of the public, preparations were made for the child's interment, and the neighbors assembled for the purpose of aiding in the performance of its funeral obsequies; but even at that late hour they were not allowed to discharge the last duty which we owe to one of our kindred race, without being forced to witness a repetition of the same disgusting folly which had for days shocked the finest sensibilities of their natures.—A certain young lady, belonging to the society, knelt down by the coffin, in presence of the company assembled, and after striking upon the lid several times with her hand, audibly exclaimed—"Maria, [the name of the child.] in the name of Jesus Christ, I command thee to arise! arise!!—I say unto thee, arise!!!" This last attempt, like all the rest, proved fruitless and unsuccessful; and the mortification experienced in consequence of disappointment, induced Mary Ann to exclaim, "Can it be possible that all this is delusion?"

Thus closed this scene of almost unparalleled fanaticism and folly; and the company assembled at the house proceeded to the church, where an address was delivered by the father of the deceased, the leader in what we have attempted to describe. He there manifested some of those painful sensations growing out of disappointed hopes and blasted expectations, and even expressed doubts of the existence of an overruling Intelligence, by prefacing his remarks throughout his discourse, by the following sentence—"If there is a God."

In closing my remarks upon a subject so painful to all the nobler feelings of the enlightened, understanding Christian, I would observe, that the result of such conduct has been just what we might reasonably expect—their entire downfall. They no longer exist as a society professing Christianity, their shepherd and pastor having left the place, to avoid that merited derision and contempt, which would have been heaped upon him by an enlightened public. A narration of the above facts may strike the mind of the reader living in the nineteenth century, with astonishment; but allow me to say, that they are nothing more than might reasonably be expected, where those faculties which give rise to our religious feelings and emotions, are left to act unaided by the light of intelligence. Our moral powers simply lead us to seek some object for their religious exercise, without any regard whatever to the nature or character of that object. They are wholly dependent upon the intellect for that wisdom and knowledge so necessary to guide them in the selection of an object, justly claiming the exercise of their devotional feelings. The intellect is to our religious faculties, what the light of the sun is to the natural vision. A man may be in possession of a good pair of eyes, but his eyes possess no power of imparting rays—they are wholly dependent upon a source which they do not in themselves possess; and unless they receive aid and assistance from some luminous body, they are useless, and he is left to grope his way in darkness, gloom and despondency. It is just so with the religious faculties of a person.—They are blind and can not see—they possess in themselves not the least intelligence—they derive all their light and information from the intellectual organs; and if this source is cut off by habit, education or practice, he is just as likely to bow down before some dumb idol or poisonous reptile, as before the God of the universe.

The above remarks, if founded in truth, will enable us to account philosophically for the numerous systems of idolatry and error which have been instituted and tolerated in different ages of the world, and which have effectually eclipsed the light of reason; thrown around the moral horizon of the minds of thousands dense clouds of impenetrable darkness, leaving them a prey to the devouring elements of blind fanaticism, and overheated enthusiasm, with no beacon light of truth to direct them to the fair haven of unperverted, uncorrupted Christianity. The most valuable gift ever bestowed upon beings of mortality, may, by its perversion and abuse become a source of human degradation and misery. And, perhaps, in the numerous exhibitions of the wisdom, power and goodness of our heavenly Father, no favor can be named which has suffered greater abuse than that part of our nature which gives rise to our religious feelings and emotions. And it will continue to be thus perverted, until a world shall be favored with a natural, reasonable, and scientific religion; until the teachers in Israel, shall by their well-directed, united exertions restore to a perfect equilibrium, all the faculties and propensities possessed by man. O, that the professed Christian world, might be induced to avail themselves of the means of information within their reach, and thereby become acquainted with the character and attributes of "the one only living and true God," the principles of his moral government, and with themselves, and those immutable, unyielding laws by which they are and ever must be governed! Then, and not till then, will they rise in the scale of divine knowledge, moral virtue and Christian perfection, above the clouds of superstition, ignorance and fanaticism, where they will be permitted to reap the fruits of "pure and undefiled religion," and to participate in all those desirable blessings which beings of the higher order, are capacitated to enjoy. May Heaven grant to stimulate us in our exertions, and to direct us in our efforts, to promote this needed and much desired elevation and reformation!

ESSAYS ON WAR..... NO. VII.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Push hard with the bayonet. The ball will lose its way; the bayonet never. The ball is a fool; the bayonet a hero. Stab once; and off with the Turk from the bayonet! Stab the second! Stab the third! A hero will stab half a dozen! If three attack you, stab the first, fire on the second, and bayonet the third."—Swarrow's Catechism.

In our last, we noticed some of the tremendous results of war—the expense, the loss of life, and the immoral tendencies of the whole system. We appealed to reason on the subject, and now we come to an examination of the Scriptures, promising, however, that our remarks must be exceedingly brief, owing to the wide range of the great moral subject on which we have entered.

We have selected for our motto an extract from Suwarrow, which fully sets forth the horrid spirit of war. Only compute such language with that of our divine Lord and Master, and who can hesitate to condemn at once the whole war system. Look at the maxims of Jesus—"Love your enemies; bless those that curse you," etc.—and then at his inimitable prayer for his foes—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" The Christian can not long remain in doubt respecting the one whom we ought to follow.

But our principal object now is to show that war directly violates the whole Decalogue. We are aware that in directing the reader to the Old Testament, he may remind us of the wars of the Israelites, many of which were undertaken by the command of God himself! But this part of our subject will come under the head of objections to our views. We freely admit that the responses of Jehovah have been given out from between the Cherubim, and from the Urim and Thummim on the High Priest's breast-plate, enjoining it upon the favored people of his adoption to gird on the sword and go out to battle with the nations. But then we shall show that God has a right to make one nation the executioner of his vengeance upon another. But this point we leave, not from any fear of touching the objection, but solely because it would interrupt our general plan.

War, we have said, violates every law of the Decalogue.

Thou shalt have no other gods before me. War goes directly contrary to all such precepts. It originated in paganism; and its laws every where require soldiers to obey their officers rather than God! Soldiers are notorious for their neglect of God. War dethrones Jehovah. It is, indeed, a vast nursery of irreligion. Every man must yield implicit obedience to his superiors. He is not permitted to follow the dictates of his conscience. A British officer was once cashiered by Protestants for refusing to join in what he deemed the idolatries of Popery; nor must soldiers scruple at the bidding of a superior to commit the grossest outrages ever recorded in the annals of crime. Indeed, war is a system of tyranny in regard to man, and a system of rebellion in relation to God. To prove this we will cite the rule adopted by George IV. in relation to the army: "If religious principles were allowed to be urged by individual officers as a plea for disobedience of orders, the discipline of the army would sustain an injury which might be dangerous to the state." Comment is unnecessary.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. War certainly breaks down this precept, for it is a school of impiety and profaneness. Go, enter a camp or a war-ship, and you will at once hear a volley of oaths. An eye-witness, speaking on this subject, says, "we should not wonder at their frequent defecations, if we could witness the drunkenness and debauchery from the general to the private, and hear them strive to outvie each other in uttering the most horrid imprecations and blasphemy, and ridiculing every like religion."

BAPTISMAL FORM.

We have been present at the administration of baptism by our Unitarian brethren. The form of words used on such occasions was familiar to our ear; but we do not recollect of ever inquiring into their meaning or authority till recently. After some research we found that the 19th verse of the 28th chapter of Matthew was most probably the foundation or authority for this form of words. We do not find any parallel expression in Mark, Luke, or John. The meaning of the charge contained in the above named verse we take to be this: Go ye to all nations and teach them the lessons you have learned from me; such of them as are prepared and willing to make an open profession, receive into the church or society of believers by the ceremony of baptism.—The profession which they ought to make is this:

that the Christian religion was revealed by the Father of all, was communicated by His beloved Son, Jesus, and was confirmed by miraculous powers.

I find that Dr. Lardner thus writes in reference to this verse:—"The design of the word is this, that they should teach men to receive and profess the doctrine which Jesus had taught with authority from God the Father, and confirmed by miracles done by the finger, the power, or the spirit of God." We do not think this is the meaning usually attached to these words, especially when used by the Orthodox clergy in the ordinance of Baptism.

We next looked into the Acts of the apostles, for information as to the mode of primitive baptism. We there found, not the employment of this modern formula, but language as follows: "Repent and be baptised, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ." Acts xi: 38. "They were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus."—viii: 16. "He commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord." x: 4, 8. "They were baptized in the name of the Lord." xix: 5. Such we find to have been the practice of the apostles in primitive baptism, but to us it appears that neither the language nor the intention of the apostles is followed by their self-styled successors.

"SHALL NOT THE JUDGE OF ALL THE EARTH DO RIGHT?"

How animating and consoling the thought, amid all the trials and changes to which we are subject in human life, that they are permitted, by that Being who holds the destiny of nations and individuals in his hand—who over rules all things for the greatest good of his creatures, bringing light out of darkness, good from seeming evil, and salvation and praise from sighs and tears! Who that reflects and understands the ways of God to men, can doubt his paternal care and goodness? Do we see and experience clouds of adversity?—we see, and enjoy, also, the sunshine of prosperity and peace. Are we afflicted with a sense of our sins and unworthiness? we hear the voice of Jesus whispering in our ears, neither do I condemn thee; "go thy way and sin no more."—Are we visited with sickness and pain? we frequently experience returning health, and permitted to rejoice in the God of our salvation!—or if otherwise ordered, in infinite Wisdom, our ears are again saluted with the sweet strains of Gospel truth—"be of good cheer, I have overcome the world"—"I am the resurrection and the life," and "because I live you shall live also." How much wiser and happier, then, is that man whose faith is in the mighty God of Jacob, than he who doubts and distrusts that beneficent Benefactor, in whose hand our time is, and who orders all things "after the counsel of his own will." Who, indeed, would wish to read the history of our race, with the eye of incredulity, after having once read it with the eye of faith?

Dear reader, have you not experienced the loving kindness of your Creator from the earliest days of your existence? And do you, nevertheless, doubt his superintending care and watchfulness? How happens this? Have you read his Holy Word with care and attention? Have you lifted your thoughts in prayer to Him, that he would lead and guide you in all truth? Or have you neglected these precious privileges, and turned a deaf ear to his counsel? Have you not rather read, and heard, His truth with indifference? Have you not sought for contradictions, rather than for truth? If so, I have one request, which I wish most sincerely and affectionately to make of you, and that is, that you will in future spend as much time, and seek as earnestly to understand the true import of the Scriptures, and make them harmonize, as you have in making them appear like a mass of contradictions; and if you will be honest with your God and yourself, in this investigation, and do not arise from their perusal a better and happier man, then must I acknowledge that you are an anomaly, and should not be blamed for your incredulity. But, remember, by all means, to do as I have pointed out, and great will be the result. You will be led to exclaim, "whereas I was once blind now I see!" and rejoice in hope of the glory of God; having a well grounded faith, that what God hath promised in his Holy Word, he is faithful, able, and willing to perform—viz: the "restitution of all things, spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began." MURRAY.

Some employment may be better than others, but there is no employment so bad as no employment at all; the mind will contract rust, and an unfitness for every good thing; and a man must either fill up his time with good, or at least innocent business, or it will run to the worst sort of waste—to sin and vice.—[Burnett.]

"LUKEWARM."

The Revelator tells us of certain Christians who were "neither hot nor cold, but lukewarm." That is, says Dr. Clarke—"they were neither heathens nor Christians; neither good nor evil; neither led away by false doctrine, nor thoroughly addicted to that which is true. In a word, they were listless and indifferent; and seemed to care little whether heathenism or Christianity prevailed. Though they felt little zeal either for the salvation of their own souls, or that of others, yet they had such a general conviction of the truth and importance of Christianity, that they could not readily give it up."

Now, this is so particularly true of many Christians in our day, that I have a good mind to set them off in the clear light of truth. And if I should happen to be so peculiarly unfortunate as to offend a brother, (as I did once, on a time while preaching on the subject,) why, I am sure it won't be owing to any disposition to be cutting—that is, severely so. Should we look throughout Christendom, we should find many churches and many individuals in the same condition as the Laodiceans of old. Many, my friends, who are neither hot nor cold—care, apparently, as little about the spread of one doctrine as another, as the church at Laodicea cared whether heathenism or Christianity prevailed. There are men and there are women of the same stamp. They have no settled opinions of their own, or like the followers of Baal, are continually "halting between two opinions"—"for ever learning, and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth." They are not, it is true, led away by any false doctrine, but neither are they thoroughly addicted to that which is true. They are of a middle character. They stand listless and indifferent—are frequently heard to express their lament for the state of indecision which they are in, yet are never seen to apply themselves in good earnest to the task of investigation; and they remain in this unsettled state—in a state of half-skepticism, or half-infidelity, and finally despair of ever coming to the truth, amid the world of conflicting opinions. And not only do they rest in this indifference themselves, but, strange to say, finally recommend it to others.—Yes, in a state of impatience themselves for the discovery of truths they never diligently sought after, they will advocate the propriety of indifference in others. And there is not a more common thing in the religious, or rather, irreligious world, than to hear the voice of declared and haughty neutrality—to hear even boastings of indecision, and freedom from the distinctive peculiarities of any sect, which is looked upon as a state of independent separation—a state of disentanglement from any contested points of doctrine, and an evidence of sound sense and clear headed wisdom. There are those who can not sympathise with any part of the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and him crucified, who, nevertheless, have such a general conviction of the truth and importance of Christianity, that they could not abandon it altogether, and so they will advocate the propriety of keeping up the Christian institutions, of attending to all its ordinances, of setting apart one day in seven for religious purposes, and, if they can not sympathise with any particular doctrine of the church, they can talk about good society and good morals; these must be kept up, and here endeth all their Christianity. They care not about the spread of one doctrine more than another. They may favor, perhaps, liberal principles and liberal sentiments; they may go to one church in preference to another, but alas! they are neither hot nor cold, but insufferably lukewarm professors, whose only principle is reputation, fashion, or good morality—good enough in itself, but not to take the place of the doctrine of Jesus Christ.—Such Christians are a dead weight upon the cause of Christianity; and it is astonishing, when we consider the importance of revealed truth, how any man can be thus situated, or manifest such culpable indifference. What! is it not a matter of interest, of deep and thrilling interest, whether the doctrine of any particular church be true or not—whether, when we die there is an end of us, or there is a world of light and glory, of darkness and despair, which we must inhabit for a whole eternity? Is it not a matter of interest whether religion is a fable or a truth—whether man is concerned in the story of the Gospel or not—whether this doctrine, or that doctrine, or the other doctrine, is true or false, all equally important, and respecting our interests through time and eternity? Is it no matter what we believe if we only do right? Is this the sentiment? This is altogether a mistake. It matters a great deal what a person believes. We must not only do right, but feel right. And this we can not do without believing right. Carry this principle out. I may believe that there is no God, no Christ, no heaven, and no hell; and if I only do right, is it no matter about my belief? Most assuredly it is. How absurd, then, is that hackneyed couplet—

"For modes of faith, let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

I would rather say—

For modes of faith let honest Christians fight,
His may be wrong whose life is in the right.

But I would have this fighting done in a proper manner. I would have it done with the sword of the spirit, tempered with charity, and polished with Christian courtesy. The importance of a right faith must be evident to every one. A right faith, it ought to be remembered, is a powerful assistant to a person's doing right. And it is astonishing, I say, when I reflect upon the importance of the matters of revealed religion, how any man can be listless and indifferent in the examination of it. The matter is no less important than the whole will of God, and the salvation of man, our duty here, and our happiness hereafter. And while any earthly interest is at stake—while a land speculation, or a rise in the price of bread stuffs, or a freight of merchandise across the waters, will inspire an interest, and an activity, and an anxiety, and call into constant watchfulness all who are concerned, it is surprising that eternal interests—the bread of God which giveth life unto the world—and our own passage across the waters of death and the ocean of eternity, should all be forgotten and laid aside, as things of minor importance, or indeed, it would seem, of no importance at all. For our own part, we could say in the language of the Revelator to every such one—"I would thou wert cold or hot." Be either one thing or the other. For we declare, if ye are neither cold nor hot, but sickening lukewarm, the church, afflicted with nausea, would "spue thee out of her mouth."

What can we expect of a heavy, slow moving body of lukewarm professors, who have just life enough to crawl about, and get out to meeting occasionally, when the weather and the walking is favorable, and even then pass into a comfortable slumber—what can we expect of such Christians—pardon the name—but a complete cliche and stagnation in the cause of onward Christianity? I speak plain, but I speak the language of plain truth. How little fitted for soldiers of the cross! to enlist under the Captain of their salvation, and fight the battle of the Lord! A hundred such soldiers would quit the field in fright before one such enemy as Saul of Tarsus, or even the boasting Goliath of more ancient times. We want no lukewarmness on the field of action. We must "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints." "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places." In such a conflict, we want "good soldiers of the cross"—who can "endure hardships for Christ Jesus"—who can go forth to meet no common foe, but to grapple with the hydra monster sin, and error, and unbelief, in all their protean forms, and prove successful in pulling down the strong holds of satan. But alas! how many such Christian soldiers can we muster? What multitudes have gone over to the Laodiceans, neither hot nor cold, but lukewarm—just warm enough to keep the life blood from congealing—just warm enough to keep alive—and existing in the body of the church, a heavy, uncongenial, unassimilating, loathsome mass, which it would disgorge and vomit away from her. Let the words of the Revelator be remembered. "I would thou wert hot or cold." Be either one thing or the other.—Have some decision. For the Bible is written in language sufficiently plain to prevent unsettled opinion with regard to its essential matters, and why should man sit indifferent and regardless? "Revive thy work, O Lord, in the midst of us, and breathe upon these dry bones that they may live."

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.

What will incline men to turn from the nauseating fount of sin, to confidence in God?—a belief that he is good, independent and unchanging, and that all his requisitions are not designed for His own aggrandizement and gratification, but for the improvement and happiness of his children. What will enable man to bear up under and view aright, and meet with calmness and resignation, the various ordeals of affliction and bereavement, through which he is called to pass? Confidence in God—a belief that they are the results of infinite wisdom and goodness, designed not for the gratification of God, but for the benefit and amelioration of his children. What will effect a heartfelt repentance on the mind of man? Confidence in God—a realizing sense of his goodness, and of the utility of all his requisitions; a belief that every thing enjoined upon man, is not calculated to gratify a spirit of despotism in God, but is conducive to his best good and happiness. What has prevented man from turning from the deadening pool of sin and impenitence? Preaching the wrath of God rather than his goodness, which has served to diminish man's confidence in God, and led him to believe that his requisitions were designed to make up the happiness of the Deity, rather than to subserve the advancement of men in the pathway of happiness and peace.

A DIALOGUE.

SON. Father, I heard Mr. D. conversing, the other day, with a gentleman, on the object of man's creation. As the subject is new to me, I should like to ask you a few questions on it.

FATHER. I should be very happy, my son, to give you any instruction you may ask for. But as you have heard neighbor D. converse on that particular subject, you may state to me what he said, and I will make such remarks on it, as suggest themselves to my mind.

S. Mr. D. said that our Creator gave us existence, because he could make that existence a blessing; and that it was his design to make it so.

F. It is generally said that he created us for his own glory, and I think that a majority of professing Christians will agree that that was his object. If it was not, then he would have no right to set some on the right hand, and some on the left, as his honor, in vindication of his justice, might require.

S. So the gentleman said to Mr. D. But he replied he did not see how it could be so; for our Creator being infinite in all his attributes, it could not add to his glory, in the popular sense of that word—and if it could not, then it was not his object. Again, if it was his object, it must have been selfish, which he could not believe.

F. True, my son, it would be the height of presumption to accuse the Deity of selfishness, or to say that he acted from a selfish motive. But when we are brought before his bar, in the great day of accounts, and each one receives his doom, then we shall know what his object was. As for neighbor D., he is always arguing, and has some very strange ideas.

S. Your saying, that Mr. D. was always arguing, brings to mind one thing farther in relation to their conversation. He said that if it was God's design to bless them, all mankind must be, finally, holy and happy. Our Creator, he said, was omniscient; therefore, if there had been any thing that could have operated against his purpose, he must have known it; as he was omnipotent, he could have prevented it; and as he was infinitely benevolent, he would have prevented it.

F. You must remember, my son, that we are free agents, and if we use our agency so as to bring a curse on ourselves, it is our fault, and can not be laid to the charge of our Maker.

S. Did not our Creator know, when he made man, and gave him his agency, what use he would make of it? Did he not see the end from the beginning? And would he, being infinitely good, have given man an agency which he knew would prove a curse to him?

F. He knew the end from the beginning; but simply his foreknowledge is no proof that he meant it should be so.

S. Things must be as God knew they would; or he did not know how they would be. To say that he knew how they would be, and they not be as he knew they would, is saying that he knew and did not know at the same time. I will tell you, further, how Mr. D. summed up the whole argument, as it was quite interesting to me. He said, 1. God created us to bless us. 2. If there was any thing to thwart his plan, he being omniscient, must have known it. 3. Being omnipotent, he could have prevented it; and, 4. Being infinitely benevolent, he would have prevented it. Therefore, all mankind must be, finally, holy and happy.

INTENDED PERVERSION OF SCRIPTURE.

Towards the close of the great protracted meeting held in our city the early part of 1838—a meeting of which, in view of its results, I never think, without being reminded of the fable of the mountain in labor with a mouse—the individual who conducted it, delivered what was called his great sermon on Restorationism. In winding up his vile philippic (for surely such a production could not properly be termed a sermon) against the doctrine of the “restitution”—a doctrine which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, and therefore must be true—he, with great pomposity and mock solemnity, requested the congregation, every man and woman, ere they reclined their heads on their pillows to sleep, or closed their eye lids to slumber, to read the last verses of the last chapter of the prophecy of Isaiah, the awful words of which, he said, had reference to the final state of the wicked in the future and eternal world, and which forever settled the question of Restorationism—forever cut off all hopes of its proving true. We know not how many of that great congregation obeyed the request of the speaker, but some of his supporters who did, we know were mortified and chagrined at the want of judgment and discernment in their organ. Others, on reading the portion of Scripture referred to, were constrained to laugh outright—for they could not conceive what right or business horses, chariots, litters, mules, swift beasts, new moons, flesh and carcasses (see the whole of the chapter) had in the eternal, the spiritual world. To the believers in the ultimate reconciliation of all things to God, it was a matter of great joy, as it was the means of leading many to perceive the weakness of the objections that are so frequently brought against their faith, and upon what a flimsy foundation the doctrine of endless misery rests. Thus it is that frequently what wicked men mean unto evil, God turns into good. W. R.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

To wish each of our numerous readers a happy new year, embraces desires for the accomplishment of various circumstances, all of which are absolutely necessary to their happiness. The wish rises easily, spontaneously and expandingly in the heart, but no sooner reaches the surface and flows abroad, than it calls into exercise the mind, to perceive the means which would accomplish it. Take a few instances.

To our wealthy patrons we wish a happy new year. But to be happy as wealthy patrons, we had better desire you to possess affections liberalized and humanized by the influence of the faith we profess. When wealth is possessed as an end, instead of pleasure it yields all the pains of anxiety and care—it narrows the soul, contracts the mind, and hardens the heart—it creates an aching void in the highest, purest, best and most happyfying powers of the soul, and preternaturally enlarges those ravening propensities which are ever crying, “give,” and which crave but the more, the more you give to them. To wish you a happy new year, then, I must desire you to be wise—to use your wealth as a means to a higher and greater end—to desire it, not for its own sake, but for the good you can accomplish with it. The poor and the destitute are around you—every smile you can light up on their countenances will reflect its gladness into your own soul—every tear of joy you can draw from their eyes, will concrete in your memory and be to your soul an everlasting pearl of which fortune can never deprive you. There, one source of happiness is pointed out to you, and on yourself it depends, whether my desire will be realized when I wish you a happy new year.

To our poorer subscribers we wish a happy new year. But to render it happy, the wealthy must not only be liberal in giving them sufficient employment, at good wages, and with kindly intercourse and aid, but they themselves must possess industrious, economical habits to rightly earn and judiciously employ their earnings—their homes must be homes indeed—and its inmates must be, not strangers, not aliens, not foes to each other and themselves, but a family. To effect this, Christianity must be among them—its doctrine in their minds, its spirit in their hearts, and its precepts wrought out into living exemplification in their practice. With this, however poor they may be, they will be richer than kings who have it not. A few of the means of happiness in every poor family's reach, are here disclosed, and on them depends the fulfilment of my cordial wish for a happy new year.

To our readers, as readers, we wish a happy new year. To ensure it as readers, they should, if able, be subscribers also. To read a borrowed paper—borrowed perhaps from a neighbor poorer than yourself, or, at all events, who is annoyed by your using his property—can not give any thing like the amount of happiness conferred by reading your own paper. Reader, I wish you a happy new year—do make it one for yourself.

To our subscribers we wish a happy new year. To insure it as subscribers, they should read their own papers and not ours—that is, they should be certain that they have paid for what they read. Oh, how much happier is the advance paying subscriber than the slack one! Is there a dun in the paper? He don't see it—it is not for him! Do the publishers suffer? Their load of care rests not a corner on his conscience—he may feel pity for them, but guilt is a stranger to his bosom—he therefore reads on in comfort and peace, fully enjoying what he peruses, for he has paid for it! Dear subscribers, we wish every one of you, a very happy new year.

To our agents, as agents, we wish the happiest of new years—for there are but few of them that have not already richly merited the same; and even the rest may go into the bargain. God bless them all, and make them rich in the rewards of duties well and truly performed.

To our correspondents as such, we wish a happy new year. We think of some, and a queer feeling begins to stir about the heart, that sends a choking sensation into the throat and brings a moisture into the eyes, and—pshaw! this is really womanish—so let us turn to the rest. Do they feel as if they had done enough last year to merit a happy new year? Let conscience answer, and the pen in hand atone to the full extent of its demands—not merely in quantity but in quality—and our wish will be realized. Most fervently do we wish them a happy new year.

To our late excellent partner, our worthy associate Editors, and to all connected with the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate by laboring for it with head or hand, we wish a happy new year. I feel persuaded that every one will realize it, by a careful, arduous and faithful endeavor to perform his duty in his proper station and relation.

To all then—to the whole world—we wish a happy new year—happy in the faithful performance of allotted duties—happy in the success of proper measures—happy in the prosperity of laudable pursuits—happy in the possession of needful acquirements—happy in the employment of Heaven-bestowed gifts, talents and means—and happy in the cultivation of required graces and virtues—to one and to all, we wish such a happy new year.

TO THE PUBLIC.

As noticed in our last paper, and as may be seen by the advertisements on the last page of the present number, the following changes have been made in the relations existing between those heretofore and at present connected with this periodical.

The late firm of Grosh and Hutchinson has been dissolved by mutual consent—Mr. H. becoming the sole proprietor of the Bookstore, and of the books heretofore owned and published by the firm—and C. C. P. Grosh becoming the business partner of the writer, in Mr. H.'s stead, in publishing the Magazine and Advocate. The printer and Editors of the Magazine and Advocate remain the same as before.

Agents and subscribers to the Magazine and Advocate may, for the present, direct their letters to either firm, or either party in them—but they should be careful to remember, in all cases, that business connected with previous volumes of the paper, belongs to the late firm; and that that connected with the present or future volumes of the paper, belongs to the new firm—and in making payments, they will save trouble and prevent mistakes, by carefully stating on what volumes, or to what firm, (and in what proportion, if any,) those payments are to be applied.

So in the book business.—All purchases or sales of books, made before the first of January inst., belong to the old firm of Grosh and Hutchinson—all since, to O. Hutchinson alone. In making payments, or demands, therefore, for books and stationery, be careful to designate to what period, or how, they are to apply.

With these necessary explanations, made once for all, the reader is referred to the advertisements on our last page.

THE POWER OF GOD.

“God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God.”—Ps. lxi: 11.

Power is that principle by which things are moved, plans executed and designs accomplished. And in proportion to the object moved or the magnitude of the plan executed, is the amount of power manifested. It requires power to raise a ball of ten pounds weight—but it requires much more power to raise a ball of one thousand pounds weight. It required power to combine and arrange the materials which form the Capitol of the United States; but it required much more power to raise the masses of stone found in the ruins of ancient Balbec, some of which are 62 feet long, 15 feet thick and 20 feet broad. And if an individual could, by any means, overturn the largest pyramid of Egypt, which, taking the smallest admeasurement of it, is 440 feet in height, and 612 feet on each of its sides, it would be an immense exhibition of power over what man has yet accomplished. We discover then, that power increases in the ratio of the greatness of the object to be moved or the plan to be accomplished. Does it not by inevitable conclusion follow, that if in nature we discover an object in motion, which immensely exceeds the power of man to move, that the power there exhibited, is greater than that of which man is possessed? And if there are objects in nature, which increase in magnitude and rates of motion, until the mind of man is lost in their immensity, does it not follow that the power of the Being who created and established them in their revolutions, increases according to the vastness of his works?

The power exhibited in nature is boundless. When the ocean sends forth its volumes of water to flow in the tides and currents of its motion—when the storm levels the mightiest trees of the forest, sweeps down buildings, and stirs up the irresistible waters to crush the staunch ship—when lightning rends rocks asunder and strikes to pieces the giant oak—when the volcano vomits forth torrents of melted lava in a stream 50 miles in length, from 12 to 15 miles in breadth, and averaging 100 feet in depth, as was the case of the eruption of Skaptar Jokul in Iceland, 1783—when in one day and night the volcano throws up a mountain 440 feet in height and one mile and a half in circumference, as was the case with Vesuvius in 1533, which formed in that period of time a volcanic hill called Monte Nuovo—we discover the exhibition of a power which mocks the puny arm of man, and beside which he is as helpless as a mere weed on the tossings of the mighty ocean.

There is, however, another exhibition of magnificent power which is overwhelming to the mind. If we stood upon a mountain and saw the landscape stretching out in every direction for 20 miles, we should at once be convinced that said landscape contained a vast mass of matter. And when we see a steam car moving on a railroad at the rate of twenty miles an hour; or when we are assured that some birds fly at the rate of from fifty to sixty miles an hour; or when we are informed that a cannon propels a ball between 450 and 800 miles per hour; we deem such rapidity almost inconceivable. But if we direct our attention to the solar system, we shall find masses of matter and behold rapidity of motion, infinitely surpassing every thing which the earth can present.

The sun is the centre of our solar system, and is 880,000 miles in diameter, and 2,764,600 miles in circumference—and revolves on its axis at the rate of 4,532 miles per hour. If it was exhibited in the same proportion with the earth, its inhabitants would be 850,000 times more than those on earth. The planet Mercury revolves around the sun at the distance from it of 36,000,000 miles, and with the inconceivable rapidity of 109,800 miles per hour. The next planet is Venus, which, at one period of the year, is our morning star, and at another period of the year, our evening star. It is distant from the sun 68,000,000 miles. The circumference of its orbit around the sun is 433,800,000 miles, and moves at the rate of 80,000 miles per hour, or above 22 miles every second. Its diameter is 7,800 miles. The Earth is more than 95,000,000 miles from the sun. It revolves in its orbit around the sun at the rate of above 66,000 per hour, and it revolves on its own axis once in twenty-four hours, at the rate of 1000 per hour. Its diameter is 8,000 miles. The next planet is Mars. It is 145,000,000 miles from the sun, and revolves in an orbit of more than 900,000,000 miles in circumference. Its rate of motion is 56,649 miles per hour. It is 4,200 in diameter. Dropping the four planets of Vesta, Juno, Ceres and Pallas, the next is the planet Jupiter, which is 495,000,000 of miles from the sun. The circumference of its orbit around the sun is 3,110,000,000, and it moves at the rate of 30,000 per hour. It is 89,000 miles in diameter, and is 1400 times larger than the earth. The next planet, Saturn, is 906,000,000 of miles from the sun. The circumference of its orbit is 5,695,000,000 of miles, and it moves at the rate of 22,000 miles per hour. Its diameter is 79,000 miles, and it is nearly 1000 times larger than the earth. There are two rings around Saturn—the outer one is 7,200 miles in breadth—the inner one is 20,000 miles in breadth. The next planet is Uranus or Georgium Sidus, and it is 1,800,000,000 from the sun. Its orbit around the sun is 11,314,000,000 of miles, which it passes in 84 years, at the rate of 15,000 miles per hour. Its diameter is 35,000 miles, and it is 81 times larger than the earth.*

Thus far I have adduced a few facts from nature.—Facts, which although they are startling to the unthinking mind, and wear the appearance of impossibility to a person unacquainted with astronomy, yet are demonstrated with mathematical precision. How much power they manifest! What unbounded might is set forth in them! Take one single fact, and it proves that God is Almighty. The orbit of the planet Uranus is 11,314,000,000 of miles in circumference. If a steam-carriage should run on this orbit at the rate of 20 miles per hour, it would require 64,570 years to complete the circuit. Yet Uranus, containing a mass of matter 110,000 miles in circumference, being 81 times the size of the earth, is thrown around this immense orbit in 84 years, at the rate of 15,000 miles every hour. How powerful must be he who can accomplish such a work as this! Yet when we consider that Uranus is but one planet of the solar system, and that the solar system itself is but a speck in the immensity of the universe—when we consider that the telescope has enabled man to count multitudes of stars, and yet that those multitudes of stars in comparison with those which crowd infinite space, are but as a drop to the ocean—when we consider that every star is most probably a world of itself, and that each and all were created and sustained by the power of God—we may well not only exclaim with the Psalmist, "power belongeth unto God," but declare with the prophet, "Ah, Lord God! behold, thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee."

INDIVIDUAL INFLUENCE.....NO. I.

Most persons who would be active in public and general matters, undervalue their influence and remain silent. In this manner much good that might be effected, remains undone. In many neighborhoods where there are but a few believers in the restitution, they remain unorganized—destitute of religious meetings, destitute of the preached word, and with but very few, if any, accessions to their numbers or improvement of their gifts—and all, most probably, because each one deems him or herself without influence, and therefore all remain idle. Humility is a good thing; but when it is pushed to the verge of abasement and degradation, and leads to inefficiency, and idleness, and neglect of duty, it ceases to be Christian humility, and from being a virtue and a blessing, it becomes a vice and a curse.

Permit me, then, to say to all such persons, that they have influence—every one of them has some influence, and many of them, I have no doubt, have a great deal. Let them but try the experiment forthwith. Say, for instance, that you resolve to form a social compact of some kind, to meet together statedly for social intercourse and religious conversation. Mature some definite plan—fix for the ultimate result of your labors, the procuring of a preacher to labor with you statedly, or at least, occasionally. Go with your plan, and all the arguments you can muster in its favor, to your neighbor of like faith. Go, firm in resolve—confident of the goodness of your cause, and full of hope of success.—Lay your plan open in regular order before him, and ask his aid in carrying it into execution. If he refuses positively, go to another, and another, and another—until you find one who will aid you. Get him to go with you to those who opposed or discouraged you, and unite your efforts to persuade them into the work. So do—so persevere—so combine the influence of all others with your own, and I am persuaded you will no longer say, "I have no influence." Try it, reader—try it immediately. A. B. G.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Under this head I propose to present a brief summary of the "sayings and doings" of the order in general, and of our Editorial brethren in various sections—jotted down hastily as we read them in our letters and exchange papers, with such running comments as fancy or judgment may dictate at the time. In this way we can notice removals of preachers, changes, dedications, proceedings of public bodies in our order, etc., etc., informally and briefly, earlier than we have been able to do in our Record kept in former volumes. With a due degree of spicing, we hope to render it worthy of perusal, as well as useful for future reference.

"HONOR TO WHOM HONOR," ETC.—"A fact for Universalists," (which turns out to be merely a Methodist fact, so fit as Br. Bushnell's case is concerned,) was copied into several other papers from Zion's Herald, and among others into the Wesleyan Journal. The Editor of the Journal, Rev. Mr. Springer, promptly corrected the story on its being proved false; but Mr. Brown, the Editor of the Herald (so says Br. Drew) "is silent and dumb on the subject as if 'the very pious Miss Juliet B.' had been praying over him also!"

DEDICATIONS.—Br. Price, in order to show the Editor of the New-York Evangelist how "Universalism is decidedly waning," gives the following list of Universalist meeting houses lately dedicated:—

"In Prompton, Pa., date not given; Potsdam, September 19; New-Gloucester, Me., Nov. 2; Middletown, Conn., Oct. 18; Union house, McDonough, Oct. 24; Union house, Sutton, N. H., Oct. 31; Churchville, Nov. 20; Denmark, Me., Nov. 20; South Reading, Mass., Nov. 20; Hinsdale, N. H., Nov. 28; South Dennis, Mass., Dec. 4; Chatham, Mass., Dec. 4; Bridgton, Me., Dec. 4; Bath, Me., Dec. 12." Fourteen in all, in about three months!

To the above list may be added, as within the three months, two which were dedicated September 12th and 13th, in Cambridgeport and Weymouth, Mass.; Union house, East Alstead, N. H., Dec. 12; Union house, So. Wobstock, Vt., Dec. 11; Murray Hall, Boston, Mass., Oct. 13; and Belfast, Me., Oct. 30—making twenty within three months!—and very probably all are not yet told. "Universalism decidedly waning"—yes, as the light wanes when the sun is rising.

NEW LABORER.—Br. John Prince, who studied with Br. Cobb, and resides in Beverly, Mass., has lately commenced preaching.

The committee on Fellowship of the Central Association of this State, have granted a letter to Br. Abner R. Bartlett, of this city, and Associate Editor of this paper. Br. Bartlett has been preaching nearly two years, and such are his talents as a preacher, and character as a man, that a letter would have been granted him at any period within a year previous to this, by the Association or its committee, had he applied for it.

We have received specimens of paper, print and embellishments of the Lady's Book for the present month. They are very beautiful.

Br. Whittemore, and some correspondents of the Trumpet, are out upon an alleged intrigue, headed by Lowell Mason and others, to exclude from general use all books of sacred music but those issued by the so-called Boston Academy—for the purpose of introducing Trinitarian and Partialist sentiments of the "right stamp," along with the music. I am fond of good music—of sweet harmonies—but if any thing can jar on my nerves so as to destroy all my pleasure in this branch of public worship, it is the introduction of words conveying erroneous and abominable sentiments, in Universalist meetings. In other meetings, I expect such sentiments as a matter of course, and bear with them. But at Universalist Conventions, Associations, Conferences and celebrations of Christmas Eve, etc., they are unendurable—and yet, how often are the joys of conscientious worshippers disturbed by them! If our choirs and musical men must use Partialist and Trinitarian collections of church music, can they not, in mercy to their hearers, contrive to find and sing words that are unobjectionable? I think they might—and should.

Rev. Paul Dean, pastor of the Bullfinch-street church in Boston, (formerly Universalist,) has united with the Unitarians, and had a Unitarian (Rev. Mr. Gray) settled as his colleague. Mr. Dean is said to be a Trinitarian, and some years ago seceded from the Universalist denomination, and endeavored to draw with him the believers in limited punishment after death, and thus establish a new denomination. But not succeeding in getting a tithe of such believers under his banner, and losing many of his adherents, one after another, among the Christians, the Unitarians, the Universalists, etc., he has at last joined the Unitarians himself—whether with or without a change of opinions in regard to the Trinity, we are not informed!

For some time past a species of mystical infidelity or transcendentalism, has been gaining advocates among the Unitarians, until, as we learn from the Gospel Banner, Professor Palfrey has resigned his station as Theological professor in Cambridge University, alleging that one part of his class are mystics, another part skeptics or rationalists, and the other part dyspeptics; thus showing that those who are not spiritually diseased are physically so. A noble set of preachers to Christianize the world, this theological seminary must send forth!

The following singular marriage took place in November last. Br. Leach may enter this among the official acts of his life which are to be remembered. Annisquam is in Massachusetts.

In Anni-quam, Gloucester, on the 16th ult., by Rev. Mr. Leach, Mr. CALK HADEN, to Mrs. HANNAH INGERSOLL. Twenty-four years since, the parties were betrothed, the bans were published and every preparation made for celebrating the nuptials. Some untoward circumstance prevented the accomplishment of the marriage, and a separation ensued. Subsequently each formed a matrimonial connexion. These ties being dissolved by death, the parties became free, the attachment of their early days was renewed, and the long deferred union was consummated.—Gloucester Telegraph.

BUSINESS NOTICES.

BRIEF BUT IMPORTANT.—The terms of the paper will be rigidly enforced. Every one that does not pay in advance, must expect to pay the enhanced price of two dollars, or two and a half dollars as the case may be. We beg of every one to pay in advance—it will greatly accommodate us and save each one from fifty cents to a dollar. Why delay then? Surely every one can get the small sum of one dollar and fifty cents, within the first four months, and pay it over to us, or to one of our accredited agents.

2. If there is no agent near you, select a responsible person to act for you, from among your number, and send us his name and residence—or, if you are alone, act yourself, and get one or more subscribers, and send us the amount of dollars, leaving the balance of cents less than a dollar for another time. In most cases the Postmaster will send money for you, if requested, and so save you postage, if the sum is less than a five dollar bill—or you postage, if the sum is that or more. Save all you can, for money is scarce—and by paying in advance you can save at least fifty cents. Remember it.

3. If you have ordered a discontinuance, and yet receive this number, be assured there is a mistake somewhere. So, if you will not continue, and can not get some one to take it in your stead, write your name, and the name of your Postoffice and State, with a lead pencil on the margin, and return the paper immediately, unsoiled and whole and in a wrapper, directed "Magazine and Advocate, Utica, N. Y." And do so with every number you receive. For if you take the paper from the Postoffice, and keep it, you are legally bound to pay for it.

4. Having greatly curtailed our list, we much need an increase of good subscribers. Will not every brother, who is a Universalist in deed, and therefore desires others to enjoy the same happy and holy faith, use a little exertion to increase our list? Get advance paying subscribers, if possible, and then we need not dun any, and will be able to make our paper nearer what it should be, than we have done for two years past. Do try and aid us kind reader—we think you can, if you will.

5. Agents will confer a very great favor, by an immediate and renewed effort to close up all business belonging to the late firm, and reporting at an early day how its debtors stand. (See "Directions" on Prospectus.) And on the new firm, they will also confer a very great favor, by urging the conveniences, pleasures and advantages of advance payments in all cases—not only to publishers but to subscribers also. We have twice been brought so near to the very brink of ruin, by giving long credit, and are so heartily sick of dunning (and of being dunned!) that we are resolved to avoid both ruin and duns hereafter, by urging our business towards the cash system as rapidly as possible. Will they not aid us, one and all?

THE APPOINTMENT IN MIDDLEVILLE.

I hate apologies, and I regret the necessity of making them still more. On this account I had thought of passing this over in silence. But justice to the friends in Middleville requires that they should be made acquainted with the circumstances which subjected them to the disappointment on Christmas Eve. The circumstances are these. Br. Keeler of Newport applied to Br. Cook of this city to know whether a preacher could be obtained to deliver a discourse in Middleville on Christmas Eve. I consented to fill the appointment if Br. Keeler or some one else would meet me at Herkimer village and convey me over and back. A letter was addressed to Br. Keeler, informing him to that effect, and requesting him to write to me if he wished me to come. Time passed on and no letter came. Perhaps I should have considered myself relieved from my engagement. But not knowing whether or not the letter had been received by Br. Keeler, and considering my engagement made in good faith, I ventured to publish the notice in the Magazine. In accordance therewith, I proceeded to fulfil my part of the supposed contract by repairing to Herkimer on Tuesday the 24th. But no one came for me, and, by my expectation that some one would yet be after me, up to six o'clock, I was effectually prevented from seeking a passage over for myself. Of course I had nothing to do but to wait as patiently as I could until the cars returned to Utica. So ended this lesson of mutual disappointments.

THE BOOKSTORE

Now owned and conducted solely by Br. Hutchinson, has proved itself a highly valuable auxiliary in the spread of liberal Christianity, and therefore deserves the continued, cordial and increased support of all liberal Christians. Until its establishment, Universalist, and Unitarian, and other liberal publications could not be procured short of New-York, and often not short of Boston. Even works on Phrenology, or other sciences which were regarded by the so-termed Orthodox as inimical to Christianity, were seldom kept in our bookstores—and then only a few of the most common of them. Not only liberal Christians therefore, but lovers of science generally, owe to this bookstore a debt of gratitude for bringing such excluded works into more general circulation among the people of this and the western States. I feel, therefore, considerable boldness in inviting their attention to, and support of, Mr. Hutchinson's Bookstore. He will, as rapidly as means and encouragement are afforded him, gather into it all scarce and valuable books that are excluded or not kept by the other booksellers—particularly Universalist, Unitarian and Phrenological works—and will, with them, also keep a good, general assortment of the best and most popular theological, literary, scientific, school and miscellaneous books and stationery. Let him be encouraged, therefore, by a prompt, generous, steady and increasing support; for such a store is needed greatly, and under his care and attention, (devoted, as it will now be, exclusively to it,) will be made useful—highly useful to the cause of truth and humanity. A. B. G.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME XI.

Among several valuable communications received during the latter part of last volume, and the beginning of the present one, and which will be attended to in due time, we feel particularly grateful for one prose and several poetical articles from Miss Edgerton, who, amidst her own editorial duties, has kindly taken time to aid us in ours. We did not receive them in time for this number. Br. Spear, who as an essayist stands very high in our estimation, has sent a continuation of his peace articles, and promised us essays on other interesting subjects—perhaps even one a week. Br. Austin will continue to completion his Voice to the Married, beginning the volume with the duties of wives. Br. A. C. Thomas has also promised us his aid during the present volume. These, with our old and constant correspondents, and the two series of articles commenced in this paper, aided by the occasional contributions which come in during each year, will, I think, enable us to show some improvement in the eleventh volume of the Magazine and Advocate over, at least, the two volumes preceding it. May God enable us so to improve it, by smoothing our rugged path before us, and disposing the hearts of our brethren and sisters of the quill, to "indite good matter" for us.

A. B. G.

P. S. Ministering brethren to whom the paper is sent—especially those who do not act as agents—can well pay us for the same, by furnishing a few well-written and carefully penned articles for our columns, during each year. Let each such guest add a few dishes to the mental feast, and there is no doubt that all pure and well regulated appetites will find on the board all they can crave. The plain and uncooked vegetables—i. e. crude gossip—I will furnish myself.

A. B. G.

SEND IN NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS.

By the change in partnership, it becomes necessary to make out new mail books, etc., as soon as possible. We wish therefore to get our list regulated early. Will our agents and friends, then, please to stir actively in getting new subscribers, and sending in the names already procured, that we may regulate matters accordingly. After that, an occasional new subscriber, will still be welcome, of course—but we want the main body of the reinforcement sent in soon. The discontinuances we suppose are all in, as we gave them timely notices of the law on the subject.

PUBS.

THE FIRST NUMBER of a new volume is necessarily occupied with many business notices—condense them as we will—which, however important to the publishers, are distasteful to a majority of the readers. We have given as few as possible—and had to give more than we wished to, in order to have matters fully understood, so as to save a repetition of them at a future day. We hope not to offend soon again.

POETRY.

THE WINTER KING.

BY MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.

O what will become of thee, poor little bird
The muttering storm in the distance is heard;
The rough winds are waking, the clouds growing black!
They'll soon scatter snow-flakes all over thy back!!
From what sunny clime hast thou wandered away
And what art thou doing this cold Winter day?
"I'm pecking the gum from the old peach tree,
The storm does't trouble me—Pee, dee, dee."

But what makes thee seem so unconscious of care?
The brown earth is frozen, the branches are bare
And how can'st thou be so light hearted and free,
Like Liberty's form with the spirit of glee,
When no place is near for thine evening's rest,
No leaf for thy screen, for thy bosom no nest?

"Because the same hand is a shelter for me,
That took off the Summer leaves!—Pee, dee, dee."

But man feels a burden of want and of grief,
While plucking the clusters and binding the sheaf!
We take from the ocean, the earth, and the air,
And their rich gifts do not silence our care,
In Summer we faint; in Winter we're chilled,
With ever a void that is yet to be filled.

"A very small portion sufficient will be,
If sweetened with gratitude!—Pee, dee, dee."

I thank thee, bright monitor! what thou hast taught
Will oft be the theme of the happiest thought;
We look at the clouds, while the bird has an eye
To him who reigns over them changeless and high;
And now, little hero, just tell me thy name,
That I may be sure whence my oracle came.

"Because in all weather I'm happy and free,
They call me the WINTER KING!—Pee, dee, dee."

But soon there'll be ice weighing down the light bough, Whereupon thou art sitting so merrily now!
And though there's a vesture well fitted and warm,
Protecting the rest of thy delicate form,
What then wilt thou do with thy little bare feet,
To save them from pain 'mid the frost and the sleet?
"I can draw them right up in my feathers, you see!
To warm them, and fly away!—Pee, dee, dee."

DIVORCES.

As this is the season for applications for divorces to the several Legislatures, it may be well to state that the increasing number of these applications is truly alarming, and threatens to undermine the very foundations of the social system. Marriage is a religious as well as a civil tie, and is to be sustained on both considerations, and can not, therefore, be loosely dissolved. The fashion now is to separate or ask for divorce for un congeniality of mind and difference of opinion. A lady whose romantic fancy has not realized all she hoped and desired for in her choice of a husband, sighs to return to single blessedness and be again her own mistress, and asks for a separation or a bill of divorce. A gentleman who is disappointed in his wife's fortune, manners, mind, or accomplishments, is rude, insulting, disaffected, without domestic habits or happiness, and talks of separation and divorce. A Legislature, or a Court of Chancery, should never annul a marriage unless on the most conclusive proofs of criminal infidelity. Men and women are supposed to use proper caution in the ordinary transactions of life—how much more cautious should they be in contracting matrimony, that most serious of all steps and stages in the journey of life. If they have been rash and imprudent—if they have fallen in love in haste and compelled to repent at leisure, they must stand the hazard of the die—the law should grant no relief. The more we grant divorces, the less will be the caution in contracting alliances; and men and women, instead of feeling humiliated and broken-hearted in thus appealing to the Legislature for relief—instead of shuddering for the sake of their children at the prospect of a separation, will account it an every day affair—quite a fashionable thing, on the least quarrel to ask for separation and divorce. It is incredible what efforts a man and wife would make to live happily, to overcome the effects of temper and reconcile each to their fate calmly and tranquilly, did they know positively that nothing this side of the grave could separate them. We are all inclined to submit when there is no help. Let our legislatures be firm in resisting these appeals, and society will be the gainer.

FANCY STOCK.—An aged father called his son into his room on the day he was 21 years of age, and with a serious countenance addressed him thus:

"My son, you are now free, and must hereafter provide wholly for yourself. In this packet is $3,000; yet you will have to labor as though you were not worth a cent. Take it with my blessing."

The son retired, examined the packet, and found—1,500 dollars in continental money, and the remainder in outlawed due-bills, accompanied with this note:

My son: I came to Boston 20 years since with a shilling in my pocket, and the enclosed valueless papers, given me by my father, in my hat. By honesty, sobriety and tough hands, I kept a clear conscience, and obtained the property I now possess. Do likewise.

Your affectionate FATHER.

He did, and now occupies the noblest palace that "the city of palaces" can produce. A shilling was his father's capital—a shilling was his.

Reason.—The three thousand dollars given by his father was the only "fancy stock" he ever possessed.—Detroit Spectator.

THE RETORT DIRECT.—Some time ago, my friend Aminadab paid me a visit from the country. He wanted to purchase some agricultural books for his boys; I accompanied him to the bookstore of "my very particular friend," Mr. —. Aminadab had on a full suit of home made drab, country-manufactured brogans, and the identical broad-brim that had sheltered his head and shoulders from sun and storm for 5 years.—He could not find exactly the books that he wanted, and probably was a little troublesome; at least so thought the salesman, a pert young wag in starch and buckram. "You are from the country, are you not, Sir?" said he, a little impudently.

"Yes."

"Well, here's an Essay on the Rearing of Calves."

"That," said Aminadab as he returned to leave the store, "thee had better present to thy mother."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on December 26th, 1839, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. GEORGE G. McBRIDE, to Miss ELIZABETH WHITE, all of Utica.

In Gerry, on the 3d ult., by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. JOSEPH J. SPRAGUE, of Pomfret, and Miss PHEBE JACKSON, of the former place.

In Sheridan, on the 1st ult., by the same, Mr. JAMES B. SPRAGUE, of Gerry, and Miss ANGELINE S. GREEN, of Ellery.

In Hanover, on the 5th ult., by the same, Mr. AURELIUS H. PHELPS, and Miss MARCIA S. WASHEURN, both of Hanover.

In Salisbury, on Sunday, December 15th, by Rev. J. D. Hicks, of St. Johnsville, Mr. SHERMAN MUNGER, to Miss SOPHIA PHENELIA CURTIS, both of Salisbury.

Also, in same place, December 16th, by the same, Mr. ETHAN A. FAY, Esq., recently from Albany, to Miss ANN BARTLETT, daughter of the late Col. Bartlett.

In Fowler, September 17th, 1839, by Rev. O. Wilcox, GEORGE W. HAZELTON, to ALMIRA COLE, all of that place.

DEATHS.

In Buffalo, November 14th, of whooping cough, VICTORIA, infant daughter of Aaron and Luranie Bean, aged 5 months, and 23 days—a flower cut down in all its loveliness, and the 5th that the afflicted parents have been called to consign to the silent tomb. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered by Br. Pickering, Mr. Hosmer, (Unitarian,) and Mr. Copeland, (Methodist,) attended as neighbors, and kindly took part in the services.—Com.

In Stratford, Montgonery county, December 1st, Mr. EDWARD W. MOSHER, only son of Abiathar Mosher, Esq., aged about 25 years. The deceased had been, for about two years previous to his death, afflicted with frequent and excessive bleeding at the nose, which complaint at last terminated his mortal existence. He has left a companion, to whom he was united last March, who deeply feels her loss, and an aged father and mother, two sisters, and many other relatives to mourn their loss. But they mourn not as do many, for being believers in the resurrection of a ransomed world to holiness and happiness, they expect to meet again where sorrow will never come, and they shall part no more. The funeral was attended on the 3d, and a discourse delivered by the writer to a large and apparently deeply interested congregation, composed of different denominations of Christians; but the Baptists were the most numerous among which was their preacher, who declined taking any part in the services of the occasion, for reasons best known to himself.

J. D. HICKS.

In Lewiston, N. Y., November 24, Mr. LEMUEL COOK, in the 79th year of his age. In this dispensation of divine Providence, another of our Revolutionary fathers has fallen asleep in death. But he has left to his children not only the national liberty for which he struggled; but he has left them in the enjoyment of that more glorious liberty, the freedom of the mind. This enables them to look to their Father in heaven as the friend of all his intelligent creatures, and to rejoice in the assurance that they shall again meet their father and mother in heaven. This faith had been the staff and stay of the deceased through a long life, for he told me that he embraced it by hearing Murray preach soon after the war. And by his moral worth he has left an everlasting refutation of the oft repeated assertion, that a belief in a world's salvation leads to licentiousness. By his perfect composure through his sickness, and resignation in the hour of death, he has given ample testimony to the peace-giving influence of his faith in the hour of death. The funeral was attended on the 26th, when the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer to a large congregation of neighbors and friends.

O. WILCOX.

Very suddenly, in Fo t-Covington, on Friday, the 13th inst., in consequence of strangulated hernia, Mr. WM. RYAN, aged 66 years.

Mr. Ryan was one of the early settlers of this town, having emigrated here from New-Hampshire, about 30 years ago, when this section was almost an entire wilderness.—He died leaving a spotless and irreproachable character.—Mild and inoffensive in disposition, honest and upright in his dealing, and decent and moral in his habits, he was respected and beloved by all who knew him. In all the relations of society, his conduct was exemplary and becoming. In life he was a firm and consistent believer in the doctrine of universal salvation, and in the hour of death he remained steadfast in his faith in the efficacy and impartiality of a Saviour's redeeming grace.

The writer of this brief obituary has seen many occasions for thankfulness and gratitude that man's eternal interests are in the keeping of a just and merciful God; but never did I entertain those feelings more strongly, than when listening to the discourse of the clergyman who officiated at the burial of the deceased. In the truth uttered by the preacher, that not he, but the beneficent Creator and Ruler of the universe, had fixed the destiny of our departed friend, there was truly great consolation. Verily there is joy in believing that in the sight of our heavenly Father a pure and blameless life, and not empty and ostentatious profession, constitute the true standard of Christian and moral excellence.—Franklin Gazette, of December 18th.

THE SKETCH AND ITS REMINISCENCE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

"This is a pretty little village," said Ada Vernon, throwing up her lace veil, which she had worn over her face till the last rays of the bright June sun were withdrawn, and the soft, rich shadows of a golden twilight were resting in the meadows that lay on either side of the road they were travelling. They, I say, for in company with Ada, rode her husband, to whom she had been then married half a year. "This is a pretty little village; why not stop here through the night?"

"I was just about to propose it—and just ahead of us is a neat building which seems to be an inn. We will try it." So saying, he touched the lash lightly upon the ears of his beautiful little horse, and drove briskly up the green yard of the village hotel. The ostler stood ready to lead away the horse, and the landlord politely ushered his company into the public drawing-room. It contained only one person—a lady, who sat at an open window, sketching. She rose when they entered, and offered them seats; then quietly resuming her occupation, seemed soon to forget their presence.

Ada, who was a familiar, social, little body, at length approached her, and looked out upon the scene she was transferring to paper. It was sweetly picturesque, and so very simple, that Ada felt convinced, it was less for the beauty of the landscape than for some association connected with it, that the lady bestowed so much care and interest upon her task. She looked up to Ada and smiled.

"You will think my taste not very fastidious," she said in a low and gentle voice; "I might have chosen a more romantic subject for a sketch, than this, but I hardly think one of more simple rural beauty, and I am sure not one of so sweet and holy associations. That old oak tree and the moss-grown rock beneath, have a world of interest to me, for there, not four years since, was commenced a work of spiritual reformation which has spread through, and almost completely renovated our little village; which has led the stray lambs of God back to the paths of virtue, and brought up our little children in love and Christian piety;—in short, which has made us all that we are. Do you then wonder, lady, that I wish to preserve a sketch of the old oak tree and the moss-grown rock—of the rivulet that winds so gently around their feet—of even the little foot-path at its side? Oh, no! the little scene would be dear to you, too, had it been consecrated by the first tears of your soul's penitence!"

"I doubt it not," said Ada, taking a seat by the lady's side, and bending down to examine the half-finished picture which she held on her knees; "the homeliest spot is made beautiful by holy associations, and I know many little places about my own natal home of far less loveliness than this, yet which seem to me quite enchanting, simply because they were the haunts of my childhood. But perhaps you will tell me a tale of yonder rock and tree? You may be sure it will be of interest to me."

"Thank you," replied the lady, pausing in her task, and raising her dark, spiritual eyes, with an expression of gratitude, to Ada's face. "It is a rare thing for me to make a confidant of an utter stranger, but without flattery I may say, that the sweetness of your countenance, and the frank tenderness of your manners, have won upon me with a singular power which I can not resist: I feel that you can pity and pardon human frailty, no less than admire the victory of religious principle."

"I have too many frailties of my own, dear lady, not to be lenient to those who err; but I would not desire you to relate any incidents in your own life, which may be painful to your feelings in the least. When I asked to know the associations connected with your sketch, the idea did not occur to me, that they might be personal; and of course, sacred from a stranger's curiosity. Yet I own myself exceedingly gratified by the confidence you have avowed—and not a little flattered by the causes to which you have ascribed it. I think you will never have occasion to repent of this confidence, even if it lead you to repose in me many of the secrets of your past life. I have no interest, except what arises from warm and ready sympathies. I love to know the joys and sorrows of my race, that I may feel and pray for them as they have need."

"If, then, you will spend a half hour with me in the little arbor at the foot of the yard, where we shall fear no interruption, I will tell you something of the past, both in connection with myself and this little village in which I have spent most of my life. Your husband—or rather, I should say, the gentleman who is with you, will perhaps excuse your absence."

Mr. Vernon, who sat at a distant corner of the room absorbed in a newspaper, merely bowed his head in token of his acquiescence, and resumed his reading. The ladies passed out into the yard. The roses were in bloom, and loaded the air with fragrance. The arbor was nearly covered with them. Here the ladies sat down as familiarly as though they had been acquainted for years.

"You are perhaps expecting something in the shape of a love-tale," said the dark-eyed lady, smiling seriously; "if so, you will be disappointed. The traitress I am about to confess, were not those of love. Indeed, as I understand the word, love has no frailties. But I was a skeptic—I fell away from the covenant of grace which had been sealed in my soul by the pious teachings of a sainted mother, and openly professed and taught infidelity. My situation in life, as the daughter of a village innkeeper, threw me early and often into the society of gay, young men, with whom I have reason to believe I was somewhat of a favorite. My mind, so to speak, is by nature intellectual; and instead of amusing my company by idle sports and giddy nonsense, I did worse—I engaged them in discussions upon the truth of the Christian religion—and artfully, too; for many of our young men are highly educated, and their tastes for polite literature have received the best cultivation—so I led them on by degrees from poetry and the arts, to subjects of mythology—to the beautiful idolatry of the ancients—to the doctrine of deities and divinities, of sylphs, and nymphs and fountain naiades—to every thing, indeed, that was beautiful in error—that I might wean their minds from a too faithful attachment to the religion of their fathers. And I succeeded—too well I succeeded in my folly.—What my object was in thus undermining their hopes of a happy immortality, I am unable to decide. I think, however, it was a pride of opinion, and a feminine love of influence. I rejoiced in my success, for my converts were not only numerous, but among the most respectable and talented young men our village could boast.—Young ladies, too, joined my party; but I am happy to say they were not many. We held regular meetings at length, and strengthened our influence by making them of a character so interesting as to entice nearly all the inhabitants of the village—even those who abhorred our principles—to pay us occasional visits. We made literature the foundation of our glory, and with the aid of poetry and the arts and sciences, had established a miniature Babylon—at least in spirit. We did not openly countenance immorality—indeed, most of us had too much natural love of the beautiful to be pleased with outward vice.—But I fear the mischief that we wrought was not for this cause, any the less. A subtle and honied poison was infused into the hearts of those who listened to us, which polluted the very fountains of their being. Of course, public and private devotions were discarded; and the Sabbaths were appropriated to pleasure parties, and literary picnics. One day we had convened beneath the great oak opposite; some of us were seated upon the rock, and some rested upon the banks of the rivulet, and not a few of the gentlemen had perched themselves upon the branches of the tree.—Our exercises were to consist of impromptu orations and discourses of various character from the male members, and the ladies were called upon for extempore criticisms, dissertations and the like, the subjects to be prescribed by such persons as the speakers, individually, might choose. Among us, that day, was a stranger. He was young, and of a singularly striking figure and countenance; not handsome, as the world goes, but perfectly intellectual in every feature and expression—ay, if I may so speak, his very attitude was intellectual. No one knew his name, nor from whence he came; but the bland and spiritual expression of his face had immediately enlisted our sympathies, and won our especial interest. When my turn came for discoursing, I deemed myself only observing the obvious principles of courtesy, by appealing to him for a theme. He smiled graciously, and acknowledged his sense of the honor conferred upon him. He hesitated a moment, and then approaching me with a grace at once respectful and affectionate, proposed his subject in a low voice, whose every tone was delicious music. "It would gratify me exceedingly," he said, "if the theme be agreeable to you, sweet lady, to hear you offer a few remarks upon the beauty of that faith of ancient times which peopled every wild haunt, and mossy spring, and every domestic shrine, with deities of grace and love; which made a sanctuary of every sylvan nook, and an altar of every flower;—which made every star a god, and the rainbow the throne of a goddess; in a word, lady, that faith which filled the whole universe with a spirit of divinity, and made every little bower and glen the dwelling-place of something holy and sanctifying."

"Here was the very theme of all others, that I best loved. I sat upon the highest point of the mossy rock, and the whole company gathered around me. I was, at first, somewhat embarrassed by the stranger's presence, but the subject inspired me, and he was soon forgotten. Probably I never made a stronger impression upon the minds and hearts of my hearers, than at this time. I aimed to touch their hearts and exalt their feelings, by showing them the beauty and poetry of a faith which made all nature one vast and beneficent Deity, surrounded by ministers ever ready to carry her blessings forth to her intelligent offspring, and offering at every step an altar for their incense, and a shrine for their adoration. I felt a secret triumph in the effect I had produced, and asked in a tone of assurance, as I closed, whether the theologies of the present day, could give us a creed so beautiful and holy as this; whether the Deity they represented, the great and awful Judge of guilty man, was worthy of that place in our affections, which we could so freely open to the benign and glorious goddess of the universe—to Nature, the mother of man and brute? Murmurs of applause ran through the groups around me, and I felt that in the wide world there was no vocation so holy and divine, as to be a priestess in Nature's temples, and, by the powers of a warm heart's eloquence, to win devotees to her altars. But with a degree of painful anxiety, I sought the stranger's countenance. It was lighted with the most beautiful expression I ever saw on a mortal's face. It was perfectly angelic; and my heart beat high with gratified vanity, for I deemed it the reflection of my own pure, ideal doctrines. In a few moments he rose from the seat he had occupied at my feet, and requested the privilege of adding a few words to the beautiful eloquence with which he had been so completely enthralled—(I use his own words)—and though he could not hope to enlist their feelings as they had been enlisted by the gifted lady they had just heard with so much enthusiasm, yet he could not but feel that the creed of the fair priestess might be spiritualized and made still more beautiful and divine by some light drawn from another fountain than that of poetry and fable.

"You must imagine the interest, the eagerness, with which all eyes were turned toward him as he spoke. His voice was the most musical that can be imagined, and I looked upon him as a being little less divine than those of whom I had been so rapturously discoursing. But if my interest was great now, how can I describe to you the perfect bewilderment of every sense which succeeded, as he warmed and advanced in his subject. He was preaching Christianity—not as it is taught by our learned and dogmatical professors, but as Christ himself taught it—as nature teaches it—as our own hearts and consciences teach it. He, too, dwelt upon the beauties of that faith which finds a divinity in every tree, and flower, and gushing fount; which gives an oracle to every running brook, and builds a sanctuary in every grove and glen,—but the divinity which he taught, was the spirit of Love which created all things;—the oracles were the breathings of that spirit as he speaks out from the beautiful things which he has made; and the sanctuaries were the places of his presence with the children of his love. In short, so fascinating and convincing was the stranger's eloquence, so holy and glorious were the doctrines that he taught, so soothing and beautiful was the faith that he commended to our hearts, that not one among us was stoic enough to remain unmoved. I never before shed tears so pure and sanctifying. I felt as much humbled as I had been previously elated—and oh! so happy in the hope which he presented of an eternity of holy joy, of sacred love, that I could have knelt at his feet, and wiped them with the hair of my head. Those around me were scarcely less affected, and when the stranger paused after a discourse of two hour's length, we would not have him leave us, but kept him in conversation till long after the sun was gone, and allowed him to depart then, only on condition that he would assemble with us, on the same spot, the succeeding Sabbath. He gave his promise, and fulfilled it; and from that time forth, we have never neglected our fervent and grateful devotions to the Christian's God, who sent the light of Bethlehem's Star upon us, while we were groping in heathenish darkness. We have a neat little church now, and a prosperous and zealous society of young believers; but never can any spot on earth have the same holy interest to me, as the old oak tree and the moss-grown rock, where first I bowed my heart to the worship of the living God, who will have all men to be saved, and come to a knowledge of the truth. Do you wonder that I love the scene, simple and object-less as it is? Oh, no, dear lady—those tears in your eyes are answering, oh, no!"

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION I.—INTRODUCTION TO THE GOSPELS.

Luke's Preface.

Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us,

2 Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word;

3 It seemed good to me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus,

4 That thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed.

Verse 1. "Taken in hand."—Undertaken, attempted. The persons referred to, had undertaken to give a regular narrative of the Saviour's life; and some of them had perhaps succeeded to a certain extent; but not as well as Luke believed he could. The Greek word does not necessarily imply success, though it does not preclude that idea. In Acts ix: 29, it is applied to the unsuccessful attempts of Paul's enemies to slay him; and in Acts xix: 13, it is applied to the vain attempts of the exorcists to expel evil spirits.

"Many have taken in hand."—As early as the time that Luke wrote his Gospel, it seems that a large number of persons had undertaken to compose a history of the Saviour—some doubtless having been more, and others less, successful.—See concluding remarks.

"Most surely believed."—Most certainly performed, seems a better rendering. See Campbell's notes in loco.

Verse 2. "Eye witnesses and ministers of the word."—The word here may denote the doctrine of the Saviour; or it may denote the Saviour himself. The latter application seems the most probable; since the apostles could hardly be regarded as eye witnesses of the Saviour's doctrine, though they might be of him.

Verse 3. "It seemed good to me also."—It will be observed that Luke does not censure the motives of those that had previously written the history of the Saviour; but indirectly admits that their motives were good. His predecessors had been influenced by good motives; but had not been successful in their attempts.

"Having had perfect understanding."—"Having accurately traced out." Clarke.

"Theophilus."—Literally, Lover of God.—Some suppose that Theophilus is here used indefinitely to denote the friends of God in general; but the qualifying phrase "most excellent," and the use of the singular number, makes it probable that the term is a proper name; and that some man of distinction was intended.

Verse 4. "Those things."—Or, doctrines, (logos.)

CONCLUDING REMARKS.—A brief account of the early writings, aside from those embraced in our present canon, that claimed to be histories of the Saviour, as well as others ascribed to the apostles, will perhaps be acceptable and profitable to the reader.

There is a collection of what are called Apocryphal writings, entitled "The Apocryphal New Testament, being all the Gospels, Epistles, and other pieces now extant, attributed in the first four centuries, to Jesus Christ, his apostles, and their companions; and not included in the New Testament by its compilers." This work is much used by infidels for the purpose of casting reproach upon the Christian religion.

Among the pieces contained in this work, are the writings of Barnabas, Ignatius, Polycarp and Hermas, "which (says Horne) ought not in strictness to be considered apocryphal, since their authors, who are usually designated Apostolical Fathers, from their having been contemporary, for a longer or shorter time, with the apostles of Jesus Christ, were not divinely inspired apostles. The first Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, indeed, was for a short time received as canonical, in some few Christian churches, but was soon dismissed as an uninspired production: the fragment of what is called the second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, Dr. Lardner has proved not to have been written by him. These productions of the apostolic Fathers, therefore, have no claim to be considered as apocryphal writings."

Concerning the remaining pieces contained in the Apocryphal Testament, Horne says, that the Epistles of Abgarus, and of Jesus Christ, were never heard of till published by Eusebius in the fourth century. The Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans "is unquestionably of very late date."—Mr. Jones places it near the time of the reformation.

The six Epistles of Paul to Seneca, were never heard of till the fourth century. The Gospel of the birth of Mary, belongs to the third, or perhaps the second century. "This Gospel of the birth of Mary is for the most part the same with the Prot-evangelion, or Gospel of James, (which, nevertheless, it contradicts in many places,) and both are the production of some Hellenistic Jew. Both also were rejected by the ancient writers." The Gospels of the infancy are placed in the beginning of the second century. The Gospel of Nicodemus, and the Acts of Pilate, belong to the latter end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century. The Apostles' Creed to the fourth century. The Acts of Paul and Thecla, to the latter part of the first, or the beginning of the second century.

Such are the dates of these Apocryphal writings as given by Horne, in his Introduction, vol. I, p. 438.

At the close of the Apocryphal Testament, there is a "list of all the Apocryphal pieces not now extant, mentioned by writers in the first four centuries of Christ, with the several works wherein they are cited or noticed. The number of pieces contained in this list is seventy. These, and those previously named, as belonging to the Apocryphal Testament, are all that claim to give any account of the Saviour or apostles, or that relate to that subject, that existed during a period of four hundred years. Some of them, and perhaps the larger number, were the productions of honest men, and contained what they knew, and what they had heard, and what they believed respecting Christ and the apostles, and the religion they taught. Others were, doubtless, the productions of impostors, whose designs were, either to cast reproach upon the religion of Christ, while wearing the garb of friendship, or (as was probably the case in most instances) to make money by their writings, as every thing relating to the history of the Saviour, met with a ready sale, till exposed (if it were an imposture) by the jealous eye and watchful care of the sincere and intelligent Christian.

And that these pieces have any connection with the genuine and canonical writings of the New Testament, more than have the writings of many modern professors, whose sentiments are equally absurd and ridiculous, we have yet to learn.

That the genuine writings of the New Testament are not, as some infidels seem to suppose, to be confounded with the Apocryphal and spurious, may be seen from the following statements of Dr. Paley.

"1. That there is no evidence that any spurious or apocryphal books whatever, existed in the first century of the Christian era, in which century all our historical books are proved to have been extant.

2. These apocryphal writings were not read in the churches of Christians.

3. Were not admitted into their volume.

4. Do not appear in their catalogues.

5. Were not noticed by their adversaries.

6. Were not alleged by different parties as of authority in their controversies:

7. Were not the subjects among them of commentaries, versions, collations, expositions.

Finally, besides the silence of three centuries, or evidence within that time of their rejection, they were, with a consent nearly universal, reprobated by Christian writers of succeeding ages." The reverse of these statements is shown to be true of the canonical books. And how this could be, if the canonical and apocryphal books are to be confounded, is what infidelity must yet explain.

In concluding these remarks, it may be well to remind the reader, that the apocryphal writings we have noticed and alluded to, are not to be ranked among those histories of the Saviour, alluded to by Luke. The latter existed in the days of Luke, the former, not till a long time subsequent. Of those which he refers to, we have now no traces, though it is not improbable that they may have furnished materials for subsequent productions.

UNIVERSALISM, IN FORT PLAIN.

Br. GOSH—I take up the "grey goose quill," (for such is the one I am using,) to tell you something of what is taking place in this village. It is nothing less than I have been expecting for some weeks past, nor do I apprehend any evil to the cause of true Christianity will result from it—I refer to the thing absurdly called "a revival of religion." It has commenced, or rather the steps preparatory to a mad revival of scenes for the exhibitions of human folly, are now being taken.

The Rev. Mr. Pepper, the Dutch Reformed minister in this village, has commenced delivering a course of lectures on "the momentous subject of a revival of religion in Fort Plain." He has come to the awful conclusion, that "unless something be done soon, the people will all get to be Universalists." What a lamentable state of things this would be! It never will answer! And accordingly, the Rev. gentleman has set himself at work to do that "something;" which, if accomplished, will match this "seemingly doomed place" as a brand from the burning, from the awful vortex of Universalism, on which it is closely verging. A mighty work, truly, for a man that "can't do any thing," and I should think, rather a hopeless task.

I am informed that the work was begun last Sabbath, but no intelligence of it reached me until last evening, when I attended. On this occasion he preached and exhorted; alternately, for the space of about an hour and a half. His object was, "to point out the evidences of a true revival of religion, and the appointed and proper means to be used in effecting it," and to urge the necessity of speedily bringing it about. But so far from doing this—except, perhaps, the last mentioned—he showed that "the church was in a backslidden state;" that "by their conduct and example they were leading sinners down to hell;" that unless they returned to their first estate "the blood of sinners would be on their hearts when they should get to heaven;" that they "were cold, prayerless, lifeless, dead, yea, twice dead and plucked up by the roots," etc., etc. He applied to them language which, to say the least, represented his church in an awful state of moral pollution. And if he told the truth about them, they need as much reformation as any of the sinners in this place; and I hope he will effect it in them, though I confess that my faith that he will do so, is hardly as large as a grain of mustard seed.

But the lethargic state of the church is only of small moment. "That moral pestilence that has lately come here, whose withering influence is rolling over the place like a mighty ocean;" "proclaiming peace, peace, where there is no peace;" "sowing pillows under sinner's arms;" "preaching lies"—which, by the way, he may be called upon to prove—; "deceiving the wicked by perverting the Scriptures;" "promising the sinner he shall go to heaven, when God says he shall make his bed in HELL;" that "sayer of smooth things" it is, that gives the Rev. gentleman so much uneasiness and "fearful concern." Elder Pepper is not ignorant that our congregations are increasing, and his knowledge on this subject troubles him; as likewise, I have no doubt, do the facts that have reached his ear relative to the glorious time we had on Christmas eve. That the Elder is in trouble, I have not the least doubt. He feels greatly alarmed for the safety of his flock; for they are exposed, even "in the streets, to the blighting shafts of [what he calls] infidelity!"

The Elder seems to be, and I have no doubt is, inflated with the windy notion that he can control this place as he pleases. But I will assure him, he will find himself, in the end, egregiously mistaken. For there are many here, who are too much enlightened, and too well acquainted with "the mysteries of designing priestcraft," to be awed, or moved in the least, in their religious feelings by the threatenings of Elder Pepper, or the machinations of any other revivalist.

But I must add a few words concerning the celebration of our Saviour's birth at our church. The house, agreeably to notice, was decorated and illuminated. The trimming was light and plain, but tasteful. The motto, "O come and let us worship," placed over the desk, was most beautifully executed. Indeed, in the whole of this matter, our friends evinced much judgment and good taste.

But the best part of the decoration was an overwhelming audience. In this respect, the most sanguine were disappointed—but happily—as the congregation was much larger than even they anticipated, being the largest, except one, that ever convened in the house. The house thus literally "cramped full," was uncomfortable, and calculated to make the people restless. But it prevented them not from giving the strictest attention, nor grave-like stillness from reigning during the whole service. The occasion seemed to awaken deep and thrilling interest in the bosoms of the entire audience. And I cannot believe it will very soon be forgotten. It will "live in memory," be the subject of reflection and productive of good. The choir performed their important, and always interesting, part of the services, to the general admiration of the "happy throng." It was a refreshing and happy time. And may both speaker and hearers long keep it in remembrance. Especially may they remember the virtues and example of Him whose nativity they met to commemorate, pattern after him, and grow wiser, and better, and happier. Affectionately yours,

H. B. SOULE.

Fort Plain, December 30, 1839.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

In resuming my weekly gossip, I wish to notice two events not exactly new, but which were not noticed in our last volume on account of my attention being deeply engaged in other matters. Br. M. H. Smith, of Salem, Mass., has formally withdrawn from the fellowship of all associated bodies of the denomination, not on account of any change of faith or profession, but because (as he says) he is conscientiously opposed to any body's exercising jurisdiction of discipline over a minister, except the society of which he is pastor. Br. Smith has several times been brought before committees of discipline, Associations and a Convention on various charges, and been cleared by a unanimous vote—and lately has been censured by a mutual council called to investigate charges against him. It is very probable that these events have enlightened his conscience on this subject and rendered it more tender than formerly!

Rev. Wm. Whiting, formerly in fellowship with Universalists, has lately withdrawn from the fellowship of the Old Colony Association, in consequence of his conversion to a faith in the endless sin and misery of a portion of mankind. He expresses much fear lest he may have led many souls to endless perdition by preaching Universalism. Our friends at the East say he is in fear without cause, for his labors were probably very inefficient—but even if otherwise, he has only to wait till he gets to a partial heaven, where he will be ignorant of the fate of his converts, or he will rejoice at their endless wo as the will of God—for, I presume, he has no fear that he, himself, will be miserable there to all eternity, in consequence of knowing the miseries of those he has led to endless perdition by his preaching!

BR. BUSHNELL'S CASE, AGAIN—Rev. Mr. Sprague, the author of "A fact for Universalists," asks Br. Whittemore to open his columns, for testimony from persons who were present when Br. Bushnell was struck dumb—also that of Miss Banister ("the very pious Miss Juliet B.") in regard to her praying as stated. Br. Whittemore agrees, on condition that Zion's Herald shall be opened to publish proofs that Mr. Balfour has been slandered in that paper, and his writings garbled and perverted—a course positively refused by the Editor of the Herald. I doubt not that Mr. Sprague could prove that Mr. Bushnell lost his voice at that meeting—a thing not denied, but only that it was the first time—nor that Miss Banister would certify that she prayed as stated—but can she prove that she knew that Mr. B. intended preaching there before he knew it himself? If she can, our columns are open to Mr. Sprague and her for the purpose; if she can not, then must we believe that her long season of special prayer is all hypocritical pretence; for Mrs. Bushnell positively declares that Mr. B. never thought of lecturing there, until a few hours before the time, and that but these few hours of previous notice were given. Here is the point in which "the very pious Miss Juliet B." will find her veracity called in question.

Br. L. Paine has removed to Columbus, Warren county, Pa., where he wishes all letters and papers intended for him, directed for the present.

COLDS AND COUGHS.

Dr. A. C. Draper, of Philadelphia, at present delivering a course of popular lectures on the various systems of the healing art, in this city, at the close of his lecture on Consumption, (the inefficiency and impropriety of the remedies commonly used, and the true treatment of that scourge of our country,) gave the following recipe for common coughs and colds. It is published at the request of many present, and from a belief that it will be found highly beneficial to the public. Will the newspapers generally please copy it, and thus do a service to afflicted humanity? The tinctures may be prepared by steeping a considerable quantity of the herbs (and roots) named, in strong brandy, until it is fully saturated with their virtues.

A. B. G.

Dr. Draper's Domestic Pectoral.

Take one quart of an infusion of slippery elm—hot. (Where slippery elm can not be procured, the next best mucilage is, that obtained by boiling flax-seed, or dissolving gum arabic.) Add two large lemons sliced, and two ounces of sugar candy. Simmer the mixture over a fire for a short time, strain it; and when the liquor is cold, add one ounce of Lobelia inflata (common names, Indian tobacco, or Eye bright)—one ounce tincture of Sanguinaria Canadensis (common names, Bloodroot, or Puccoon)—one ounce, tincture of Ictodes foliata (common name, Skunk cabbage)—and two ounces syrup of Arun triphyllum (common names, Wake Robin, or Indian turnip).

Dose.—A small wine glass full, several times a day—and in proportion for a child.

A. C. DRAPER.

Br. Price.—Credit Richmond White, Sherburne, $2, and charge us. Send Union, (octavo,) to Rev. T. D. Cook, Utica, with a bill, charged to this office.

Br. Tompkins.—Credit Mrs. H. Gaylord, Magnolia, $2.50 for current vol. Repository, and charge us. Cr. P. L. Moran, Lima, O., $2, and discontinue at end of vol. Charge us. Send Repository to T. I. Fraser, Black River P. O., Jefferson county, and credit him $2, (probably takes at Watertown, if so, transfer,) charge us. Send also to Silas Pierce, Rochester.

ESSAYS ON WAR.....NO. VIII.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"War introduces and propagates opinions and practices, as much against heaven as against earth; it lays our natures and manners as waste as our gardens and our habitations, and we can as easily preserve the beauty of the one as the integrity of the other, under the cursed jurisdiction of drums and trumpets."—LORD CLARENDON'S ESSAYS.

We laid down as a true position, in our last number, that war violates every command in the decalogue. We considered two precepts, and we now pass to others.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. War acknowledges no Sabbath. Battles are fought, marches continued, fortifications constructed, on the Sabbath as readily as on any other day of the week. It is the time in many parts of Europe for splendid reviews. We are aware that there have been soldiers who have regarded the Sabbath. Washington is said to have been in the habit of attending the nearest place of public worship, when encamped on the field. There have been some distinguished soldiers who have been men of religious habits. Such was Col. Gardiner, who was killed at Preston Pans. Such, probably, was the character of many of the soldiers and officers, (Fleetwood, Harrison, Goffe, Whalley, and, perhaps, Cromwell,) who bore a conspicuous part in the great English Revolution of 1640. Cromwell says, "that when he first went into engagement, he saw his men beaten on every side; but afterwards, when he had raised such men as had the fear of God before them, and made conscience of what they did, he was always successful against the enemy.*" But these are rare instances; and are to be regarded as exceptions to the general statement. But all who know any thing of history, must be aware that during wars, no respect whatever is paid to the Sabbath. The battle of Waterloo was fought on that sacred day. Indeed, where the war-spirit prevails, it is found to be almost impossible to preserve, in any degree of vigor, this mainspring of God's moral government over our world.

Thou shalt not commit adultery. It is a just remark of Dr. Doddridge, in respect to the military life, that "the temptations are so many, that it may seem no inconsiderable praise and felicity to be free from dissolute vice, and to retain what in other professions, might be regarded a mediocrity of virtue."† We propose now to give two facts in illustration of the present subject.—In 1380, some English troops, while wind-bound near Portsmouth, and waiting for provisions, forcibly carried off men's wives and daughters; and among other outrages, their commander went to a nunnery, and demanded admittance for his soldiers; and being refused, they entered by violence, compelled the nuns to go with them, and afterwards threw them into the sea! When an English man-of-war was accidentally sunk near Spithead, she carried down with her no less than six hundred lewd women; and amidst the fires of captured Magdeburg and Moscow, were heard the wild, despairing shrieks of ravished mothers and daughters. Such facts speak volumes; and we believe if all the impurities of war could be collected, we should say it was a Sodom.—Such a sight would astonish the most indifferent, and would, it appears to the writer, wake up every philanthropist on earth to see what could be done to stay the tide of licentiousness caused by war.

Thou shalt not steal. War, it has been well said, is a system of legalized national robbery; the very same thing, only on a larger scale, and under the sanction of government, for which individuals are sent to the prison or the gallows. To plunder, burn, and destroy is the soldier's professed business. "At Hamburg," says a writer, "40,- 000 persons were driven from their homes without clothes, money, or provisions, of which their enemies had despoiled them;" "Out of a plentiful harvest," says a Saxon nobleman, "not a grain is left. The little that remained was consumed in the night-fires, or was next morning, in spite of tears and entreaties, wantonly burned by the laughing fiends. Not a horse, not a cow, not a sheep is now to be seen." The French troops, on their return from Moscow, often destroyed every building for leagues together, and around Leipsic nothing was spared, neither the ox, nor the calf two days old, neither the ewe, nor the lamb scarcely able to walk, neither the brood-hen, nor the tender chicken. Whatever had life, was slaughtered, and even the meanest bedstead of the meanest beggar was carried off. Such is the horrid spirit which actuates men when in the employment of soldiers. Such a view led one of our best writers to remark, that "war is a temporary repeal of all the principles of virtue."

Thou shalt not kill. How completely does war trample on this command of Heaven; for it is the great business of war to slay, plunder and destroy. It has destroyed more lives than the slave-trade, than famine, pestilence, or any form of disease that ever swept the earth. Take a few instances:

At Eylau	50,000
At Borodino	80,000
At Arbela	300,000
By Julius Cæsar, in one engagement	400,000
By Xerxes, in the invasion of Greece	5,000,000
By Jengiskhan in Herat	1,760,000
By Alexander	3,000,000

Finally, Dick, in one of his works, has estimated that war has destroyed as many lives as would fill eighteen worlds like our own!!* Brenke says, that the world has been depopulated seventy times by war!! So we might go on, and show the manner in which the command on which we are now commenting, is violated; but we forbear, for there would be no end to our labor.

We conclude this number by observing that it is melancholy to reflect that in the present age; which boasts of its improvement in science, in civilization, and in religion, neither reason, nor benevolence, nor Christianity, has yet availed to arrest the progress of destroying armies, and to set a mark of ignominy on those "who delight in war."

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. II.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both." ACTS xxiii: 8.

From various passages in the New Testament, particularly the one which we have placed at the head of this article, it is evident that, at the time of the introduction of Christianity, those belonging to that sect of the Jews called Sadducees, denied that there was any resurrection; while the Pharisees, as probably also many of the non-professing multitude, admitted that there was. And most readers of the Bible seem not to be aware that the Pharisees and their adherents did not believe in the Christian resurrection. A few quotations, however, will, we think, be sufficient to convince any one that the resurrection held by the Pharisees, and by at least some of "the common people," was quite different from that taught by our Lord and his apostles. Thus in Luke ix: 19, it is related that upon his asking his disciples who "the people" said he was, they replied, "John the Baptist; but some say, Elias; and others say, that one of the old prophets is risen again." In the same chapter, verses 7 and 8, we are told that "Herod the tetrarch heard of all that was done by him: and he was perplexed, because that it was said of some, that John was risen from the dead; and of some, that Elias had appeared; and of others, that one of the old prophets was risen again." See, also, Matt. xiv: 1, 2, and Mark vi: 14, 16—from which we learn that Herod also said of Jesus, that he was John the Baptist who had risen, etc. Here it is easy to see that this supposed rising again, or rising from the dead, was believed to be to a state of mortality on the earth, which we presume no one now supposes to be the Christian doctrine of the resurrection from the dead.

Josephus tells us that the Pharisees of his time, believed that "the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies." See Jewish War, B. II, chap. viii, sec. 14. From whence it is clear that, in Josephus' day, the Pharisees' doctrine of the resurrection was equivalent, so far as it went, to the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. In our Saviour's day, however, it appears to have been thought, by some of the Jews, to have been at least possible that the soul of a bad man might pass into another body; and that in such case the soul would be punished in its new tabernacle with some bodily calamity or defect; as when Christ's disciples inquired of him respecting a blind man, John ix: 2, "Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?" as much as to ask whether he was born blind as a punishment to him for sins committed in a previous body, or as a punishment to his parents for their sins. See also 34th verse, same chapter, where we learn that the Pharisees, unable to refute this man's arguments in favor of Christ as one sent from God, seeing that he had bestowed on him the gift of sight, vented their spite against him not only by casting him out of the synagogue, but by reproaching him thus: "Thou wast altogether born in sins,* and dost thou teach us?" This case also throws some light respecting the opinion then prevalent as to the manner of such resurrections; since it was evidently supposed that the pre-existent soul of the blind man was born with him. But this passing of the soul before birth, though it was probably thought the most common period of its transmigration, was certainly not considered the only one. Thus when the people accounted for the teachings and miracles of Jesus, that in him was exemplified the resurrection of one of the old prophets, it is quite likely that they supposed that whose soul soever he possessed, it had inhabited his body from the first. But when it was said by some that John the Baptist, who was put to death but a few months before, had arisen from the dead, and was to be seen in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, it would seem that, whatever the Rabbins had, it was actually believed by some of "the people," and by Herod also, that the soul of a dead man could enter the body of an adult, and could either dispossess such soul of its habitation, or else hold it in complete subjection, so as to make the man, thereafter, to be, or to appear to be, not the individual he had been, but that one whose soul had taken possession of his body.†

So, also, when the Sadducees attempted to confound the Saviour, by demanding of him respecting a deceased woman whom they represented as having been seven times widowed, whose wife she should be in the resurrection, it appears to me that the supposed force of the objection embodied in their question, lay mainly in the * Critics of the more liberal stamp, say, that the phrase "born in sins," is a proverbial expression, and meant merely this, that the individual was very sinful. The connection, however, leads me to conclude, that the idea intended to be conveyed, is specifically this, that the sins of a former life were attached to him at his birth. But granting the expression to be proverbial, I would still suggest, for the consideration of the learned, whether the proverb did not originate from the notion, that sins committed in a previous body sometimes accompanied the infant into the world.

† Permit me here to suggest an idea which may be new. Was not the resurrection, as believed in by many of the Jews in our Saviour's day, closely allied, in some instances, to the doctrine then prevalent, of possession by unclean spirits?

ground assumed by them, that when the parties came to be raised, they would not only live in this world, and retain all their former attachments, but be of at least marriageable age from the first; in which case it might truly be difficult to decide to whom the woman of right belonged. If I am right in this, then it is probable from this passage, that some of the Jews actually believed as I suppose the Sadducees to have assumed that Christ did. But of this I am by no means tenacious.

It can scarcely be necessary to observe, much less to attempt proving, that neither our Lord nor his apostles either taught or countenanced such a resurrection, as being the final destiny of our race, or any part of them. But as we have spoken of Elias, it may be well to offer some few remarks tending to illustrate those passages which speak of his coming, especially as fulfilled in the person or the mission of John the Baptist.—From a promise recorded in the last two verses of the Old Testament, which let the reader consult, the Jews had imbibed the idea that Elijah (whose name is spelled Elias in Greek) would come upon earth, and “turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and” vice versa, before the advent of their expected Messiah, or Christ. Hence when the Baptist appeared, we are told, John i: 19–21, that “the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, ‘Who art thou?’” and that when he had “confessed ‘I am not the Christ,’” they asked him “what then? Art thou Elias?” and his reply was, “I am not.” And yet, according to Matthew, Mark and Luke, Jesus taught that John was Elias.

The apparent contradiction which these two statements present, will disappear if we duly consider two circumstances:

1. It was prophesied to Zacharias, respecting his son John, that he should go before the Lord “in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children,” etc., as it had been promised in Malachi, that “Elijah the prophet” should do. See Luke i: 17.

2. When we read of the priests and Levites going to ask John who he was, we are particularly informed that his questioners were Pharisees, who, as we have seen, held the doctrine of transmigration.

Hence, then, when John denied being Elias, he merely denied that the soul of Elijah the Tishbite inhabited his body. But when Jesus pronounced him to be Elias, he meant that he was so in the Scriptural sense, by manifesting the spirit and power of that prophet, as if it had been predicted that he should resemble Elias, in the moral qualities of his mind, the natural boldness of his manner, and the efficiency of his labors as a reformer. He was Elias in the sense intended in Malachi; but he was not Elias in the sense in which many of the Jews, and especially the Pharisees, then understood that prediction.—With this view of the subject, it is interesting to observe that the evangelist, when he tells of their questioning John, takes pains to add, what may have oftentimes been deemed a frivolous remark, “And they which were sent were of the Pharisees.” John i: 24. And how careful, also, was Jesus to qualify his declaration! “If ye will receive it,” said he, “this is Elias which was for to come.”—Matt. xi: 14.

TENDENCY OF RELIGIOUS ERROR.

The Rev. Joshua Marsden, a Partialist clergyman of some considerable talent, thus feelingly speaks, in his very interesting memoirs of himself, of the effects which despair, occasioned by false and erroneous views of our heavenly Father's character, produces upon the human mind. “Despair,” says Mr. Marsden, “is the most deplorable mental malady in the world. It fills the countenance with gloom, and the heart with corroding melancholy; it perverts the divine goodness; casts into shade all the precious promises, and draws a dark veil over the resplendent glories of redemption.

love. Few things tend more to harden the mind, and disparage scriptural piety, whose ways are pleasantness, and whose delightful paths abound with peace. Instead of beholding Deity as represented in his holy Word, the despairing sinner forms a gloomy picture from an image in his own desponding and uneasy mind! Not as the God of love, whose mercies are over all his works; who delighteth not in the death of a sinner; but an ideal monster, compounded of wrath, fury, malignity and cruelty; somewhat resembling the terrible Thor of our Saxon ancestors. My mother continued in this state for several months, wresting the Scriptures to her own misery, and desperately skilful in collecting every passage in the sacred book, against whomsoever levelled, and aiming them against her own breast. Hence our Lord's unpardonable sin, St. Paul's fearful falling away, St. John's sin unto death, were as fuel to the flame that burned within. Mercy appeared to be clean gone, and all light vanished, save what served to show the horror of her situation. I have known her to dash the Bible on the floor, and in an agony bordering upon phrenzy, exclaim, ‘I am lost, I am lost forever, lost! lost!’” To such a state of misery was this poor woman brought by a belief in the false and pernicious system of Partialism. And think, for one moment, too, of the distress of mind endured by Mr. Marsden himself, in view of his mother's deplorable condition. Says he, “No one can conceive the distress of mind I endured on her account. I well remember many of her words, for they were like sharp spears piercing my very heart. I would have given the whole universe to have calmed the agitations of her troubled breast. She spent whole nights in walking the house, wringing her hands, stamping with her feet, and frequently venting her emotions in language gloomy as misery itself, bitterly bewailing her hopeless state. Many times have I lain trembling, weeping, and sleepless, for hours, distressed beyond measure, on account of the melancholy and horrible state of my mother's mind. The impressions then made upon my imagination, will never be wholly erased.”

Such are the effects which a belief in the God-dishonoring, soul-harrassing system of Partialism produces upon the human mind. Such are the hopes, the joys and the consolations which it affords its believers. Oh, that the sons and daughters of our race would look upon God, and view him as he really is, the chief among ten thousands, and the one altogether lovely. Forsake. O ye children of error, the turbid and deadly streams of Partialism, and come and drink of the pure river of the water of life. Come, taste and see that the Lord is gracious.

PAUL A UNIVERSALIST, OUR ENEMIES THEMSELVES BEING JUDGES.

Riding on the Grand Erie canal, there happened to be in the cabin, a number of persons earnestly engaged in conversing on the Christian religion. In the course of the conversation, our attention was called to the fulmess of the redemption through Christ. One observed, that “in him dwelt all the fulness of the God-head bodily,” and “it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell.” “That is Paul's writing,” exclaimed a man of grey hairs—“that is not divine inspiration; for Paul was not divinely inspired.” “Why not, Sir?” “Because in principle he was a Universalist,” was the reply. Thus it was, that he rejected the counsel of God, that he might hold to the tradition of men. But grey hairs are honorable—and the judgment of the aged should be respected: and the old gentleman was right in this, that Paul was in principle a Universalist. Who can consistently conclude otherwise, after having cautiously examined his epistles? And now, kind reader, for this same reason—i. e., that the triumphant apostle to the Gentiles, was—I am a Universalist. What art thou? IRA W. FIELD

PROPHETIC EXPERIENCE.

The morning was clear and beautiful, and I had opened my eyes joyfully upon its first dim pencillings in the east, gazed with rapture, for a few moments, on the gracefully retiring shadows of night which had so lately mantled a thousand spirits with slumbering forgetfulness, and then sallied forth for a day's journey.—I had a destiny before me that day, which called me to the azure crowned eminence, though it seemed not to me irrevocable, and I therefore acted freely. I was rather the pleased and voluntary servant, than the child of necessity. In that destiny were concealed many a dark and fearful step, but I saw them not; and if I had seen, I should almost have ventured, for the sake of the bliss which beckoned me onward at the commencement. The air was fragrant with the balmy and untainted breath of the hills, and the mellow yet rapidly deepening tinge of light which spread itself over the sky, told that the successive and uninterrupted order of nature's laws, rather than the first burst of radiant power, which dawned upon the morning of time, was about to light up the earth in its accustomed glory.

But as yet, though the feathered tribes had begun their dance upon the slender boughs, they had not lifted their pretty voices, to rival the sun of his first thanksgivings in sight of a waking world. Even the lark had not yet tuned her matin lay to the God of nature; but there was a melody in the silence of that charmed hour, which compensated me for the lack of the songster's voice; and I could patiently travel on, entertained by all that I saw, until a new scene should burst upon me—until the golden sun beams, and the forest melody, should descend to earth in kindred fellowship, and go up to heaven together. These scenes and these anticipations, were precisely such as an innocent and inexperienced heart would expect, to make a heaven of his earthly pilgrimage. Brightness and peace were around me, and I enjoyed them as if in sympathy with every thing I saw. No shadow of doubt had as yet crossed my path, and I knew not what it was. Indeed, I was happy. As if youthfulness had not yet thrown off its shield of intuitive confidence, I thought of nothing but the prospect immediately before me, nor dreamed that it was possible for a day so brilliantly begun, to harbor on its bosom dark reverses and fearful threatenings.

My way was to be, for a short distance, along a broad and beautiful valley bounded on each side by a range of mountains whose brows, through the distance, seemed to smile upon the brook which rippled almost noiselessly at my feet; and then my duty led me up the mountain path to its summit on the east. This short distance was accomplished unconsciously, and I passed the road unheeded, which should have taken me from the quiet seclusion of the valley, to the rugged mountain scenery. But then I had not, I thought, seen enough of the vale and the streamlet, and enjoyed enough of the quiet and the solitude—I mean the solitude of the happy heart which is constantly drinking in new pleasures, without time to greet the passer by with other than a joyful smile—to wish for a change of pursuits. Emulation would have pointed to the rough and toilsome way up to the lofty eminence, but curiosity whispered that I had many wonders yet to see ere I reached the side path, and I passed, without observing it. Ambition said that the base of Wisdom's temple might be yet above the secret pavilion of the clouds, but Pleasure suggested that I could journey easier over the plain, than up the rocky way. Indeed, how could I leave my deep and quiet pathway? Every step that I took opened new scenes before me, and added to my profession, new hopes and brighter anticipations; and every countenance which I met, seemed to wear the same smile of joy and contentment which I expected would ever gild my own. I confess that occasionally, amid the evidences of self-contentment that I saw, I discovered an eye turned upon me with an anxiety that seemed to say, "Young man, thy hopes are too high to be realized;" and the expression of the lip was, that experience might be more profitable than maxims. But the sun rose from behind his craggy shield, and sent his scorching glance over mountain and glen, forest and lake, and I forgot the warning of the eye. The birds sang gaily from their woody bowers, and I forgot the expression of the lip. I thought that those I met were happy, and I knew that I was too.

Thus passed hours away. Thus I wandered slowly and carelessly along, regardless of all but the rapture which dwelt upon each passing moment, until I caught a glance at my shadow pointing to the sun above me, careering in his mid-day splendor. I had hitherto thought nothing of my progress unless it was to wonder what I should do if I reached the end of my journey too soon; or of my purpose in journeying, unless it was to wonder why any purpose was needed; but now as I gazed upon the king of day, I began to think I had other duties to perform besides that of dreaming away my time, in vain imaginings that the sunlight would ever be as bright and unclouded, the flowers as fragrant, and the streamlet as clear as now. I must leave these enjoyments for others in a loftier range of action and of thought. The sun had already measured his pathway up to the zenith chamber, and now seemed to be rejoicing in the intensity of his rays, that he had attained the summit of his power, but my journey—I had but just begun it! I had yet to climb the summit of the mountain brow, from whence I could look down upon the gathering shadows of the valley below, while the light of the sun shined around me, and I could view the smile of his parting rays—else wo would betide me.

Such was my condition and such the thoughts that now hurried my footsteps as I turned towards the foot of the mountain. Although its scenery had now lost the few charms which were at first presented to my view, yet I hastened toward it the more eagerly because the scenes which I now left, seemed like enticements calculated to cheat me into an abandonment of my new pursuit. I felt, too, a conviction of guilt which I had never felt before. I had never run the giddy maze of pleasure so far till now, and in this instance I shunned the more laborious path, and forgot that "the night cometh when no man can work." But I suffered keenly for my neglect, and was doomed to suffer still more. I learned, also, to expect what I was now receiving, the certain punishments of my acts. I found, too, that after having indulged in the luxury of ease, and of quiet and dazzling pleasures, I was not prepared to enjoy the sterner scenery which I must surmount ere I could rest from my journey, and had but little strength to meet the struggles before me. Still the decree that impelled me onward could not be loosed, and I toiled up the mountain ascent with slow motion and a heavy heart.

At length, having progressed far enough to afford a considerable prospect of the route I had traversed, I paused and turned around to enjoy a moment's relief in contemplating the flowery pathway I had left. While gazing upon the extended valley—retracing my footsteps to where I first bounded forth to inhale the fresh morning breeze, and wondering why a route which afforded so much pleasure at first, should subject me to such inconvenience when prolonged beyond the prescribed limits—I cast my eyes toward the western horizon, and beheld a small, yet dark and threatening cloud, which seemed like some dreaded storm-prophet, just advancing from his secret hiding place that he might warn man to prepare for a trial of strength. My heart sickened within me! I looked upward and saw many a weary step yet to be accomplished ere I could find shelter. I looked down, and a gloom crept over me like the gathering gloom on the valley beneath me. I looked toward the cloud, but its mantling blackness hung not stationary over the hill top; it spread with a rapidity which told how soon I must encounter the fury of the storm. O, what would I have given—I who had never dreamed of future struggles, who had never thought till then, that I should see ought but a clear sky above me—what would I have given that moment for some friendly shelter where I could rest free from the painful anticipations which distracted me. I was approaching one, but I saw it not, and my murmurings satisfied me not. I felt that I must run the race set before me, and my impatient heart urged me faster than my weary feet could carry me. Onward I ran, and on came the storm; deeper grew the agitation of my mind, and deeper the shadow beneath, and broader the storm-cloud above me. The thunder-boom awoke the long slumbering echo of the mountain sides, and the lightning poured its liquid light around me. The waters of mid-air were loosed from their duraged, and came down to earth in torrents, the brooks received the tribute of the clouds and filled their banks, and then rushed down the jagged precipices with the deep, harsh muttering of the angry elements.

Notwithstanding the buffetings of the storm I reached the summit of the mountain. I was near the end of my journey, and of my present troubles. I saw before me an aged man bidding defiance to the storm with a calmness and an energy which showed that he had encountered such scenes before. He approached me, and with kind words soothed my feelings, and bade me trust in him who "hath his way in the whirlwind," and who "measures the waters in the hollow of his hand." His words encouraged me, and though the storm still raged in all its fury, I felt that it could not drown the voice of friendship. Following, therefore, my kind guide, I was conducted to the entrance of what appeared to be a large and substantial mansion. Pointing to the open gateway, my guide invited me to enter, and exclaimed as I did so, "There shall be a tabernacle, for a shadow in the day time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain."

I had now an opportunity of observing the war of elements without, myself freed from their pitiless ragings. I had time now to think of those, who were struggling hard, as I recently did, against fearful obstacles, and looking anxiously yet in vain for some friendly shelter. And had I known that there were such, I would gladly have gone forth for them as my guide did for me. But I knew that mine was an uninstructed sympathy, and I watched for the waning of the storm. But the appearance without was fearful. It seemed that the powers of the air had assembled in independent warfare, and now waged battle with the unconscious productions of nature. Fierce and fiercer came the sweeping winds—nearer and heavier seemed the thunder-flash—brighter and swifter went the lightning-gleam—and as the contending elements blended together as if for one final effort, an aged oak which had stood many a time before the storm in unbending defiance, now bowed beneath the stream of united vengeance which was poured upon it, and fell prostrate upon the earth; shivered and torn into a thousand fragments.

The storm was hushed. Its strength had been exerted in the destruction of one of the last and oldest children of the forest. Nature's battle sons, as if ashamed of the wantonness they committed, retired to their silent and inaccessible retreats. The old gentleman I have mentioned, now took me by the hand and led me to where I had a commanding view of the prospect around me. Still holding me by one hand, and pointing with the other to the west, his countenance seemed to light up with a holy enthusiasm, that assured me he had some important message to communicate. I looked toward where he pointed, and the setting sun burst forth from the retiring mass of clouds, and smiled the assurance to earth that her discord could not impede his progress, or her storms extinguish his rays.

"Young man," said my guide, "in this day's events read the history of human life. Study it, and never forget it. And above all remember perseverance.—Tarry not in all the plain, but fly to that mountain which was once a small stone cut out without hands; and if you do so, though you may meet with sorrow, the sunset of your existence shall be as bright and as beautiful, and as triumphant as yonder parting rays."

HOW TO GAIN RESPECT.

The corrupting influence of some wily opposers of the restitution, aided by the evil examples of popularity seekers, has made shipwreck of the honesty of not a few young persons of both sexes on their first entrance into life—especially if that entrance has been made in a strange place, where the doctrine of Universalism has but few open advocates, compared with the mass of opposers. The desire to please our friends—to succeed in business—to win the approbation of those with whom we principally associate—and an innate modesty, amounting almost to bashfulness, which leads us to shrink from standing forth prominently in opposition to the reputedly great or learned; or to the multitude around us—all these feelings are very strong in the bosoms of the young and the amiable, and especially of young females. Their unsuspecting minds, unused to look deeply into events passing around them, are too often persuaded to judge according to appearances, and are thus induced to remain silent on religious subjects—to seemingly acquiesce in the decisions of those around them—to follow the multitude—and to believe that the tokens of respect won by doing so are sincere—and that the older hypocrites whom they see basking in the popular favor, are really esteemed and favored by those who smile on, and encourage their dishonesty in religion.

Who has not witnessed such deliriums from an honest profession of an unpopular creed—especially in large villages or cities—and more especially still, in young ladies, when sent abroad to a popular boarding-school or female Academy? I will not stop formally to refute the errors of judgment which have thus led them to grasp at a shadow, and lose the substance—nor occupy time in proving by strict arguments, or numerous facts, the tendency and final result of this weakness (to give it no harsher name), on the part of our young friends. But by a supposed dialogue, founded on and embracing a real occurrence which occurred some time since, in a city in this State, I will endeavor to correct their erroneous judgment—show the hollowness of the apparent respect which their conduct gains for them, and exhibit in contrast with it, the really solid and valuable esteem which a more decided and honest course would certainly win for them from friends and opposers.

B. Ah, Miss Sarah, I am glad to see you! When did you arrive in town?

SARAH. I have been here nearly two months.

B. Two months! why, I never saw you at our meetings till to-day—where did you sit?

S. I—I—that is—I did not attend Universalist meetings. I boarded with Mrs. Partialist, and she seemed so much opposed to my attending Universalist meetings, and urged me so hard to go with her and her daughters to her meetings, that I went there altogether.

B. How comes it, then, that I find you here at our meeting to-day? Has Mrs. P. softened any in her prejudices—or what change has occurred to change your usual course?

S. A great change. Sir—not in my hostess, but in me—and if you have leisure to hear me relate a simple statement of facts, I will tell you all about it.

B. Proceed—I shall listen with much pleasure.

S. Well, Sir, the facts are these—I came here to attend school in the Female Seminary. I found the teachers, and a goodly proportion of the scholars, Par-tialists in their religious faith, and it was not long before it was intimated to me, that if I wished to be treated with favor and respect by either teachers or pupils, I must not avow myself a Universalist.

B. But I thought the Seminary was not conducted on sectarian principles!

S. Nor is it intended to be, by its trustees, nor by its Principal—but, Sir, there are ways of making known disrespect and disapprobation by looks and hints which may be felt, but can not be so described as to form specific charges. However—even of these, I have no complaints to make on my own account. But the intimation to keep my religious opinions hidden, came from the scholars, and especially from the few whose parents are Universalists but who judged it good policy to act, while in the school, as they counselled me to act. Their advice was backed by the conduct and remarks of my relative, Mrs. P., who assured me, that however numerous and respectable the Universalists were where I lived, here they were but a mere, insignificant handful of the community, and that, excepting her husband and one or two more, there was not a respectable man among them, and as for females—she filled out her meaning by some very significant shrugs and looks indicative of the greatest contempt and disgust.

B. But, my young friend, you surely did not believe this almost wholesale slander?

S. Not to the full extent—but still, when I saw my Universalist schoolmates, with scarcely an exception, going to the Partialist churches, and saw them and myself graciously smiled on by our opposers; and then thought of the frowns and contempt I must meet from all around me, if I stemmed this popular current, my heart failed within me.

B. Did your conscience fail also?

S. No—conscience did its duty, but I did not do mine. I wanted the favor of some of those around me, and I had no hopes of obtaining even that of my Universalist schoolmates, if I did my duty—how, then, could I hope to gain the confidence of my teachers, and of the majority of my fellow-students, who were opposed to my faith?

B. Poor girl—you were sorely tempted, and I pity you from my soul—the more, too, as, it seems, you yielded yourself a prey to the tempter! But what released you from your bondage?

S. Alas, Sir, I fear it was a motive which, when analyzed, will give me but little credit for breaking away from my disgraceful hypocrisy and tacit denial of my faith!

B. Nevertheless, let me hear it, for I am very deeply interested in your story. I promise, also, to be very lenient, so far as my judgment goes.

S. More lenient, I doubt not, than my conscience ever will be. Know, then, that I was released by finding that “the hope of the hypocrite is as a spider’s web”—that all the supposed smiles I received for the concealment of my faith, were as deceitful as my own conduct—that all the apparent respect which I thus gained, was as hollow as my own hypocrisy—that, in short, if I wished others to respect me, I must respect myself, by being honest—especially in that most important of all duties, religion.

B. I am delighted that you made that discovery—a discovery so seldom clearly made and fully realized by our popularity seekers, though even they declare with their lips, that “honesty is the best policy.” But how came you to make the discovery?

S. By the moral courage of a noble minded and resolute girl, who would not be a hypocrite.—At the risk of being tedious, I will relate the whole story. Mary Erskine, like myself, is the daughter of Universalist parents, who sent her here for instruction in the Seminary. As she boarded with a Universalist family, she attended with them, at your meetings, and became a teacher in your Sunday school and a pupil in your Bible class.—Disregarding all the hints of cool looks, she remained open in her profession of Universalism by her actions:

but obtruded her sentiments on none. One day, however, one of the under teachers deemed it her duty to remark on the sincerity of some religious denominations, and the merits of their systems of faith. When she named Universalists, it was with expressions of the utmost contempt. They could not even claim to be sincere, for their tenets were too absurd to be believed by any one—and too demoralizing to be allowed with safety in community, inasmuch as they allowed that there was no punishment for sin, nothing to restrain the wicked and depraved, etc., etc. The eyes of the whole class were fixed, with mingling exultation, contempt and pity upon poor Mary, whose indignation was only equalled by her astonishment, at hearing herself, her parents and best friends branded as hypocrites, and her faith slandered by wholesale! But quietly suppressing her feelings, she mildly and modestly assured the teacher that she labored under mistakes—that she (Mary) and her parents honestly and sincerely believed Universalism—that Universalists held, in the language of Scripture, that “though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished”—that “God will by no means clear the guilty,” but “will reward every man according to his works”—with many other passages equally to the purpose; for Mary is well acquainted with the Bible, and its clear teachings flowed freely from her lips. The teacher astonished at such a positive and certain punishment for sin, attempted to correct the noble girl, by telling her that on faith and repentance punishment would be forgiven; but Mary knew better the teachings of Holy Writ, and poured forth text after text into the ears of the excited teacher, assuring her that punishment for sin would not be forgiven, but sin only. Unwilling to be beaten thus by her own pupil, yet unable to cope with her in argument, Mary was “left alone in her glory,” while the irritated teacher and the class concealed their defeat as best they could, by whispering apart, and sneering at the victor. The crisis had come. Many of us felt that Mary must quit the school, or henceforward be a solitary in it. But we knew not the power of self respect in winning the respect of others.

Mary on her return to her boarding house, related what had happened, and her friends addressed a polite note to the Principal, stating that they supposed the school to be free from sectarian influence, and then related what had occurred, pointing out the mistakes of the teacher, and offering the use of books, etc., to enlighten her on the subject. This letter was accompanied by a copy of the Universalist Profession of Faith, and some papers on the subject. It was answered by an equally polite and respectful letter from the Principal, declaring the school not sectarian in character, apologizing for what had occurred, with many expressions of regret, and a promise that it should never occur again.

This, one would suppose, was glory enough for one time—but Mary’s reward was not yet full. The teacher who had offended, with a magnanimity and honesty worthy of all commendation, voluntarily made an apology to Mary, before the whole class—declared herself ignorant of the sentiments of Universalists, and mistaken and wrong in what she had said of them and their faith—commended the moral courage, unshaken honesty, and mild firmness evinced by her in defence of her faith and her friends when thus assailed, and concluded by saying that henceforth Mary might be certain of the increased esteem and respect of her teachers, for she had proved herself worthy of them.

Oh, Mr. B., you can not imagine the deeply piercing daggers of reproach that were carried to my heart by every word the teacher uttered! Mary had shown moral courage—had I? Mary had exhibited unshaken honesty—had I? Mary had been mildly firm in defending her traduced friends and faith—had I? Mary might be certain of the increased respect and esteem of even opposers—could I be certain of them? No—no—for while Mary had proved herself worthy of the respect of opposers, I had proved myself, by all my actions, unworthy of respect from friends or foes; for I had not even respected myself!! I dared not look up—for some of the class knew that I, as well as Mary, was a Universalist—and they knew, also, that I denied my Lord, as did Peter, and betrayed him, as did Judas.—And I thought the teacher must know it, too, and if so, I was sure she could not respect me—for I had not respected myself.

But to make a long story short—from that day to this, Mary has been treated with marked respect and kindness in the Seminary; and most especially by the excellent and right-hearted teacher who had condemned her and her faith—and from that hour, I resolved to respect myself; not alone, believe me, Sir, that I might gain the respect of others, but that I might be able to look honest people in the face, and to abide the voice of my own conscience. And I now say, if any one wishes to gain the respect of the world, let them deserve it, by respecting themselves.

POETRY.

"VIA CRUCIS VIA LUCIS."

The following expressive poetry appeared originally in the New-York American, under the above heading, as a translation from the German, with the following German verse as a motto. The reader will see the doctrine of progression in God's moral government, and the consequent triumph of goodness over evil, beautifully taught in the verses.

A. B. G.

"Durch nacht zum licht!
Und wenn das grause Dunkel
Hoch rings um dick die schöpfung huetlt, Getrost! Getrost!
Auf mitternachtig Dunkel
Folgt sonnen Aufgang lieb und mild."

Through Night to Day!
And when the solemn fold
Of darkness wraps creation all;
Trust on! Trust on!
For sunrise bright and bold
Shall break and burst the midnight pall.

Through Death to Life!
Aye, through this vale of tears
The thorny path of being hurled,
High, high above,
We reach Heaven's wedding feast,
The joy, the gladness of a better world!

Through Storm to Calm!
And when through earth and sky
The wind-god drives his thundering wheel,
Trust on! Trust on!
For sweet and gentle calm
Shall o'er the wildest tempest steal!

Through Frost to Spring!
And when the northern blast
Shall freeze the very marrow of the earth,
Trust on! Trust on!
For through the ice-bound sod
Spring's breezes give sweet flowers birth.

Through War to Peace!
And when mid bristling spears
A thousand deaths beset thee near,
Trust on! Trust on!
For close on slaughter's din
Flow songs of peace and freedom's cheer.

Through Sweat to Sleep!
And when the mid-day sun
Wears thee and wastes with sultry heat,
Trust on! Trust on!
Soon blows the evening wind
To rock and soothe thy slumber sweet.

Through Cross to Cure!
And when the ills of life
Like demons haunt thy weary bed,
Trust on! Trust on!
Soon shall, mid direst griefs,
The peace of God be o'er thee spread.

Through Wo to Joy!
Weep'st thou at morning tide?
And still to tears at midnight giv'n?
Trust on! Trust on!
Trust to thy Father's care,
Who keepeth constant watch in Heav'n!

THE FUNERAL OF A MOTH:
A CHILD'S VISION.

BY MRS. SEBA SMITH.

A little child had been amusing itself at the feet of its mother, kicking and rolling about, and playing all sorts of antics, when it espied a moth disengage itself from the fibres of the carpet, and poise its small wing with a short, wavering flight. The child stopped its noisy song, rolled over upon all fours, and commenced a scramble for the poor insect, slapping its clumsy hand upon the carpet in the hope of striking it down. It did so at last—the moth fell upon its side, quivered slightly, and was still.

The child would have taken it in his hand, but suddenly there was a sound as of innumerable tiny bells tolling, and very low, sad music. He laid his cheek upon his arm, the bright curls falling all about the carpet, and his little feet stretched out, and crossed one over the other, the disarranged tunic revealing, liberally, his round white limbs, indolently exposed. Thus, the child lay, listening to the music, that seemed to say—

"Alas, for death is amongst us."

It could not tell what was meant, but it saw that the beautiful moth stirred not, and it felt something very sad must have happened. At length a large black beetle was seen to move slowly along, and look at the little insect, and then, while the eyes of the child were fixed intently to see what would come of it, the beetle seemed a little small old woman, much wrinkled, and dressed in black. She moved about quite briskly, and the child could scarce forbear a smile to see such an alert, diminutive thing. His mother's little gold thimble had fallen from her basket, and now stood upon the carpet beside the dead moth, and the child observed that the little woman in black was not as tall as the thimble.—She took a robe, made of the fibres of a rose-leaf, from her pocket, and shrouded the moth, singing all the time,

"Alas! for the gladsome wing
Shall never more be spread—
When cheerful voices ring,
They may not wake the dead."

Then a grasshopper came in with a slow, sepulchral tread, bearing upon his thigh the severed pericarp of the balsam, (Impatiens,) lined with gossamer, and having tassels hanging from the pall. He had no sooner approached the dead moth, than he appeared a grave and venerable undertaker, bearing the coffin, into which he and the little old woman put the poor insect, and covered it with the pall of gossamer, singing, all the time, in a sweet, sad voice.

Then an immense procession of moths, (they were of that kind called death's head, undoubtedly a class designed to officiate exclusively at funerals,) followed the undertaker as he bore out the body—but as they moved on, they were little men and women, dressed in drab, each with a sad, pale face, and now and then one of the younger, with a handkerchief pressed to the eyes; while all sang in chorus the following words—

"Rest thee, rest thee, blighted one,
Sunshine may not come to thee;
When our joyous wings are spread,
Thine in death shall folded be.
Rest thee; sad and early call'd
From our pleasant haunts away,
Where we meet in sunset revels
At the close of summer day."

The child heard the hum of their voices when he had ceased to distinguish the words. Then he arose, and laying his head upon his mother's lap, wept bitterly, telling her what he had heard and seen, and asking what DEATH meant. She talked long upon the sad but pleasant subject, telling of that land where death is not, till the heart of the little child grew joyous within him, and he called that land his home. Had the child been less young, or less innocent, the visions of the moth's funeral had not been vouchsafed. But he never, from that time, wantonly destroyed the humblest creature made by the wisdom, the goodness, and love of our heavenly Father. He saw there was room enough in the great world, and in the pleasant sunshine, for him and them; and he remembered that a better land had been promised to man only; therefore he would not abridge the few days of happiness granted the little insect. The child daily grew gentle and loving, for the exercise of kindness, even in one simple instance, had fixed the principle in his young heart, till it expanded so that it embraced all the creatures made by our great and good Parent. It was thus that he learned, not only to love worthily the good and loving, but even those in whom the image of God, stamped upon the human soul, had become marred and effaced by sin. He loved, and prayed even for these, and the blessedness of such prayers returned upon his own head. Thus did the child learn a lesson of wisdom, and of goodness, from the funeral of the Moth.

THE WIDOW.

It was a cold and bleak evening in a most severe winter. The snow was driven by the furious north wind. Few dared or were willing to venture abroad. It was a night which the poor will not soon forget.

In a most miserable and shattered tenement, somewhat remote from any other habitation, there then resided an aged widow, all alone, and yet not alone.

During the weary day, in her excessive weakness, she had been unable to step beyond her door stone, or to communicate her wants to any friend. Her last morsel of bread had been long since consumed, and none heeded her destitution. She sat at evening, by her small fire, half famished with hunger—from exhaustion unable to sleep—preparing to meet the dreadful fate from which she knew not how she should be spared.

She prayed that morning, "Give me this day my daily bread," but the shadows of evening had descended upon her, and her prayer had not been answered.

While such thoughts were passing through her weary mind, she heard the door suddenly open and shut again, and found deposited in her entry, by an unknown hand, a basket crowded with all those articles of comfortable food which had the sweetness of manna to her.

What were her feelings on that night, God only knows! but they were such as rise up to Him—the Great Deliverer and Provider—from ten thousand hearts every day.

Many days elapsed before the widow learnt through what messenger God had sent that timely aid. It was at the impulse of a little child, who on that dismal night, seated at the cheerful fireside of her home, was led to express the generous wish that that poor widow whom she had sometimes visited, could share some of her numerous comforts and cheer. Her parents followed out the benevolent suggestion; and a servant was dispatched to her mean abode, with a plentiful supply.

What a beautiful glimpse of the chain of causes, all fastened at the throne of God! An angel, with noiseless wing, came down, stirred the peaceful breast of a child, and with no pomp or circumstances of the outward miracle, the widow's prayer was answered.—Watchtower.

DEATHS.

In Léray, October 27th, Mrs. MARY WALLEN, aged 59 years. She was a member of the Universalist church in Watertown, and died in full faith.

In Rutland, December 6th, Mr. MILO LESTER, aged 47 years. This Br. died of consumption. He knew full well that he must die soon, and made all the necessary preparations for his funeral. Death to him was only "the gate to endless joy," and he passed through its portals without a murmur. His funeral was attended at the Presbyterian church in Rutland, on the 8th, and a large multitude addressed by the writer.

In Lima, Washtenaw county, Mich., September 18th, ABIGAIL, consort of Mr. Rodney Ackley, in the 39th year of her age. She died as she had lived, in the faith of God's universal grace, and faith and hope brightened the prospect of the approaching change. She lived respected and died lamented, leaving a husband and seven children to lament her departure, but, blessed be God, they enjoy the consolations of the Gospel. At her special request, though absent from the State at the time of her decease, the writer delivered a discourse to the afflicted family, October 14th, from 1 Thess. iv: 18.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. I.—Right views of the Marriage State.

"Life is but a day at most,
Sprung from night, in darkness lost;
Hope not sunshine ev'ry hour,
Fear not clouds will always lower."

The young wife, in entering the marriage state, has materially changed her circumstances for life. She has left the paternal roof—the counsels and admonitions of a kind father—the oft-repeated precepts and the gentle restraints of an affectionate mother—and commenced walking in a path, which is, to her, new and all unknown. She has thus arrived at the second of the three great eras in life—birth being the first, and death the last. Marriage is a momentous period in the existence of woman. It is full of interest, and fraught with the most important consequences. In looking back, faithful memory will enable her to trace her way through childhood and youth, amid scenes bright with the rosy smiles of innocence, and filled with the gaiety and joyousness so suitable to young hearts. The retrospection may bring tears of pleasing melancholy into her eyes, and cause her to exclaim in the poet's language—

"I leave thee, father!—eve's bright moon
Must now light other feet,
With gathered grapes, and the lyre in tune,
Thy homeward steps to greet!
Thou in whose voice, to bless thy child,
Lay tones of love so deep,
Whose eye o'er all my youth hath smiled—
I leave thee!—let me weep!

Mother! I leave thee!—on thy breast
Pouring out joy and wo,
I have found that holy place of rest
Still changeless—yet I go!
Lips that have lull'd me with your strain,
Eyes that have watch'd my sleep!
Will earth give love like yours again?
Sweet mother, let me weep!"

In looking forward, other and different scenes open before her. New circumstances, new relationships, new duties, obligations and responsibilities, present themselves to her consideration, and direct her thoughts more intensely into the dim haze of an untried future. In thus looking forward, with the mind filled with fond hopes and high expectations, the youthful imagination delights to paint the coming years of life with bright scenes of unalloyed enjoyment—and to picture matrimony as "A pleasing land * * * *

Of dreams that wave before the half shut eye,
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
Forever flushing round a summer sky."

But it is seldom that the imagination represents the future in its true colors. It is so disposed to paint approaching events as the heart desires them to be, that its pictures have not a sufficiency of that shading, which is necessary to make them true representations of actual life. Hence in looking to the future, the young wife should not allow her imagination solely to guide her thoughts—for when unrestrained, it will lead her to cherish anticipations and hopes which can never be fulfilled. Whether the marriage state shall prove to her a condition of peaceful satisfaction, or whether it shall be a series of melancholy disappointments, depends to some small extent, at least, upon the views and anticipations which she entertains on entering that state. I would not throw a gloomy cloud over the bright visions which are cherished by youth at the happy period of marriage—I would not fill their minds at this pleasant season, with doubts and fears respecting the enjoyments of after life. This would be unnecessary and improper. If they have been united under judicious circumstances, and with just views of their marriage obligations, they may reasonably anticipate, under the blessings of Providence, much enjoyment and felicity. But still I would have them restrain their anticipations within reasonable limits and not allow them to soar so high, and become so mingled with airy fictions, as to make the reality, when it does arrive, appear insipid and worthless! This would be throwing away a good substance for an empty shadow. And this is the very danger to be apprehended. To hear some young ladies converse on the subject of matrimony, one would suppose they viewed it as a state of uninterrupted felicity!—with no clouds to intercept its sunshine, and no storms to interrupt its serenity. But whoever cherishes such anticipations, must be disappointed. And the disappointment will be greater or less, in proportion to the power which these delusive fancies may exercise over the mind. It should never be forgotten by mortals, that we now exist in a state of imperfection, and hence it is unreasonable to anticipate that any thing connected with our enjoyments can be entirely perfect. Due allowance must be made in all things, for those frailties to which our race is subjected; for these frailties must and will exhibit themselves in much of the conduct of men.

If the young wife anticipates that her duties will all be of an interesting and pleasing nature, and that she can easily and readily discharge them, she greatly mistakes. If she believes that she will meet with but few, if any, trials, crosses or disappointments, she is flattering herself with a delusion. If she supposes that her husband will exhibit no failings in his disposition, his habits or his conduct, she is laboring under an error that time will painfully make manifest—for she has not married an angel, but a mortal, subject to the imperfections of his race. It is in view of considerations like these, that we perceive the importance of striving to obtain in advance, some adequate conceptions of the peculiarities of the marriage state.

Matrimonial life is one of alternate light and shade. While it necessarily increases our cares and responsibilities, it as certainly increases our enjoyments to a much greater extent—provided always, that congenial spirits are united, and that each party is governed by proper motives. But the burthens of the wife are light, at the heaviest, when a kind husband studies to ease them as far as possible, and all her joys are doubled, when participated by one who is the object of her heart's warm affections. This is the peculiar advantage of married life—when cares come they are divided, but when pleasure smiles, it sheds a two-fold satisfaction into the soul—a personal satisfaction, and the satisfaction of seeing those we love, happy also. What wife, what husband, has not experienced the delightful felicity of communicating to their companion, a knowledge of any circumstance which is of an interesting and pleasing character?—a felicity which they could not experience in communicating the same knowledge to an individual in whose welfare they had no particular interest. But in single life, these things are very different indeed.—There, all cares and perplexities must be borne single-handed, with none to enter into that deep sympathy which is so grateful to the anxious soul.

There is no one thing upon which the happiness of married life so much depends, as the manner in which the wife shall discharge the many important duties which devolve upon her. Too many young ladies, it is to be apprehended, commence their matrimonial career, with but a very imperfect conception of this fact. They do not seem to realize that to their control, and care, and management, and discretion, must be entrusted many things, upon which the comfort, the peace and prosperity of the family will greatly depend—they do not seem to realize that it will be necessary to tax their skill, judgment, good sense and patience, to cause the household affairs to move on in that quiet and harmonious manner, so requisite to domestic enjoyment. The young wife may not fall into those gross mistakes in regard to her duties, which have sometimes destroyed the peace of families; but there is especial danger of it, if she goes forward without taking any pains to acquaint herself to some extent, at least, with the peculiarities of her station. Experience, it is true, is the best teacher upon these subjects; but still much may be done by forethought and reflection, in the way of preparation, so that the lessons of experience may not be so dearly paid for, as they often are.

These subjects should frequently become the theme of meditation with all those ladies who have recently commenced wedded life, and with those also, who anticipate soon to make this important change in their circumstances. They should endeavor to throw aside the romantic view which the young are so prone to take of marriage, and look upon it, as they ought, as one of the most important and momentous steps in life, and one which is altogether the most intimately connected with their happiness in this world. Marriage is not a light and laughable subject, but one of great magnitude; and they should so view it. They should strive to realize all the important changes which it will produce in their circumstances, their station, their duties and obligations. They should understand that it elevates them to a station much more important than a single person can occupy—and that the additional importance thus given to them, is accompanied not only by the increased peace and happiness which is the fruit of mutual love, but also by a new class of occupations and responsibilities. The wife is called upon by every honorable incentive, to reflect maturely upon her duties towards him who has selected her from the rest of the world, to be his companion in youth and in age, in weal and in woe, in prosperity and in adversity—to be his adviser in perplexities, his consoler in sorrow, his comforter in sickness, the confidant of all his thoughts, and the repository of his most cherished affections.—She should strive to understand perfectly, her obligations as the head and director of the domestic affairs of the family, and as a mother, to whom must be entrusted, to a great extent, the care of those young and plastic minds, which will carry through life, the deep impressions of early days. She should also study her obligations as a neighbor, as a member of the community, and a Christian—for these are all modified in passing from single to married life. In fine, it behooves the young wife to realize that in taking upon herself the marriage relations, her being, her happiness, her destiny for life, become merged, as it were, in that of others—her husband and her offspring. She should remember that she can no longer with propriety act solely in reference to self—that all personal and selfish considerations, must be banished from the soul, and every action, every wish, and, if possible, every thought, should have reference, not only to her own happiness, but to the interests, the enjoyments, the general good, of all those connected with her by the most intimate ties of our nature. The woman who thus seriously scrutinizes the path she is about to tread—who strives to foresee and understand, and be prepared for, the complicated duties of married life, is wise, and considerate, and worthy of one of the best husbands. She will prove a loving, faithful, and trustworthy wife, a prudent, discreet and kind mother, an obliging neighbor, and a good Christian. And most assuredly, she will prove a blessing to her husband and her family, a valuable member of community, and an ornament to her sex.

JOHN V: 28, 29.

BY DR. H. R. SCHETTERLY.

In contemplating this passage, several questions present themselves to the inquiring mind. First, out of what "graves" shall the persons spoken of come forth? Second, unto what "resurrection" shall they come forth? Third, what is the "life" to be enjoyed after the resurrection mentioned?

First. The original word translated graves is not the same, in this passage, as that which stands for graves from which the dead shall be raised in the general resurrection, when the grave ("hades," the state of the dead) itself shall be destroyed, (1 Cor. xv: 55); but it is "tois mneemiois," the graves dug into the earth. Josephus informs us, (War, Bk. 6, chap. 9, sec. 4, and in other places,) that many of the Jews had made graves for themselves in the city of Jerusalem, and were brought forth to be slain and led captive at the destruction. Paul also speaks of those who wandered in mountains, in deserts, in dens, and in caves of the earth, in his time, (Heb. xi: 38;) and the prophets, speaking of the destruction of the Jewish Theocracy, say, (Isa. ii: 19, and Ezek. xxxiii: 27,) "They shall go into the holes of the rocks and into the caves of the earth, for the fear of the Lord"—"And they that be in the forts and in the caves, shall die of pestilence."—When it is remembered that about three millions of the Jews were assembled in Jerusalem, at the passover, when the Roman army surrounded the city, (Josephus 2, 14, 3, note, and 6, 9, 3, and note,) the necessity of making graves to retire into, will be apparent—Christ commanded his followers not to flee (Matt. xxiv: 15-18 till they saw the abomination of desolation spoken of by the prophet, (Dan. ix: 27,) which did not take place till near the close of the siege, (Josephus 6, 2, 1,) and where could these dwell so safely as in their graves? Eusebius says, not one of these believers perished in the siege.

Second. The resurrection ("anastasis" in the original) was a standing upon their feet again; for this is the primary meaning of the term; nor could it allude to the literal resurrection, for when this is spoken of, the expression is not simply anastasis, but "hee anastasis." Those who know with what precision the inspired penmen wrote, and what importance the Greek article carries with it, will appreciate this observation.

Third. The life to which some of those who have done good come forth, is not the same to which all mankind will be raised in the literal resurrection. John says nothing about corruptibility or incorruptibility in the text, but in the context (verse 24) he speaks of eternal life, which must consequently be meant in the text. Now life eternal is defined by Christ himself, to consist in knowledge (John xvii: 3); but the dead know not anything, (Eccl. ix: 5); man's thoughts perish at death. Ps. cxlvi: 4; 1 Cor. xv: 17, 18. Consequently life eternal terminates with every person, when natural life ends; but in the literal resurrection all men will be changed; they will become immortal and incorruptible; as they have borne the image of the earthy, they will then also bear the image of Christ the heavenly man; they will be as the angels in heaven; neither can they die any more, for they will be the children of God, because they are the children of the resurrection. Their life there is never called eternal in the Bible. 1 Cor. chap. xv; Matt. xxii: 23-34; Mark xii: 18-28; Luke xx: 29-39.

John (v: 28, 29) does not speak of dead, but of living persons, having the power of locomotion; but in the literal resurrection they shall (not rise themselves, but) be raised by the power of God from literal death. In the literal resurrection the life is immortal and incorruptible, in the text it is only eternal; in the resurrection all are clothed with glory and honor, in the text some are the subjects of damnation; in the resurrection all are changed from mortal to immortal, in the text there is no change; in the resurrection there is nothing said about works, in the text the life spoken of depends upon having done good; in the literal resurrection they rise from literal death and literal graves, in the text they only come forth out of the graves they have made for themselves; in the resurrection they are like the angels in heaven and can die no more, in the text they are so unlike the angels that some come forth to be damned; in the resurrection all are the children of God, in the text some are the children of damnation, shame and everlasting contempt. Daniel xii: 2.

SPIRITUAL WARFARE.

We content ourselves, I fear, with very indistinct and contracted views of what is usually denominated the Christian warfare. If our ordinary every-day conduct be irreproachable, estimated by the standard of the average morality among society; if we have settled down into steady habits of sobriety, decorum, and outward respectability, we are apt to forget the farther heights of virtue, and to neglect the necessary circumspection, exertions, and sacrifices which are to be made ere we can advance thither. With all these fair attainments, the conflict of Christian principles with our natural propensities, and acquired habits of conformity to the world, may not even be commenced. Alas! that we should forget our high capabilities, our high calling, our noble destiny, and slothfully resign ourselves to inaction, and all the penalties of an imperfect virtue. We lose more by deceiving ourselves than by deceiving others. Of self-deceivers as well hypocrites it may well be said:—

"Ah that deceit should steal gentle shapes
And with a virtuous vizard hide deep vice."

The vizard that hides us from our own eye we would wish to have torn away. A. S.

THEOLOGICAL AUTHORITIES.

How destitute of any real authority for determining doctrinal truth, are most of the "authorities" which are appealed to by polemical writers! Examine the writings of those belonging to a certain sect a half century ago, and you find it to have been an approved, and apparently a very satisfactory method, of demonstrating the truth of their doctrines, to show their agreement with the established creed. In several other sects, the same certainty of being sound in the faith has been often arrived at, as well in one of those sects as in another, by the writer showing satisfactorily, that he held the same doctrines as did the illustrious founder of that particular sect. Such proofs of holding undoubtedly correct doctrines, are not, indeed, entirely discarded at the present day; though it must be confessed that this kind of evidence is not now, in general, considered quite infallible.

Not many years ago, it appears to have been a standing custom among nearly all sects, to quote the testimony of the Greek and Latin Fathers, so called, to settle religious disputes. Then St. Augustine, and other reputed saints of antiquity, held the rank of "authorities;" and a passage from the writings of a celebrated saint, was often brought forward with the triumphant air of a judicial pleader, introducing in favor of his client, a decision of the Chief Justice of a Supreme Court. Latterly, however, the credit of the Fathers in deciding doubtful disputes, has become vastly depreciated; yet much the same method of proof is still popular in the religious world.

Theological discussions now turn in a great measure upon the meaning of certain Scripture words, which meaning each party commonly attempts to decide by an appeal to Lexicons. But it would seem that a man of discernment ought to be aware, that a Lexicon writer has, like another man, a belief of his own, and that if he is honest in that belief, we may reasonably expect that the definitions by him affixed to the words of Scripture, will in no case condemn his belief, will in some instances favor it, and in one or more instances plainly support it.

The doctrine of the Scriptures is to be learned by an acquaintance with Scripture teachings; and Scripture teachings involve the meaning of Scripture language; a Lexicon therefore, like a Concordance, may be very convenient, and very useful, as a help to the understanding of the Scriptures. But to receive the dictum of a Lexicographer, or indeed of any "critic," as authority for the meaning of an important Scripture word, or phrase, is in effect, acknowledging his authority in matters of Christian doctrine. At least so thinks PHILIP.

CHRISTMAS CELEBRATIONS.

Br. Grosz—The writer is pleased to see from our periodicals that the festival of our Saviour's nativity has been so generally celebrated, and especially by the Universalist societies in this neighborhood. At Marshall, where you will recollect there was a splendid celebration last year, the society were resolved, if possible, to outdo their former doings. In this they succeeded.—The illumination was indeed a brilliant one. The evergreens were arranged with great taste "to beautify the place of the sanctuary." The singing was excellent; and a very large and attentive audience joined in the services. On the evening of the 24th ult. A sermon was preached by the writer of this communication from Luke ii: 6-14. There was likewise a celebration at Clinton on the same evening. Appropriate decorations, inscriptions, illuminations, here also served as external indications of the joyful feelings with which the anniversary of our Saviour's birth is greeted by those who believe in a world's salvation. An excellent sermon was preached by Br. Gage, on John xviii: 37. "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth." The services were attended by a large congregation. T. CLOWES.

CHARACTER OF GOD.

That disciple whom Jesus loved, hath informed us; that "God is love"—and in perfect agreement with this declaration, is the testimony of all the sacred writers.

And even, were this Scripture testimony wanting, if the sacred writers had not penned one single passage, which proclaimed the glorious truth that "God is love," still, who in the honest sincerity of his heart could have one lingering doubt, when he looked abroad upon the world, and attentively perused the instructive pages writ in Nature's Volume! Who, that beholds the radiant sun, arise and shine alike upon the evil and the good, and summers gentle showers, falling as well upon the unjust as the just, can for a moment doubt, that God is a being of benevolence and compassion, of tenderness and love—that he loves all the creatures he has formed—yea, that he is "good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works." Spring, with its budding promise, summer, with its beauty and glory; autumn, with its rich and golden harvests; and winter with its snow clad fields and ice bound rivers, furnish an abundant and ever changing variety, of richness, beauty, and enjoyment, for the benefit and gratification of all without distinction.—Go where we will, view the face of Nature, in all her varied appearance, of the love of God, clearly displayed in "his wonderful works to the children of men."

This love of God, is not limited and partial.—It is broad as the "river of life," boundless as the ocean of Eternity, extensive as the race of man, and enduring as the throne of Jehovah. It is not confined to any one sect or party, but extends to every intelligent child of Adam. It is not bestowed exclusively upon the obedient and good, but includes even the unthankful and the unrighteous. Those who are stubborn and rebellious, who indulge in vicious and unholy practices, and walk in the crooked paths of disobedience and transgression, are still the subjects of God's boundless and impartial love; are permitted to feed upon the same rich bounty, breathe the same healthful and invigorating atmosphere, and bask in the bright and genial rays of the same sun, with those who are willing and obedient.—Truly, "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him."

THE MOUNTAIN WILD FLOWER.

MR. EDITOR:—I have just read "The Mountain Wild Flower," by Rev. Mr. Lester, who is now preaching in the 2d Presbyterian church of this city, and I have not met with a new book for some time in which I have felt as much interest. While I should dissent from some of the author's views on the subject of religion, I would cheerfully recommend the book to all under whose eye this short note may fall. It is a touching and beautiful story of a gifted, but unfortunate lady who lived in the eastern section of this State.—Let the lovers of truth, with the charms of romance, read the "Mountain Wild Flower." It is praise enough for the author to say that he has done justice to his subject. He had a beautiful theme and fine materials, and his style and spirit are honorable to him as an author and a Christian. This book should be read by every young female of "the American Zion"—to whom it is dedicated. Such works do much for the moral and intellectual improvement of young females. Whenever I see a young author select such a field as Mr. Lester has entered, and execute his work so well, I must say "God speed you." I am glad Mr. Hutchinson has "The Mountain Wild Flower" in his Book Store. A READER.

THE GOOD PART.

We have frequently met with Marthas in society—seldom with Marys. To explain the allusion here, it may be well to say to some that the paragon in the 10th chapter of Luke's Gospel, from the 38th to the 42d verse is referred to. It is the opinion of the writer, that the sense of this passage is distorted in our common version, and that the translation of Mr. Wakefield gives more correctly the meaning of the original. Instead of Martha's being "careful and troubled about many things," etc., as in the common version, Mr. Wakefield gives the following as the answer of Jesus to Martha's query—"Master dost thou not care that my sister leave me to prepare alone?" "Martha! Martha! thou art troubling and perplexing thyself about many dishes, when only one is needful; now Mary hath chosen for herself that good portion of the entertainment, which shall not be taken from her." ### DEDICATION AT HENDERSON.

Agreeably to previous public notice, the new Universalist meeting house in Henderson, Jefferson county, was solemnly dedicated to the worship of the ever-living Father of the universe, December 25th, 1839.

Order of services. 1. Voluntary from the choir. 2. Reading select portions of Scripture by Br. W. H. Waggoner. 3. Singing. 4. Introductory prayer by Br. S. Jones. 5. Singing. 6. Sermon by Br. P. Morse. 7. Singing. 8. Dedicatory prayer, by Br. C. G. Person. 9. Singing. 10. Concluding prayer by Br. W. H. Waggoner. 11. Singing. 12. Benediction by Br. P. Morse.

The day was pleasant, the assembling multitude increased, almost without example, number, or end; and after every place within its spacious walls which could be occupied, either sitting or standing, was filled, great numbers went away, being unable to enter even the outer doors. Upwards of one hundred singers, accompanied by skillful instrumental music, led by Mr. Human, whose exertions in preparing the choir, merit, and have obtained, the hearty approbation of the public, made melody which seemed to touch every heart, and exalt our best feelings and thoughts to a participation in the holy and triumphant anthems of the celestial world. Decorum, solemnity and holy joy, characterized the worshipping throng, during a very long service, and we humbly trust much good was done in the name of the Lord, and that it was a season of spiritual refreshment which will never be forgotten.

The house stands in a very commanding position, on a common of two acres—designed by the society for public use—near a flourishing little village, about the centre of the town, with an adjacent shed 22 feet by 150 feet in length. It is 40 feet by 60, besides a porch on front projecting 7 1-2 feet by 25, with a well proportioned steeple, containing three sections, a dome and spire, in all, 72 feet high. The house is built without galleries, with 21 feet posts, and the whole ceiling is arched from side to side; it contains 86 seats or slips, each 8 feet in length; is painted white inside as well as outside, and furnished with green window blinds. On the whole, it appears to be the very thing required by this society and community. May it long be occupied by faithful worshippers of the true God.

ORDER OF EVENING SERVICES.

1. Voluntary from the choir. 2. Reading select Scriptures by Br. O. Wilcox. 3. Singing. 4. Introductory prayer by Br. C. G. Person.—5. Singing. 6. First sermon by Br. O. Wilcox. 7. Singing. 8. Second sermon by Br. W. Sias. 9. Singing. 10. Concluding prayer by Br. P. Morse. 11. Singing. 12. Benediction by Br. P. Morse. The house was again well filled with attentive hearers, and we have many and strong reasons to bless the Lord for the spiritual refreshment abundantly furnished to his people on this solemnly pleasing and truly interesting occasion. Long may it be cherished in fond remembrance by all who were present. P. MORSE.

DEDICATION IN HOMER.

The meeting house recently erected by our friends in Homer, Cortland county, was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God on Tuesday morning, the 24th ult. The following is the order of the services. 1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading of the Scriptures by Br. A. C. Barry. 3. Hymn. 4. Reading select Scriptures by Br. Bullard. 5. Hymn. 6. Prayer by Br. Delong. 7. Hymn. 8. Sermon by Br. A. C. Barry. 9. Dedicatory prayer by Br. T. J. Whitcomb. 10. Voluntary. 11. Benediction. Sermon P. M. by Br. Bullard. Prayer by Br. Green. The birth of the Prince of Peace was celebrated in the evening—the house was tastefully decorated for the interesting occasion, and an address delivered by Br. Delong—sermon by Br. Whitcomb. These services were of a highly interesting character. The house was filled during the day, with an attentive and listening audience—and in the evening crowded to excess.—The dedicatory sermon by Br. Barry was highly creditable to the head and heart of its author.—The performances by the choir are rarely if ever excelled. Our enterprising friends at Homer, under the direction of Judge Berray, are deserving of great praise for the zeal they have thus manifested in the cause of truth and righteousness. They are now provided with a neat and commodious house of worship, and have furnished their church with a fine toned organ. They have also secured the services of Br. A. C. Barry, all the time, for the ensuing year. May God continue to bless them, and send them prosperity.

T. J. WHITCOMB.

TOWN MEETINGS.

Some of these are near at hand in this State, and we therefore suggest to our agents, that they will afford a good opportunity for meeting our friends who are, and who may be prevailed on to become, subscribers to this paper—and then and there to collect what is yet due to the establishment. Will our friends who are indebted, or who wish to pay in advance, also please to remember these meetings, and be prepared for them? It will save much trouble to the agents—to us—and perhaps some trouble or money to themselves. PUBLISHERS.

BINDING.

O. Hutchinson will continue to attend to the binding of any volumes of the Magazine or other works left in his charge, on the same terms as heretofore.

Every volume should be arranged, and the name of their owner written on the title page, before being sent, and all volumes will be considered complete, unless the missing numbers are marked on the outside of the bundle, or title page.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—The next term of the Clinton Liberal Institute, will commence on Monday, the 27th inst. It is very desirable that those who attend the Institute should commence with the session.

H. B., of Benton, asks—"Upon what principles or laws are all men reconciled to God through Jesus Christ?" If the question is all that is to be answered, (for I suspect that it does not convey a proper idea to my mind, of the difficulties which exist in the inquirer's,) I answer—Upon the moral principles or laws of Christ's moral government—and the principal means by which it is done, will be the manifestation of God's love to mankind, as revealed in the Gospel. As to the providences of God by which this love shall be made manifest to human minds, they are very numerous, and embrace a very great variety—but I suppose the resurrection to immortality to be the greatest. If this explicit notice I have taken of the different bearings of his question, does not meet the difficulty he would have me meet, he must accompany his inquiry with an explanation of what he wants answered. ## DOCTRINAL PREACHING.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

We are not opposed to what is called doctrinal preaching. There are times and seasons, however, for all things. When an advance is made into a new country, the question very naturally arises, "What is the distinguishing doctrine of this stranger?—we would be glad to hear from him, for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." Now is the time, then, to enter into a detailed statement of what is peculiar in our system, and to corroborate it with the truth of the Bible. And it should be done in a fearless manner. Flattery nor frowns, riches nor poverty, may have an influence in deterring us from the proclamation of the whole counsel of God. Even at the risk of being accused of clubbing, we should boldly stand forth in defence of the glorious Gospel. We have no fellowship for such as go feeling along for fear they shall offend by preaching something that some body else does not believe. The only questions with me are, Do I believe it? Is it taught in the Word of God? I am not to ask what Mr. such a one believes and teaches. If I have been selected to preach the Gospel, I am to look to the Bible, and to that alone, for what I am to communicate to the people. But after having cleared the field of the growth of error and delusion, we should sow it with the religion of Jesus. It is not enough to disbelieve the offspring of a Zoroaster, but we should believe in the Saviour—it is not enough to believe in the Saviour, but we should live as he lived: "Add to faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity."—We ought to have a poor opinion of a woodsman, who, after felling his piece, leaves it to grow up to vines and brambles. And we should have no better one of him, who, after having rased the citadels of orthodoxy, leaves the minds of his hearers to die on its failings. The former should have cleared the land of the fallen timber, mellowed it, sowed it with good seed, and carefully attended to its cultivation; and the latter should not be satisfied with having made falsehood hideous, but he should make truth lovely—he should not be satisfied with taking falsehood from the mind, but he should supply its place with the good seed of the kingdom.

ESSAYS ON WAR.....NO. IX.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread.—And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory forever. Amen."—THE LORD'S PRAYER.

In our last number, we endeavored to prove that war violated every command in the decalogue. We did not go over the whole ground, but we went sufficiently far to sustain our position. We now come to the New Testament, and to the Lord's prayer, to show that no one can consistently employ this petition, and then rush into battle. He may pray, but then it must not be in the language of the Lord's prayer. We hesitate not to lay it down as a correct principle that that which we can not pray for, can not be a proper moral act. It is for this reason that we can not believe in the doctrine of endless misery, because we can not pray for it to come to pass. We will now take up the several parts of the Lord's prayer, and show that on the war-system, it can not be used.

Our Father, who art in heaven. This portion of the prayer supposes that we all have one common Father, and of course, are all brethren. Can the soldier, while butchering men, women and children, pray to one who is the great Parent of us all? Would it be right for an individual to kill his own brother, even if he did him an immense injury? All agree that it would not.—The crime of fratricide is condemned by every civilized nation on earth. But we should remember that the Gospel contemplates men as connected in the same tender and endearing manner as we consider our own brothers. In the Gospel "every one, whether he be near or far off, whether he be rich or poor, whether he be learned or unlearned, whether he belong to this or the other civil or religious society, whether his color be black or white, whether he be blind, or deaf, or lame, whether he be an inhabitant of Greenland, Iceland, Barbary, Germany, France or Spain, whatever be his language, manners, or customs, should be recognized, wherever he may be found, as a friend and brother, and a cordial interest felt in every thing that concerns his welfare and comfort."*

Hallowed be thy name. To hallow signifies to separate a thing from earthly purposes and employments. We may hallow God's name in our thoughts, in our lives, in our families, in our particular calling or business. But can we hallow the name of God by plunder and bloodshed?—Are we hallowing him, when we are destroying and mutilating man whom he has created in his own image? It appears to me that all such questions must receive a negative answer.

Thy kingdom come. Can we use this part of the prayer, when fighting for the support of earthly kingdoms? The kingdom of heaven is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Such a kingdom can never come by theft and violence, by the bloody strife and countless miseries of war! Jesus says, "My kingdom is not of this world, for if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews." Here it is plainly intimated, to say the least, that if we fight in support of earthly kingdoms, we do not belong to the kingdom of Christ. When we use the Lord's prayer, therefore, we ought at the same time to drop all carnal weapons, and depend on truth alone.

Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.—How much is embraced in this declaration! How few ever thought of its vast import! When will this happy period come, when the will of God will be performed on earth as it is in heaven? We know that such a blissful era can never arrive while wars and contentions exist among men. It can not be brought about by hating, robbing and killing our brethren!

Give us this day our daily bread. But how does the soldier expect to obtain his daily food? It is by depriving others of their bread. He agrees to kill, plunder and destroy, perhaps for sixpence a day. It was a very affecting truth which a soldier once uttered to one who asked, of what he was thinking as he stood leaning on his gun, surveying a field of battle. "I am thinking," said he, "how many widows and orphans I have made this day for sixpence!" And is this the way to earn our daily bread? Shocking thought! Yet it is the great business of the soldier to make widows and orphans in order to get his daily food.

And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors. But how does the soldier forgive? He knows nothing of this virtue. There can not be the most distant connection between the spirit of war and the spirit of forgiveness. Besides, are we willing to abide by this petition? Is that all the forgiveness we want, that which we grant to others? I fear if such a rule were fully carried out by high Heaven, that we should all come short in the final results of God's moral government. One thing is certain in morals. We can only enjoy forgiveness in the same proportion that we exercise it. He who hates mankind, and makes it his great business to destroy them, must first render himself wretched. Hannah More has a good remark touching this point. "If I wished to punish an enemy," she says, "it would be by fastening upon him the trouble of constantly hating somebody!" This remark evinces the author's thorough knowledge of the hidden springs of human action, passions and sympathy. How miserable then, must be that man who goes out with a deadly hatred to his race, and with a determination to ravage, destroy, and exterminate to the extent of his power! We close this paragraph with the expressive language of the great Saviour:—"Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." How soon would such a precept, if carried into practice, put an end to all wars! If this were heeded, instead of praying for the success of the battle, the first step would be to attempt a reconciliation. But this is the last step generally in the kingdoms of this world. Indeed, war reverses all God's laws in the moral world.

But we pass to a consideration of another portion of our Lord's prayer.

And lead us not into temptation. But the soldier rushes into the midst of temptation. To pray thus on the eve of battle, and then go into the midst of blood and carnage, is about as consistent as for the drunkard to pray, and then proceed immediately to the haunts of vice and dissipation. The meaning is, bring us not into sore trial.—The word here comes from a term signifying to pierce through, as with a spear or spit, and is so used by some of the best Greek writers. How inconsistent, then, does the soldier appear in thus praying, when he goes into the very midst of the most alluring and damning temptations! But I need not enlarge here on a point so evident to the reader.

But deliver us from evil. This seems in reality to belong to the phrase on which we have just been commenting. A very expressive word is here used; break our chains, and loose our bonds—snatch, pluck us from the evil, and its calamitous issue. But the soldier exposes himself to a thousand evils. We have not time to go into a full consideration of those vices, which are undoubtedly prevalent in a very high degree, in all armies. An allusion, therefore, must suffice.—Among other vices which display themselves openly, and are constantly disseminating their pernicious contagion, are, intemperance, profanity, gambling, Sabbath breaking, etc., etc.—When we pray, therefore, to be delivered from evil, a soldier's profession is the last one on earth that we should adopt.

For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever: amen. How expressive and beautiful is this whole petition! Its parts all harmonize, and contain all that man need ever to ask for during his sojourn on earth. Well would it be if the world would breathe its amiable and benign spirit. But can we pray thus, and fight for earthly kingdoms? No. We are seeking, then, to advance our own interests, and our own glory.

But this number is extending itself too far.—We feel, therefore, obliged to leave our remarks in an imperfect state, and hasten to a conclusion. It is evident that no Christian minister can, if our views be correct, exercise consistently the office of chaplain. And to be consistent, we should either leave off fighting, or leave off using the Lord's prayer: for we have shown that the petition and the whole system of war, are totally opposed to each other.

We had thought of citing from an excellent author an appropriate prayer for a soldier, but we must reserve that for some future number.

In great cities men are more callous both to the happiness and misery of others, than in the country; for they are constantly in the habit of seeing both extremes.

DISCOURAGING YOUNG PREACHERS.

BR. GROSH:—

What is the cause of the indifference to the welfare of young preachers, which prevails so extensively in our denomination, especially in the "Empire State?" Universalists love to have their preachers well qualified to discharge the important duties of their calling. To do this usually takes all the pecuniary means the young man has at his command. At any rate, such has been the case in several instances to my knowledge. He then enters the ministry. After this he of course depends upon the compensation he may receive for his services, for his livelihood. But how many are there that do not realize any thing like enough for this purpose.

Now Christianity, like every other institution, to be kept flourishing, requires that its teachers be devoted entirely to its service. But no man can thus devote his time unless the field in which he labors produces enough to feed and clothe him. A man engaged as an instructor in a literary institution, to be able to labor exclusively to promote its interests and increase its prosperity, must, for his services, receive a compensation sufficient to afford him a comfortable subsistence. Unless he does this he must of necessity, to make up the deficiency requisite for his maintenance, devote at least a part of his time to some other employment. So also is it with the teacher of Christianity. He, like other men, must have food and clothing. And if his labors in the ministry will not procure them, the stern and unyielding dictates of necessity will compel him to spend a portion of his time in some other vocation.—Such has been the fate of more than one, especially among those who have recently entered the ministry; and who, too, were acknowledged to be young men of respectable talent and unexceptionable character. Pitiful encouragement, indeed. True, the people often express themselves as much pleased with, and very grateful for, their services; and sometimes laud them to the very skies even, as though a little praise was all they needed to support and sustain them.

I think I say not too much when I affirm, that there is a lamentable deficiency in the encouragement which Universalists but too often give to their young preachers. Take the following instance. I know a young man who preached to a congregation, very respectable in numbers, about ten miles from the place where he resided. Having no means of conveyance of his own, he of course was at some expense in getting to and from the place where his meetings were held.—He preached ten sermons, for which he received the substantial sum—not of "thank you, Sir," but—of come again. Now this same society, readily and willingly paid an older preacher, who labored immediately after the above, the reasonable sum of ten dollars per Sabbath. But the young man who had exhausted nearly all his means in his preparatory studies, must even pay his own travelling expenses, for the privilege of complying with their wishes in preaching to them! What encouragement this, to the young man struggling in the midst of countless difficulties! But perhaps they regarded the privilege of preaching to them as of great value. Whether so or not, it is certain it did not pay either his board or tailor's bill, for to meet these he turned his hands to altogether a different employment.

The same young man preached in other places, distant from his residence from six to twenty-four miles, thirty sermons during the same season; for all of which he received the astonishing sum of nine dollars, about one-third of his travelling expenses to and from said places! Now these things ought not so to be. "The laborer is worthy of his hire" and should have it. If he is not, for his own sake and for the sake of the cause in which he is engaged, do not encourage him to preach where it will only be the means of increasing his expenses, of sinking him deeper and still deeper in debt, and in the end of exposing both him and the cause to the malignant shafts of an uncharitable—a merciless foe. Surely, if any person needs encouragement, and a tangible evidence of the usefulness of his labors, it is the young man, forsaken, on account of his religious sentiments, by his relatives, poor in this world's goods, and just entered on his public labors.—Add to these circumstances a realizing sense of the weight of responsibility accumulating on his head, and he has as much as he knows well how to bear up under, without being embarrassed in pecuniary affairs by the cruel neglect of his professed friends, to remunerate him for his services. And if he ever feels the force of the saying, "God save me from my friends," it is under such circumstances. But this is only one case. What think you of it?

CHARGE OF PLAGIARISM.

NOT GUILTY!

BR. GROSH:—

It was not till recently, in looking over the back numbers of your paper, several of which were received in one bundle, sometime after my removal, that I noticed in the Magazine of October 25th, under the head of "New Publications," a notice of the "Rose of Sharon," from your pen, containing the following singular sentence:

"It is splendidly bound in gilt muslin, with gilt edges, ornamented with four engravings, and wholly filled with original matter, (with the exception of a great portion of an article entitled "Fortune," by L. C. Browne, which is old matter ground over, as may be seen by consulting the Magazine and Advocate, vol. iv, page 128!) much of it from the pen of the Editor."

Now whatever may have been the design of this sentence, (which it is hard to conjecture,) its effect is very obvious. Many who read it, have not the old volume referred to, and of those who have, few will take pains to turn to the place.—The great majority of readers, therefore, will understand that the article is a plagiarism, especially as you implied that it was not "original." And very many, I apprehend, from the length of the parenthesis, and the peculiar position of the words, "much of it from the pen of the Editor," will get the idea that the article was stolen from your editorial, especially as you seem so interested in making the exposure.

Now if I were inclined to steal poetry, I would not steal yours, Br. G., for two reasons. 1. I should be sure of detection and exposure. And 2. I could steal better, the owners of which are dead.

The truth of the matter stands thus. The article which was published in the Magazine, vol. iv, p. 128, was published as mine. Yet it was not published as originally written; but altered and shortened, to suit the Editor's poetic taste and spare space; and I therefore reviewed and revised it, at a future time, and placed it among my unpublished fragments, and used it accordingly.

To intimate that an article is not original, because its author has published it, all, or in part, before, is, in my humble opinion, about as proper and equitable, as would be a notice in the "Union" or Trumpet, like the following:

"The session of the General Convention for 1836, in New-York, was highly interesting. The sermons were all original, with the exception of one, by A. B. Grosh, from Ps. lxxiv: 2, which was old matter, distilled over, as may be seen by consulting the minutes of the Central Association, Magazine and Advocate, vol. vii, p. 195!"

From your general disposition to do justice to all parties, after you have had your sport, I have thought it possible you might be willing to admit this explanation. And when you next feel inclined to amuse yourself, at the expense of some brother's feelings, who never injured you, I hope you will call to mind the fable of "The Boys and the Frogs." Yours, very truly, Nashua, December 25th, 1839.

L. C. BROWNE.

REPLY.

BR. BROWNE—I regret that you charge our readers with stupidity, (not understanding the nature of a parenthesis,) that you may make it appear that I charged you with plagiarism, when the sentence fairly construed, shows clearly that I merely stated that you had published as original in the Rose of Sharon an article which originally appeared in this paper. Your doing so enabled you to sneer (unnecessarily) at my poetry, (for by that name you dignify my versification,) of which I think I have never showed myself very vain—a sneer the more uncalled for, as I had made no remark on the merits of your article, though I believe it not invulnerable on account of its poetic beauty and sublimity.

You say it is hard to conjecture my design in my remarks. I think it very obvious. It was to state a fact. I was recommending the Rose, and stated that its articles were original, (i. e., not selected—not before published in another work—for such is the meaning of the word thus used,) and then, as in truth and duty bound, I stated that yours was the only exception. But I did so in few words, in parenthesis, and in words of lightness, without giving the deed the name I would have given it, had I believed that it was your intention to deceive (not to steal)—and that name is, IMPOSITION. But not knowing your intention, I merely stated the fact.

Your supposed remarks on my sermon at the General Convention in 1836, are not in point, because, 1st, It was not expected that every sermon preached at the Convention should not have been preached previously—whereas the articles in the Rose were expected to be originally printed in it. 2d, My sermon was probably not the only one which had been preached elsewhere, and to a different audience—whereas I hope that your article is the only one in the Rose, ten-fourteenths of which have been printed previously in a paper then read by from 20,000 to 30,000 readers.

Lastly—for, really, I do not deem "Fortune—by L. C. Browne" worth the ink already shed on and about it—I was not "insport" in noticing its republication as an original publication; for I do not believe such originality to be a joking matter, whatever you may think of it. You may therefore keep the fable of the boys and the frogs for your own use, or wait a more fitting opportunity to bestow it on another. Deem me not your enemy because I tell you the truth, for I remain fraternally yours.

UNIVERSAL BENEVOLENCE.

Private conversations sometimes form a fund for an Editor to draw upon, when closely pressed for editorial. [why not editorial, noun, and editorial, adj., as well as material and materiel?] inasmuch as his most lively and often valuable ideas are drawn out, if not originated, in the free and unrestrained conversations of the social circle. So, merely disguising facts and names—or even with these undisguised—the prominent ideas of the conversation are as useful for general use, as they were pleasant and instructive to the members of the little group, where they were first uttered, unthinkingly it may be, and certainly careless of all but the present moment, and without any thought of their appearing in print.

The little circle was grouped together, on the eve of a departure of one-half of them for some months. The bustle of packing, of making up and sending presents, and of writing letters, was nearly over, and in the pause that ensued, friendly greetings and messages of affection were entrusted to the departing, for those to whom they were going. "And, F., (said one,) remember me to A, and B, and C, when you see them." "Yes, and remember me, (said another,) to G, and H." "And give my love to them all, (said a third,) and to L, and to M." "And give mine, also, to M," added the first. "Well, (said I,) there are so many of them, I can not name them all; but whenever you meet any one I know, just tell them I love them."

"Do you love every body you are acquainted with?" asked one of the travellers.

"Yes—every one. I don't know a single soul in the universe of God, that I would not do good to, if I had an opportunity."

The bell rang for tea, and the conversation was broken up. But my thoughts still ran on the delightful theme—universal love—love to God, and to all mankind. Are its nature and its operations fully understood? Is its necessity fully appreciated? Are there not many who love all mankind, without knowing it—even thinking they hate many, from having misunderstood the nature of love and of hatred? Such were a few of the many questions which the above conversation originated in my mind, and my meditations resulted in the following, among many other reflections and conclusions.

What is it to love a fellow-being? Is it to admire the perversions of his mental or moral powers—to love his follies or his vices—his depraved character? Do we not love a fellow-being, simply because there are certain social, mental or even moral peculiarities which are disagreeable to our minds or feelings—because his appearance, his manners, his opinions or his actions are disgusting, ridiculous, absurd, or improper in our opinion? There are hundreds, I doubt not, who would, at first appearance, answer all these questions in the affirmative. Their feelings on the points enumerated, are so strong—and they have so identified these disagreeable things with the very individuals to whom they belong—that they can hardly believe they do not actually hate the persons in hating these traits in them.—But this is a mistake—a sad and grievous error—an error, involving much the welfare of those who are its objects—much more the happiness of those who cherish it—and, frequently, the credence which men give to, or withhold from, Christianity itself. Indeed, one of the deepest rooted causes of lurking infidelity, is this feeling in the heart. Hundreds have seriously proposed it to me as an objection to Christianity, which they could not answer satisfactorily to their own minds.—"Here," say they, "Christ commands me to love my neighbor as myself—to love all men, pray for all, bless all, and do good to all as I have opportunity. There stands my neighbor, a low, vulgar, beastly, brutal wretch—whose lips are polluted with curses whenever he opens them to speak—whose hands are full of violence, and his mind of plans of robbery, fraud and deceit. Now, how can I love that man? I can not. He is injuring me, in person, in property, or in feelings, every day—and although I can pray sincerely for his reformation, and for God to bless him by turning him from his evil ways—yes, and even aid him when he is sick and in distress—yet I can not love him; nor do I believe that it really is my duty to love such a vile and wicked wretch!"

Such is the objection, fairly and fully stated, as it has been frequently presented to me. And the very form in which it is stated, fully proves that the objector is obeying the very requirement which he declares he can not obey! And even while he rejects this part of Christianity for its supposed impracticability, he is really practicing the very precept for which he rejects it! I will prove this assertion true, presently. Meanwhile let us inquire in what love to man, consists.

The Christian, at least, will admit that Jesus of Nazareth loved mankind universally—that he really loved us, when we were dead in trespasses and sins, and his own murderers, and the vilest of our race—for his dying for them proves that he loved them better than he did life itself. What stronger evidence can be required, to prove his love for the worst of our race? What stronger love than that of Jesus for sinners, can be pointed out in the history of mankind? None—none—the love of Jesus for his enemies, stands pre-eminent in its own strength, and in the proof by which it was attested, among all human love for humanity.

Well, turn we now to the questions which (we have said) so many Christians would answer in the affirmative, and let us substitute Christ for ourselves. Jesus loved his fellow beings. Did he admire the perversions of their mental and moral powers? No. Did he love their follies or their vices? No. Did he love the depravity of their characters? No. Did he hate his fellow-beings, because he did not like certain social, mental, or even moral peculiarities of some of them? No. Because the appearance, manners, opinions or actions of many men, were, in his opinion, disgusting, absurd or improper, was his difference of taste and opinion what is properly termed hatred to, or want of love for them? No. Here, then, are the same test questions—as true with regard to Jesus in his opinions of, and feelings to, many of mankind, as they are with regard to Christians—which before were answered in the affirmative, now answered in the negative. Both answers can not be correct—one or the other must be false—which is it?—To answer the question, let us turn back to our yet unproved assertions in relation to the objector to the practicability of Christ's precept.

The objector says he can not love his vile and ill-tempered neighbor, but he can sincerely pray to God for his reformation, that he may be blessed in being restored to virtue and peace; and he can even assist him when he becomes reduced to utter poverty; and can visit him with kindnesses when affliction and sorrow come upon him. And what is all this, but loving that neighbor?—If he did not love him, could he pray thus for him—do we desire the happiness of one whom we hate? If he did not love him, would he not rejoice at his enemy's sorrows and afflictions, and exult over his downfall?—It appears to me, that these questions must open the mental eye to see the light of divine truth, and perceive that the more we hate what is evil in our fellow-men, the more we love them—that if we loved them less, we would not so implacably dislike their follies and their vices, nor so earnestly desire and pray for their restoration to holiness and happiness. If so, even the infliction of punishment for a man's vices, with intent to reform him, is proof positive of our love for him—just as the divine punishments are proofs that God regards us as his children, and that he does not hate us as if we were the unlawful progeny of an unfaithful wife. Hebrews xii: 6-8.

It is possible that those who believe in total depravity, may hate mankind generally—and that those who have approached far towards total depravity, may hate many of mankind, from having falsely judged them by themselves—but in no other case can I believe that the law of Christ is habitually or even generally violated by men. It is an instinct of our nature to love mankind universally—as it is in the mother, to love her babe—and it is only in occasional cases, when passion overpowers this instinct, that it is disobeyed. And in the Christian's heart—in the true follower of Christ—universal benevolence must reign, whether it is his faith or not. A. B. G.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT... NO. I.

That was a prudent attempt to remove a prominent objection against capital punishments, by which public executions were changed to private. Legislators had been convinced by repeated proofs, that instead of restraining crime, the exhibition of executions created a maddening and debasing excitement in the public mind, which led to all manner of debauchery and excesses, generated strifes and quarrels, and roused a disposition and thirst for crime. Under the very gallows itself, drunkenness and riot ran mad, murders were threatened and executed, and men went from seeing a fellow-being choked like a dog, to plunge into the grossest and most polluting practices. To remove the objections these facts presented against the practice of taking life as a legal punishment, public executions were abolished—no, I am wrong—the legislature of New-York, showed their fear of losing popularity with those who delighted in witnessing public executions, by throwing the responsibility on the Sheriff—and a law was passed that executions might take place in the prison. But though the evil was diminished, it was not entirely abated. Experience has shown that though seeing a sight is more exciting than hearing of it, yet that hearing of it is not altogether destitute of exciting power. Hence in nearly all cases of executions occurring since the passage of the latest law on the subject, more or less of pernicious excitement has been produced on the minds of those living in the county where the execution took place. Nor was this all. Generally great crowds assembled around the prison, and in some cases drinking, gambling, and other demoralizing practices occurred at the time. It is therefore necessary for our legislature to advance another step, and abolish executions altogether. Or, if they fear to risk their popularity, let them throw the responsibility on the people, by passing a law that at the town or general elections, the people shall decide whether any criminals, then under sentence of death, shall be executed privately, or be imprisoned for a definite period in the penitentiary. In every case but one, the Sheriffs have not hesitated to bear the responsibility thrown on them, by executing criminals in private—for they knew that the moral and humane feelings of community required it; and I hesitate not in declaring it as my firm belief, that in every case the people would not hesitate to bear the responsibility of saying to the criminal, "your blood shall not stain our consciences—we change your punishment from the gallows to the penitentiary."

But I did not mean to dwell, at present, at so much length on this subject, when I commenced this article. My object was to introduce the following extract from the Lancaster (Pa.) Intelligencer and Journal, which, before noticing the private execution of Henry Kobler, Musselman, for the murder of Lazarus Zellerbach, fully exposes the horrid and brutalizing tendency of executions—the hellish, maddening excitement of a crowd, caused by their knowing that a deed of blood was being performed near them, although they could not see it.—It is absolutely shocking—disgusting to our love of humanity, that its pure, salutary and useful impulses, should thus be lashed up and overflow in wild madness and crime, by the legal and deliberate extinction of a fellow-being's life; but our abhorrence of it does not change the fact—it is a fact. And that government which thus aids in perverting the passions and feelings of men into such crime and madness, by setting them an example of barbarity and cold-blooded destruction of human life, is not guiltless in the matter. As is the government, such will be too many of its subjects—if it practices destroying life, on principles of retaliation, it must expect that many of the governed will imbibе its thirst for blood, and follow the example. But here is the extract—let it be read and pondered by all. A. B. G.

The Execution, though private—taking place in a yard surrounded by a wall nearly thirty feet high—created a large amount of excitement in the popular mind. In the neighborhood of the jail, the crowd was dense; and on one or two of the houses in the precincts, masses of spectators clustered to the roofs, straining their eyes to get a glimpse of the fatal ceremonies, which, however, unfortunately for this morbid curiosity, but luckily for the feelings of the prisoner, had been so arranged as to be seen by none other than those admitted as witnesses, or by the large body of physicians, of whom, counting students and all, there were some thirty or more present. We regret to say, that so far did this desire extend, that about a dozen of the more adventurous spirits managed to scale the wall, clinging to it, and peering over into the yard, forgetting their danger in the overweening anxiety to see a man hung! During the awful scene that took place before the execution, and as Kobler was swung off, the air resounded with the yells, shouts, and blasphemy of the crowd on the roofs and wall, though implored by the Sheriff to desist.

INDIVIDUAL INFLUENCE.....NO. II.

That there is a want of confidence in many good (and therefore influential) believers in the restitution, I have long been convinced—however others may think there are some who manifest too much. “Our preacher is an excellent man, but somehow or other, I do not like his preaching.” Why, what ails it? “Oh, I scarcely know what—his sermons are good, but he has such a tame and lifeless way of delivering them, and such a slow and drawing tone, and lays his emphasis so queerly, that I can not like them half as well as if he delivered them in a plain, bold and free-spoken way.” Well, have you never pointed out these failings to him? He is a sensible young man, and I am sure, that if you were to mention these faults to him, gently, and one at a time, so as to make him sensible of what the fault is, he would correct it. “I mention it to him? Not for the world!” And why not? “Oh, it would seem so presumptuous in me to say any thing to him about it—no, let some of the preachers mention it to him.” But the preachers seldom hear him preach; and when they do, are too much engrossed with other matters—or think it too presumptuous for them to mention it—or, because they are not to sit under his preaching, think it none of their business. “Well, then, let some older, or more prominent, or more influential person mention it to him.”

Thus it is, I will not say in how many cases to my own knowledge, that a most excellent and amiable young preacher—and sometimes even an old one—has been suffered to contract habits which lessen his usefulness; and all for the want of a very little confidence in his hundred or two hundred friends! It is—shameful, I had almost said—this cowardice—this want of confidence in ourselves, and of love for our brother, and of zeal for the cause, which is all the while suffering, because we do not aid in correcting the faults of one of its most worthy public advocates. For shame, brothers and sisters—have you not courage and love enough to do your duty, and save your preacher? A. B. G.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Rev. Robert Smith proposes publishing in Cincinnati, Ohio, a monthly periodical of 24 pages each number, at one dollar per annum, payable in advance, to be entitled, “Both Sides of Religious Ceremonies.”—It will not discuss or inculcate any religious doctrines whatever, but be confined strictly to the free investigation (defence and opposition) of all rites and ceremonies termed religious—as public and social prayer, whether before or after sermon, or in religious meetings, in legislatures, courts, town meetings, in the field of battle, on parade, on national or religious anniversaries, at weddings, funerals, baptisms, in families, or on any other public or social occasions; dedications, baptisms, installations, ordinations, the observance of feasts, fasts, holidays, and the like—to all of which Mr. Smith avows himself opposed! This is going the “entire” on the subject, certainly—with the exception of preaching sermons, and sitting, standing, kneeling or reclining during their delivery, and the audible expression of any feelings or opinions respecting them after they are delivered. For, however deficient any may be in authority, many of the former are as proper as any of the latter, and the discussion is to embrace the propriety as well as the authority of religious ceremonies.

Sunday school celebrations of Christmas, and exhibitions, have been held in many of the Universalist societies at the East—among others, we notice one in Albany and two in New-York city. Besides these, one or both of these modes of rendering the Sunday school delightful and precious to the scholars, were lately got up in Waltham, Haverhill, Cambridgeport, Danvers, and other places in Massachusetts, and every thing went off to the high gratification of all who attended.

Christmas was very generally celebrated by our societies in Massachusetts, with appropriate splendid illuminations and decorations of the meeting-houses, sermons and addresses from preachers, lay members, Sunday school pupils, etc., enlivened by the performances of the choirs. In several places, Christmas day as well as the preceding evening, was entirely spent in joyous religious services by the congregation, choir, Institute, and Sunday school. In Maine, Vermont, New-York and other States, though many societies celebrated Christmas Eve, yet apparently it was not so generally done as in Massachusetts.

“The Independent Messenger,” the organ of Rev. Paul Dean and his party, and edited by the latter, has died for want of support. While Br. Skinner had the Magazine and Advocate, the Independent Messenger left it to pursue its course in peace; but the moment this paper passed into the hands of its late proprietors, the Messenger commenced fault finding, by garbling extracts from my editorial, and endeavoring to pervert their meaning. Disgusted with its illiberal unfairness and want of Christian candor, after one or two efforts to reclaim it, I paid no attention to it, and, finding that it could get up no quarrel with me on which to base a charge of persecution for opinion’s sake, it ceased to exchange with us. The above knowledge of its decease we derive from the Trumpet. Peace to its ashes!

The late Unitarian society in Castine, Maine, who settled Br. T. P. Abell, formerly of this State, as their Pastor, have lately held a meeting, and passed resolutions highly approbatory of Br. Abell and his labors, and declaring that they had been aroused to a life and activity, an increase of numbers and of zeal, never before enjoyed by them, and conclude by declaring themselves a Universalist society. Good.

Brs. N. Holder and E. H. Lake, of the second Universalist (formerly Christian) society in Lynn, Mass., are preparing to enter the ministry of universal reconciliation. This society, since its conversion, has paid off a great portion of the debt accumulated while a Christian society, and is now enjoying a fine season of prosperity under the pastoral care of Br. E. N. Harris, formerly a Baptist minister. The first society is also prospering greatly under the care of Br. L. Willis.

Mr. Howes, lately an accredited preacher among the Freewill Baptists, for the first time publicly proclaimed his faith in the restitution of all things, during the services at Lowell, Mass., in celebration of Christmas and Christmas eve. He has asked for and received an honorable dismission from his Baptist brethren—so says Br. A. C. Thomas in the Trumpet of the 4th inst.

Br. John Moore of Lebanon, N. H., has accepted an invitation to settle in Hartford, Conn.

DEDICATIONS.—A union meeting house was dedicated in West Windsor, Vt., on Christmas day—sermon by Br. Warren Skinner. A Universalist meeting house was dedicated in Homer, Cortland county, on the 24th December. Sermon by Br. A. C. Barry, Pastor.—We have received a copy, and shall publish it as soon as we can find room, by publishing two or three that are before it.

Br. Whittemore proposes publishing by subscription a book entitled “Universalist’s Guide”—400 pages, at one dollar per copy—intended to aid in acquiring a knowledge of Universalism, its Scripture proofs, its history, its teachings and tendency. Proposals on our last page.

We forgot to notice at the proper time, that Br. Everett has changed the Connecticut Universalist, (a weekly paper, published in Middletown, Conn.,) from the folio to the quarto form. This change being made before the close of the first volume, will render that volume useless for binding entire.

APPOINTMENT IN MIDDLEVILLE, AGAIN.

Week before last, I gave the reasons why the friends in Middleville were disappointed by my non-appearance in that place on Christmas Eve. Since then I have received a letter from Br. Keeler, intended, though not couched in very kind terms, to clear himself from a supposed liability to unjust censure. The asperity with which the matter is there treated would be almost amusing, if it did not indicate that I have undesignedly wrought up Br. Keeler’s feelings to a considerable degree of excitement. Hence, “Mr. A. R. B.,” as I am quaintly styled, will only notice such facts as are necessary to get Br. Keeler out of the jumble in which he fancies himself involved, reserving the letter to be published verbatim, if specially requested.

1. In the first place, Br. Keeler admits that he “inquired of Br. Cook to know whether Br. Grosh or himself could be got to come to Middleville.” I stated in my explanation that Br. Keeler applied to Br. Cook to know whether a preacher could be obtained to deliver a discourse in Middleville on Christmas Eve. Surely there is no great discrepancy here, or reason for complaint, unless it be because I did not state that his application was specially directed to particular individuals, instead of being of a general nature, which was a circumstance unknown to me then.

2. Br. Keeler says that he was informed that I would attend if he would see that I had a conveyance over from the rail road, (not Herkimer.) And that after consulting with several of the friends, they came to the conclusion not to have preaching. He further intimates that there was nothing in the letter by which he could tell where to send for me. It appears, therefore, that Br. Keeler did not suppose I would come until he saw the appointment in the Magazine, and that then he took measures to give the notice as wide a circulation as possible.

Here then was the mistake under which I labored, by supposing that I was to be met at Herkimer, when in reality no such arrangement was mentioned in the letter which Br. Cook wrote to Br. Keeler.

The misunderstanding was on my part, and—if Br. Keeler wishes, he may have it—on my part alone. I make no charges against him, nor have I made any in my former article. And I must say, that if he attaches a meaning to my article which is calculated to impeach his motives, or actions, or wound his feelings, or ruffle his temper, it is a far fetched, unnatural, and unjust one. And if the reader will peruse my article again, he will see that I was endeavoring to explain the reason for my making the appointment, and the causes which prevented my fulfilling it; that I censured no man; and, taking the whole article together, that though I mention my engagement, I alluded to it as a supposed one, not with Br. Keeler, but through Br. Cook, and not with the design of implicating Br. Keeler, but to show how I understood it. A. R. B.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. GROSH, in Taberg—Br. J. S. KIRBY in Colliersville. Bad weather prevented him from fulfilling his other appointment—Br. BULLARD, in Fairport, and in the Court House in Elmira in the evening—Br. STAS, in Muskegon Settlement at 11 o’clock, A. M., and in Dexter in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. BULLARD, in Binghamton, day and evening—Br. STAS, at Perch River, and in Depauville in the evening—Br. S. J. GIBSON, in South New-Berlin.

Br. BULLARD, will lecture on the evenings of Thursday, January 23d, in Newfield—Friday, 24th, at such place as the friends in Fairport shall designate—Monday, 27th, in Southport—28th, in Factoryville—preach at Cran’s Ferry on Wednesday, 29th, at 1 o’clock, P. M., and lecture at Nichols same evening—on the evenings of Thursday, 30th, in Tioga Centre—31st, in the Deep Well school house Owego—February 1st, in Union—5th in Green village. See Sunday notices.

Br. STAS, will preach on the evenings of February 3d, in Lafargeville—4th, at French Creek—5th, in Chaumont. See Sunday notices.

A Conference of the Otsego Association will be holden at Richfield Springs, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in February. Ministering brethren and the public are respectfully invited.

O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate
SOCIAL DESIRES.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

I love not on a little flower to look,
Casting its shadow on the singing brook,
If from its soft, blue eye I may not turn
To eyes where soul breathes out, as from an urn.

I love not in some wild and lonely shade,
To watch the dashing of a clear cascade,
If at my side, no spirit, clad in white,
Sings a low echo to my deep delight.

I love not in some mossy nook of green,
Where sweet wild roses weave a fragrant screen,
To bend my knee and lift my simple prayer,
Unless a heart to pray for, meet me there.

I love not even the poet's full-souled words,
Sweeter and purer than the songs of birds,
If no true, kindred heart beat time to mine,
And echo back the music of each line.

I love all holy things that God has made.
But none, unshared, of sunshine or of shade;
And from the wreath of joy my faith hath wove,
I would pluck out a rose for each I love.

THE IMPRISONED.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

He started from his sleep. The chain
Clanked on his stirring limb,
The fatal truth came back again,
Like an echoed curse to him.
Chained and alone—his proud heart rose
Like a tidied river then;
And his curse went forth as the Samiel goes,
To the doomed abodes of men.

Ye've bound your gyves upon the hand,
And fettered down the form,
And trampled on the freeman's land,
With his father's blood yet warm:
Ye've bound me where the sun is not.
Where the star-light never falls,
But ye humble not the kingly thought
That mocks your guarded walls.

The soul, the godlike soul is free,
Its glory is not dim,
It gathers sterner energy
From every tortured limb.
Dream ye that feelings nursed as mine
Are touched by human ill;
The form beneath its chains may pine,
The soul is mighty still.

And heavier you may bind the chain—
My spirit shall not quail;
Though madness revel on my brain,
My soul shall never fail.

Ye can not crush it—for the deep
And burning sense of wrong,
Through every weary hour shall keep
Its thirst of vengeance strong.

That sleepless vengeance! it will come—
A whirlwind on the earth;
The dungeon stone—the very tomb
Shall send its summons forth;
The injured spirit sleepeth not—
It may not be confined—
The tyrant's hand hath never wrought
A fetter for the mind.

THE UNBELIEVER.—I pity the unbeliever—one who can gaze upon the grandeur, the glory, and the beauty of the natural universe, and behold not the touches of His finger, who is over, and with, and above all; from my very heart I do commiserate his condition. The unbeliever! on whose intellect the light of reason never penetrated; who can gaze upon the sun, and moon, and stars, and upon the unfading and imperishable sky, spread out so magnificently above him, and say all this is the work of chance. The heart of such a being is a dull and cheerless void. In him, mind—the godlike gift of intellect, is debased—destroyed; all is dark—a fearful chaotic labyrinth—rayless, cheerless, hopeless! No gleams of light from heaven penetrates the blackness of the horrible delusion; no voice from the Eternal bids the desponding heart rejoice. No fancied tones from the harp of seraphim arouse the dull spirit from its lethargy, or allay the consuming fever of the brain. The wreck of mind is utterly remediless; reason is prostrate; and passion, prejudice, and superstition, have reared their temple on the ruins of his intellect. I pity the unbeliever. What to him is the Revelation from on high, but a sealed book! He sees nothing above, or around, or beneath him, that evinces the existence of God;—and he denies—yea, while standing on the footstool of Omnipotence, and gazing upon the dazzling throne of Jehovah, he shuts his intellect to the light of reason, and denies there is a God.—Chalmers.

POPULARITY.—There are some in the community, who, chameleon like, take the color of every thing they touch; who are so condescending as to coincide with whatever is said or done. They will practice vice with the vicious, advocate virtue with the virtuous, will doubt with the skeptic, and profess a veneration for religion with the pious. If any thing is unpopular among the people where they are, it affords them sufficient ground to reject it, and talk against it. Such persons deservedly lose the confidence of all honest and consistent people. For they at one time advocate the opinions which they oppose at another, and profess friendship for those they are with, and then, when they are with others, turn against them. Such persons are like flood trash floating upon the surface of a river, and taking every new direction with the current, and are unlike those substances which have sufficient weight to sink to the bottom of the stream.—Herald and Watchman.

MARRIAGES.

In East Victor, November 12th, 1839, by Rev. T. J. Whitcomb, Mr. GEORGE N. WEST, to Miss CHRISTIANNA BOWERS, all of Victor.

Also, in Cortland, December 26th, by the same, Mr. THOMAS B. CHAFF, of Oswego, to Miss ELIZA WELLS, of the former place.

In Scipio, October 2d, 1839, by Rev. H. Boughton, Mr. WM. D. BENNETT, of Venice, to Miss ANGELINE M. JOHNSON, of the former place.

In Stockbridge, on the 26th ult., by Rev. G. W. Gage, Mr. JAMES H. RANSOM, of Vernon, to Miss LUCIA C. PAGE, daughter of Wm. Page, Esq., of the former place.

In Auburn, October 10th, 1839, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. SAMUEL ABBY, Jr., to Miss ELIZABETH MITCHELL, both of Clarksville. In Clarksville, October 27th, by the same, Mr. JUSTUS L. GRANT, to Miss JENNETTE A. MILLS. In Auburn, November 27th, by the same, Mr. EUGENE PREUDHOMME, to Miss PRENETTA S. BENNETT. In same place, December 19th, by the same, Mr. JAMES W. MASTERS, to Mrs. JANE KEELER.

In Westmoreland, January 1st, by Rev. T. Clowes, Mr. HIRAM T. FRISBIE, of Vernon, to Miss CHARLOTTE H. LEWIS, of that place.

In Cassville, Grant county, W. T., September 11th, 1839, by Coe Garratt, Mr. JONATHAN S. SPRAGUE, to Miss ORRILL PATCH, all of that place.

On the 19th ult., by Rev. J. Todd, Mr. QUARTUS C. RUST, to Miss ELECTA KNIGHT, all of Ellicottville.

DEATHS.

In Clinton, HENRY, son of George and Sarah Stebbins, aged 15 months. The funeral services were attended by the subscriber on the 2d inst., and a few words of comfort addressed to the bereaved from 2 Kings iv: 26. "Is it well with the child? And she answered, it is well." T. C.

In Richfield, of consumption, December 18th, Miss CALISTA, only daughter of Benjamin R. and Nancy Eiwood, in the 25th year of her age. Thus by the appointment of Heaven, has her father and mother been deprived of a dutiful child, and her brothers of an affectionate sister. During her illness, which lasted about 9 months, she was most of the time in great distress, but she bore it with Christian fortitude and resignation. While living, she was respected by all who knew her, and now she is no longer here to gladden with her smiles, her memory will be cherished long by her friends and those to whom she had endeared herself. Her reasoning faculties she retained until she fell asleep in death, and welcomed the summons as a messenger to terminate her pain, — and "approached the grave,

Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
Around him, and lies down to pleasant dreams,"

She expressed a willingness to go, and exhorted her friends "not to mourn for her, for she was going to a better place, where she would be better off." This she did when she could but faintly whisper, and for fear that she was not understood, she asked, "did you hear that? tell me," and then repeated the exhortation to her mother, not to mourn for her, for she was "going to a happier place."

May her friends heed the exhortation not to mourn for her; believing that what may be loss to them is gain to her; believing that she has "gone to a better place;" and believing that he who inflicted the wound can heal it with the balm of immortality. And to this end may they find consolation to sustain them in this bereavement in the Gospel, which speaketh life from the dead through the Redeemer.
J. S. K.

At Brownville, December 21st, 1839, MARY A. KIMBALL, aged about 9 months.

Here thy loss we deeply fell—
But 'tis God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

Funeral services on the 22d—sermon by H. L. H.

UNIVERSALIST'S GUIDE.

To be published by subscription, a work entitled THE UNIVERSALIST'S GUIDE—by Thomas Whittemore. This work will consist of at least 400 pages, and will be handsomely bound; and it will be furnished to subscribers at the low price of ONE DOLLAR per copy.

The object of this work may be inferred from its title. It will be a GUIDE both to Universalists and those who are seeking a knowledge of Universalism.

I. It will show who are Universalists.
II. It will give a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

III. It will clearly and particularly set forth the sentiments of Universalists.

IV. It will give the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it will be infallibly proved that it is the doctrine of the Bible.

V. It will explain all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of one hundred and thirty, in which all the different subjects will be discussed, wherein light is so much needed—such as the words rendered "hell," the "lake of fire," the "furnace of fire," "unquenchable fire," "everlasting fire," "everlasting destruction," "eternal judgment," "coming forth from the graves to condemnation," the "sin against the Holy Ghost," "day of judgment," "destruction of the soul," "kingdom of heaven," etc., etc., etc.

VI. It will point out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VII. It will furnish a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation of the same; also directions in regard to the formation of Churches.

VIII. It will give Scriptural views of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper.

IX. It will also treat on other subjects, highly interesting to Universalists.

The work will be put to press as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained.

All those friendly to Universalism, who are desirous to see that doctrine better understood by its opponents, and adorned and honored more and more by the exemplary lives of its friends, are requested to use their exertions to obtain subscribers for this work. Any person who is willing to render such aid, can copy this prospectus, and obtain signatures thereto.

☞ We should be glad to have subscriptions returned, as early as the last of January.

Boston, December 25th, 1839.

DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP.

The partnership heretofore existing between the subscribers, is this day dissolved by mutual agreement. All persons indebted for books and subscriptions, are earnestly requested to make immediate payment, as our affairs must be settled without delay; and all who have claims against us, will please present them for settlement.

ORIGINAL SERMON: PRACTICAL RELIGION.

Preached before the Universalist Society in Rochester, on Sunday morning, November 17, 1839.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

"As we have, therefore, opportunity, let us do good unto all men."—GALATIANS vi: 10.

This exhortation of the illustrious apostle of the Gentiles, is worthy of its pious and indefatigable author, and also of the serious attention and cordial reception of every moral and accountable being. The exalted principles of universal benevolence and reciprocal kindness, are of divine origin, and of indescribable importance to the temporal as well as moral interests of human society. Under their elevating and peace promoting influence, the progress of human enterprise and exertion, ever wears a cheering and prosperous aspect—benefits and accommodations are readily reciprocated—imperfections and failings are overlooked, or charitably palliated—envy, hatred, deception and treachery, with the whole gloomy catalogue of social and moral evils, which derive their origin from dishonesty, covetousness, vain ambition and infidelity, are banished, and not permitted to return to blight and wither the mutual harmony and enjoyment of social and dependent beings. How ardently—how earnestly—how faithfully, therefore, should we labor and strive for the production, establishment and defence of such a state of feeling, motive and action, among our brethren of the human family.

The venerable author of our text, knew well the value and utility of these ennobling virtues and graces. He well knew that they constituted the life spring of all noble and generous actions; and his thorough experience and close observation, enabled him, also, justly to deprecate the sad consequences of the social state, of their violation and abuse. In the former part of his religious career, he had been carefully taught to love his friends and hate his enemies—to do good unto those, and those only, who were of his own nation, creed and church; and to circumscribe all his benevolent feelings and charitable exercises, to the narrow limits of those who paid their stated devotions at the Jewish altar, and were guided by the decisions of the Aaronic priesthood.—He had now, however, learned from that Jesus whom he had, till recently, hated and persecuted in the persons of his innocent followers, a lesson of more extensive benevolence, charity and brotherly kindness. He had become convinced that God was the kind and indulgent Parent of all mankind, and that his protection and grace were co-extensive with his creative power and universal paternity. He had likewise learned what we should all feelingly realize and carefully exemplify, that the character, motives and affections of the human heart, should be conformed as far as possible to the character and perfections of God—that God whom he now recognized as the infinite essence of underived and boundless love and goodness.

Hence, as he was divinely and fully instructed, that God was essentially love—that he was the infinite Father, Benefactor and Saviour of all men—that all men were, therefore, members of one fraternal community, and bound solemnly together in the indissoluble bonds of mutual interest and moral duty—and being aware of the painful fact, that the Galatian brethren, under the influence of Judaizing teachers, were fast retrograding to the partial, limited and uncharitable traditions of their Jewish contemporaries; he felt his devotion to the truth of Heaven, and the cause of oppressed humanity, kindling into a flame upon the consecrated altar of his heart; his enlarged sympathies and extended charities, which, like the paternal love of his God, and the immutable compassion of the Saviour, embraced a world in the outstretched arms of pure affection, operated effectually in his philanthropic breast, and he sits down and writes to his back-sliding brethren, for the two-fold purpose of pointing out to them the injurious errors into which they had fallen, and explaining to them anew the manifest importance and value of those principles of the Christian religion, which they had professed to revere as divine and glorious.

In the commencement of this fraternal epistle, after bestowing upon them his pious benediction, he expresses no ordinary degree of astonishment, that they were so soon after his departure from them, led astray, and involved in the traditional lore of Jewish sentiments and ceremonies, by those half instructed teachers who had corrupted the truth of God, by mixing it with the traditions of men. From this he very seriously declares that, though the commissioned apostles, or even an angel from heaven, should promulgate any other doctrine than that which they had received from him, they would encourage a falsehood, and involve themselves in condemnation. As a justifying reason for this bold declaration, he informs them that he did not receive the truths which he had taught them, from men, but by the direct revelation of Jesus Christ himself, and refers them to his former education, doctrines and persecuting practices, the cruel enterprises he had headed, and of his great fame and success as a champion in the cause of the Jewish high-priesthood. He then proceeds to give them a brief history of his conversion, the commission he had received, the independent course he had pursued, etc.

In the second chapter he proceeds to show them the inefficacy of the Mosaic institutions, in saving them from their sins and giving them the faith and hope of eternal life through Divine grace—calling their attention to what he had said, he addresses them in the following pointed language:—"O, foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you? This only would I learn of you, Received ye the spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Are ye so foolish? having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?"—These were, evidently questions which, in their then present condition, they were unable to answer in any way to justify their spurious sentiments, or recreant conduct, in the author's absence. He then refers them to the doctrine of justification, applied to the heathen through faith, "preached before the Gospel unto Abraham," in this notable promise, "In thy seed shall all nations be blessed." Having given them the necessary instruction on this important subject, he then commences instructing them in relation to the practical duties which they owed to each other and to all men, as brethren of the common family.

In the illustration of the principle of doing good unto all men, as we have opportunity, we may be allowed to notice several particulars of a practical nature and tendency, which are embraced in the preceding context, and append to each a few appropriate remarks.

1. The apostle very feelingly recommends to his Galatian brethren, the constant exercise of reciprocal kindness and forbearance, in the following language. "Brethren, if any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." Here an important practical duty is forcibly recommended; one which can never be overlooked or neglected by moral beings, with impunity. And yet, how often is it the case, that even those who claim to be spiritual, on detecting a neighbor in a fault, instead of "restoring him in the spirit of meekness," not only expose and proclaim his fault, but enlarge and magnify it into a heinous crime? Is this in accordance with the spirit of Christian charity? The fact is, we are all, at best, imperfect beings, prone to mistakes, and follies, and sins. Temptations are scattered around us on every hand, and every person, whether he be overtaken in his faults or not, often takes an oblique step from the path of wisdom and strict virtue.—We should, therefore, upon the principle of worldly policy, if upon no other, practically obey the injunction of the apostle, remembering that we ourselves may be tempted, and fall into error, and may need all that meek, kind and forgiving sympathy from others, which we are required to exercise towards the unfortunate victims of vice and error.

2. In intimate connection with the foregoing, we find another admonition equally full of valuable instruction. It is presented in these words: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." Burdens, arising from the frailty and imperfection of our physical, organic and intellectual nature, must unavoidably bear in some degree upon every child of humanity. As social beings, therefore, we should "weep with those who weep," and when we perceive a fellow-mortal in the bonds of affliction and pain, we should consider ourselves as partners in his sorrows, and strive to impart relief. No matter if he be an enemy, the obligation is equally binding, and its discharge equally beneficial. "If thine enemy hunger," says the apostle, "feed him, if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head." Jesus has set us an example of bearing each other's burdens, in order that his law of brotherly kindness might be more readily fulfilled. He bore our sins in his own body on the cross; and in the amiable character of the good Samaritan, he restored sight to the blind, soundness to the lame, and life to the dead. We can not, it is true, accomplish all that he did in behalf of suffering humanity, but we should ever strive to imitate his benevolent example as far as we are able. To live up to the practical requirement embraced in our text, then, if our own "burdens" be few and light, we should not be so selfish as to exonerate ourselves from assisting to bear away the burdens of others; for in doing as we would be done by, we not only prove ourselves worthy the character of social beings, but we also answer one of the great designs of our present existence, and are found in the way of fulfilling the universal and impartial law of Christ, which is the law of pure love and good will to men.

3. We are next faithfully cautioned against entertaining an exalted opinion of our own attainments and virtues—an opinion which facts will not justify. "If any man," says the apostle, "think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself." Self-deception is evidently the worst deception that mortals ever experienced; particularly that kind of deception which flatters its subjects that they are great.

when they are small, wise when they are ignorant, or morally good, when they are vicious and corrupt. This kind of deception prevails in our world, it is to be feared, in no moderate degree; and the only method of curtailing its power, and counteracting its deleterious influence, is, to enter into a faithful and thorough self-examination, which constitutes the basis of all mental and moral improvements among mankind. But we need not dwell upon the method of avoiding self-deception under this head, as the obvious cure for this evil is immediately prescribed by our apostolic teacher.

4. We are very carefully admonished, in the next place, in the words following: "Let every man prove his own work, then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another."—Here is a perfect antidote against, and cure for, self-deception; and in presenting it, the illustrious author manifests his thorough understanding of the peculiar art of procuring, promoting and perpetuating individual happiness, social improvement, harmony and virtue. The examination of our own work, is too often neglected by us all, for the examination of the works of others. This is not only wrong in itself, but is fraught with the worst of consequences to morality and religion. If we pay that careful and interested attention to our own conduct and career, which the apostle recommends, and which reason and truth approve, we shall have but little time left to investigate, analyze and pass judgment upon, the motives and conduct of our neighbors. If, in the ordinary concerns of the world, it becomes necessary for every individual to devote his attention, especially to the proper direction and control of his own motives and practices, how much more necessary it must certainly be to do so, in the affairs of morality! Without dwelling upon this subject, let us all receive the timely hint, to "prove our own work"—to examine ourselves, whether we are in the path of our personal duty, in preference to descanting upon, and scrutinizing the intentions and labors of others, then "shall we have," as the apostle declares, "rejoicing in ourselves," and not in those by whom we are surrounded, and our rejoicing will be, in the promotion of virtue and peace among men.

5. Closely connected with the foregoing, we are favored with another portion of practical instruction, worthy of all acceptance. "Be not deceived," says our inspired teacher, "God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." That the omniscience of God pervades all worlds, all hearts, and the most secret motives from which all actions proceed, is a truth which, though not sufficiently present to the mind of frail and sinful man, is, nevertheless, perfectly obvious; and therefore every moral and accountable being, should constantly realize, that all his thoughts, words and actions, are fully recognized by the Divine Mind, and estimated according to their true nature and intent. Hence, the great truth, that God is "not mocked," should sink deep into every heart. And, again; that our moral harvest must necessarily partake of the nature of the seed we sow, is as true as it is instructive to erring and presumptuous man. Men do not gather figs from thistles, nor grapes from thorns, and therefore, it is folly and madness for us to anticipate any real enjoyment from sinful indulgences and wicked practices. To sum up this whole matter, the apostle philosophically says—"He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."

6. In perfect harmony with the preceding excellent lessons in moral practice, we have another valuable admonition.—Hear it, and heed it, all! "Let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." It has ever been the misfortune of human nature, to run well for a season in the adopted course of laudable enterprises, but soon to get careless, indifferent and indolent; particularly is this the case in respect to the career of morality and religion. Many start in the Christian race with much apparent feeling and zeal, but, like the children of Israel in leaving Egypt, get discouraged in their encounter of the first seeming obstacle, and think they had better return to the land of bondage from whence they had emerged. But the appropriate imagery here employed by the apostle, by which to simplify and give force to his subject, is admirably adapted to the case of such fainting, halting and double-minded persons, and is well calculated to yield lasting instruction to the tractable and well disposed mind. What would you think of the farmer, who should rise early, press forward in the most industrious manner, and lose no time in preparing his ground and sowing his seed; but because his crop is not ready to gather in on the following month, should grow uneasy, become discouraged, finally despair of reaping the fruits of his labor, and leave his fields to the ravages of his neighbor's flocks and herds? Would you not think the man extremely unreasonable, childish and improvident? You certainly would; and you would say to him, "Friend, you have commenced nobly in your agricultural pursuit, and your prospects are certainly very flattering; you do not yet, it is true, perceive much indication of a remuneration of your toils, but do not despair; you have the Divine promise of seed-time and harvest—watch your fields, keep up your fences, look well to the interest you have at stake, wait patiently, continue faithful and persevering, till the year comes round; for I am fully persuaded, that in "due season" you will, by so doing, reap a bountiful harvest—therefore faint not, but continue faithful. Who does not see that the same principle will perfectly apply in a moral and religious sense? Let us, therefore, never be doubtful, despairing or weary in our labors of love and kindness; for as sure as God lives, and we continue faithful, watchful and persevering in the performance of our social and moral duties, we shall, in due season, receive a rich harvest of reconciliation, peace and joy. But I need not enlarge.

From the foregoing citations and arguments, may we all unitedly adopt the rational and peace-promoting conclusion embraced in our text—"Let us, therefore, as we have opportunity, do good unto all men." Let us remember that the religion of our Redeemer is not only theoretical, but also practical in its nature and requirements.—To do good to our fellow-nature, is an important practical requisition of the Christian religion; and there is no way properly to discharge the obligations of a moral and religious life, without a careful compliance therewith. What are high-wrought pretensions and ostentatious ceremonies, anthems of praise and external decorations, if reciprocal love, and brotherly forbearance and charity be wanting? They are mere sounding brass and tinkling cymbals—deceptive charms and unsold ornaments, which the religion of the meek and humble Jesus will never sanction, and which serve no better purpose, than to pamper pride and hypocrisy, and to mislead the ignorant and the credulous. Even the most perfect speculative faith, can never supply the place of brotherly kindness and charity. "What doth it profit a man," says St. James, "though he say he hath faith, and have not works? can faith save him? If a brother or a sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one say unto them, depart in peace, be ye warmed and fed; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful for the body; what doth it profit? Even so, faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works; show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works. Wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? Was not Abraham our father, justified by works, when he had offered Isaac, his son, upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" O, how important that our faith should be perfected by good works!

He that would fulfil the royal law, or the law of his moral and social nature, must possess a religion that expands the heart with practical love and kindness to his fellow-beings—that prompts him to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick and those in sorrow and affliction, poverty and want—in a word—that constantly admonishes him, "as he has opportunity, to do good unto all men." This is the religion that melts the heart, reforms the affections, and spreads the cement of mutual good will among the frail, erring and needy children of humanity—that wipes away the scalding tears of oppression and grief—that unlooses the heavy burdens which crush the worn pilgrims of earth—that elevates the drooping and desponding minds of the sons and daughters of misfortune and sorrow, and that conforms the life of man to the image of the benevolent Son of God. Such religion disperses the sombre shades that gather around the feverish couch of disease, and pain—overpowers the terrifying influence of the pale messenger of death—lights up in the oppressed soul, the brilliant torch of celestial truth, to guide the trembling spirit through the sable, spectral valley of the shadow of dissolution, to the blissful paradise of unfading light, and joy, and praise, on high. O that every captive slave of error and sin—every blinded devotee of parade, and show, and fashion, might learn the invaluable truth, that true religion consists in humility of heart, fervency of affection, purity of motive, benevolence of action, and unwavering perseverance in love to God, and deeds of practical goodness to man.

In attaining a truly religious character, it should be realized, that we are solemnly bound, not only to do good unto men, but to do good unto ALL men, as opportunity presents. To be properly good, is to imitate that adorable Being who is declared to be "good unto all," and whose "tender mercies are over all his works." No partiality defaces the character of our holy Creator; his love and compassion are co-extensive with his power and paternity. This is the glorious pattern into which every human heart should be moulded. Here is the infallible rule by which our affections, and our secret and social motives and actions, should ever be guided. Although we are justified in approving virtue, and disapprobating vice—in encouraging moral purity, and discouraging depravity and corruption; yet we are to exercise our love and tender sympathies toward all of kindred nature with ourselves—enemies as well as friends, without any material distinction or reserve. The wisdom from above, is "without partiality," and "full of mercy," and such is the wisdom that should "dwell with prudence" in the human heart—such is the wisdom that should ever guide us in our feelings and conduct towards all those by whom we are surrounded in life, and in all our dealings with each other, while our present being is continued.

Partiality in the affections and conduct of man, has ever been the nursing-mother of envy, cruelty, injustice and hatred: its touch is contamination—its breath is infectious—its tread is desolation, and its influence is death! It is a striking characteristic of that wisdom which is from beneath, and which "is earthly, sensual, devilish"—it is an enemy to God—a scourge to humanity—a fiend of darkness and corruption! To detect the least indication of this devastating element of practical depravity, in the life and character of our compassionate Saviour, the misguided devotees to systems of human invention, must ever search in vain; for impartial goodness, universal benevolence, and unrestricted mercy, were fully developed in every breath he breathed, every word he uttered, every act he performed! Contemplate our immaculate Exemplar, giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, health to the sick, speech to the dumb, soundness to the lame, liberty to the captives, and life to the dead! Behold him in the pages of evangelical history, cherishing the traitor Judas in his bosom, pleading with an unbelieving Thomas, weeping over the corrupt city of Jerusalem, and lifting his plaintive voice in prayer to his Father for the forgiveness of his murderers; and you must readily admit, that his whole life, precepts, actions and death, bear demonstrative evidence to the impartiality of his love for the universal family of doubting, erring man.

Brethren and friends—let us studiously strive to copy the invaluable and ever-blessed example of our benevolent and compassionate Redeemer. Let us exercise pity and compassion for the poor, the needy, the afflicted and the oppressed. Let the hand of relief accompany our charitable feelings, and the tongue of fraternal love, speak consolation to the mourning heart; while, with the finger of truth, we point all who are sinking in the turbid waters of despair, to the holy "Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world," and will ultimately place a ransomed universe of intelligences around the throne of God, where, crowned with immortality, they shall enjoy the beatific visions of an uninterrupted and glorious eternity. Thus shall we adorn and exemplify the exalted and peace-inspiring principles of moral virtue and pure religion—recommend by our daily practice, the divine economy of the Christian faith—answer the valuable end for which our existence was designed—fulfil the reasonable requirements of our heavenly Father, and thus be suitably prepared to bid adieu to the scenes of time, and the numerous objects of our kindest feelings, on the holy triumph of that "faith which works by love"—that hope which is full of immortality, and that charity which is the bond of perfection. AMEN.

DIVINE OBLIGATIONS.

BR. GROSH.—It is some time since I troubled you and the readers of the Advocate, with any thing from my pen. Indeed, my dear sir, I do not often offer any thing in this way—"only when I can't help it." I am now, in one sense, compelled to put forth a few remarks, and queries, prompted thereto, from listening to a Presbyterian prayer, and sermon, last Sunday, (the 1st Dec.)—Among the many gim cracks (figuratively speaking) that he exhibited to the view of his hearers, one of them led me into a serious train of reflection. He said, "that God was under no obligation to provide for the salvation of even one of the fallen race of Adam." By the most of men, this doctrine might be thought correct, at the first glance, because it would probably strike their minds that the Supreme Being could not possibly be under an obligation to an inferior being created by Himself—uninfluenced thereby by any thing but the wisdom of his own mind. But would this hasty conclusion be a true one? It may be that I am taking a bold stand, when I say that I doubt its truth. Be it understood, however, that in taking this stand, I do so, with all the reverence due from a creature to his Creator, and not from a vain notion that there is any unnatural constraint upon the Deity. But let us now look at the subject, and some of its bearings, at least so that, if possible, we may understand it.

It is admitted by all denominations of Christians, that God is infinite in wisdom, and infinite in goodness. We have then a God perfectly wise, and perfectly good. Now this wise and good God creates a race of beings denominated men. He endows them with sentient perceptions, and sensuous feelings. He has so constructed them as to make happiness the grand object of their existence; but has he given them the power to attain this happiness without assistance—without his assistance? Should any say that he has, I deny the assertion. The dealings of God, are not—"yea, yea; and nay, nay; but yea and amen." Having then created us too weak and feeble to attain the great object of our desires—desires that he gave us, Himself—in what safety, or in what position, do we stand, unless God, when he created us, placed Himself under a moral obligation to bestow upon us the fruit of that desire which He so strongly implanted in our natures? Should any say that God has only placed himself under an obligation to save a part of his sentient creatures in attaining that which he has prompted all to desire, it would not be coming up to the perfect attributes of the Deity, but at least be subtracting a portion of his goodness, and making less than infinite that glorious feature in the character of our God! Besides, it would be giving to God an attribute that no one dare say in so many words, belongs to Him; to wit—partiality!

Moreover, God has so arranged the system of nature, from Himself downwards, so as to continue many analogies pointing to Himself—so that inferior beings might at least obtain a glimpse of his character.

Suppose now an earthly parent with a number of children. He has at least been a secondary cause of this earthly existence. Let me ask—Is he not under an obligation to provide for them, and to the utmost of his power, promote their happiness in the scale of being to which he has introduced them? I do not believe there is a man on the globe, possessing a sound mind and common sense, be he Pagan, or Christian, but what would respond in the affirmative to this question—nay, this is not all there is about it, they will all admit that it is a just, a good, and a righteous, principle. Whence came it then if it did not come from God, and partake of his nature? If an objector should say, that God has laid man under this good obligation to his earthly progeny, but is under no such obligation himself, in regard to their spiritual happiness, it would, in effect, be saying that man possessed one good trait in his character, that God did not possess in his!

But, says another objector, this is all carnal reasoning—(this is the knock-down resort with all objectors to an impartial goodness of God, when they get fairly drove into the little end of the horn;) let me have some proof from the Scriptures, that the position you have taken, can be sustained. Among the many texts that may be offered in confirmation of the position we are inquiring into, to make the matter short, we shall select but one.

Gen xxii. 16, 17, 18.—"By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

But lest there should be some caviling about the extent of this promise, God reiterated it to Isaac and Jacob, including all the families and kindreds of the earth: and being sworn to—and "because God could swear by no greater he swore by himself"—is it not reasonable to conclude that God, from his nature which is love, has placed himself under an obligation to make holy and happy the whole race of man? "Is God a man that he should lie?" or a cheat that he should deceive? None dare say, in so many words, that he is either; yet, the creeds, the preaching, and the practice, of professing Christians, go to affirm, in effect, that he will both lie and cheat!

It will be perceived that I have gone no farther back than Abraham for written testimony. It may be found, however, in a transaction that took place in the garden of Eden. But it seems to me that the Gospel has so clearly and fully made known the character of our Heavenly Father, that to know that he is perfectly good, perfectly wise, and infinite in power, is sufficient to convince any candid mind, that such a Being could not create intelligent creatures at random; because his goodness would put him under an obligation to provide for their ultimate happiness. And here I leave the subject to the candid inquirer. J. K. Sheshequin.

SAVE POSTAGE.

We never regret paying necessary postage on the communications of our correspondents; but, in their anxiety to save us postage, they sometimes put us to unnecessary expence. For instance, Br. C. S. used a large sheet of paper, but it was very thick, and therefore reached to one ounce in weight. The consequence was, that his articles, which might easily have been put on two sheets of letter paper, and would then have cost us only 38 cents, cost us 75 cents—the single sheet being subject to four postages, by reason of its weight. Those who use large sheets should be certain that they do not weigh more than three-fourths of an ounce. Again—Br. A. C. B. sent us three well written sheets of cap paper, and paid three postages on it, being one for each sheet—but on weighing the letter it weighed one ounce and a quarter, so that we had to pay two postages additional on it. Thus the three sheets in one letter, cost him and us unitedly, 50 cents; whereas, if the three sheets had been sent in separate letters, they would not have cost more than 30 cents. These are trifles, it is true, but many such trifles in a year are worth saving. Remember, then, postage is reckoned by pieces, until the letter reaches one ounce, when it is reckoned by weight, at the rate of four postages to the ounce. A. B. G.

AGENTS

Are requested to insist on the immediate settlements of all accounts for back volumes of the paper. The amount to each individual is small, while to us the aggregate is great, and, need we repeat, greatly needed, and the sooner settled the better for all parties. G. & H.

BOOKS IN ALBANY

Br. N. R. French, 29 Green-st., Albany, is prepared to furnish our friends with Universalist books. He intends to keep a constant supply.

Br. Baker of Buffalo is informed that we sent 50 Registers some time since by the cars, to be forwarded from Auburn by stage. We have now sent 50 more, and hope at least one package will arrive safe.

Br. O. Wilcox writes us that Br. Whelpley has been prevented from fulfilling his appointments in Lewis county, by sickness, under which he has been laboring for some time, and from which he has not yet recovered. His friends, therefore, will understand why he has disappointed them.

Br. Bazin—Credit Wm. Per Lee, P. M., North Norwich, $2, and send him the January number of Expositor—also, credit Rev. S. Goff, Alexander, Genesee county, $2—charge both to this office.

Br. Tompkins—Credit O. Pinney, Beaver, Deaver county, Pa., $4.00—Mrs. E. Johnson, Onondaga, $2.00—L. Y. Avery, Salina, on current vol. $2.00—Alvin White, Utica, $4.50, and charge all to this office. Send Repository, current volume, to Miss Fatiene Russell, Carroll—and send No. for December, 1838, to Rev. O. Roberts, Lakeville; and to Miss L. Agler, and Mrs. Gilbert, both of Conesus—as none of these received that number.

Br. Price—Transfer Gad Chapin's (folio) to L. D. Pearson, and send G. C. the octavo Union—credit Mr. Pearson $2.00, Chapin 50 cts., and Dr. Wetherford, $1.00—all of Louisville, Ky.—and charge G. & H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. T. D. Cook, in Vernon, and by Br. G. W. Gage, in this city.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. HOLLAND, in Binghampton, day and evening—Br. Stas, at Perch River, and in Depauville in the evening—Br. S. J. Grason, in South New-Berlin—Br. O. Wilcox, in Ellisburg, and in Adams in the evening.

Br. Stas, will preach on the evenings of February 10th, in Black River village—11th, in Fuller Settlement—12th, in Theresa—13th, in the school house near Br. Lawrence's.

The third Conference of the Albany Association will be held at Cold Creek, in the town of Hume, on the second Saturday and Sunday in February.

The second Quarterly Conference of the Ontario Association, will be held in Lakeville, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in the present month.

BENEVOLENCE DISPLAYED IN THE WORKS OF NATURE.

BY B. BIRDSALL.

Whatever subject is connected with the study of nature, has claims upon our attention. We receive from her through the medium of the senses, the elements of all our knowledge. It is the combination of these elements, which forms that pleasing and delightful exercise of the mind, which pertains to the study of the natural sciences.—The study of nature, besides being pleasing and interesting, is instructive in the highest degree. Here we have a test, which is a continual corrective to the imagination. Fancy may lead from the path of truth, but the error is immediately corrected, when we perceive the disagreement between it and some immutable law of nature.—The logician finds no process of reasoning more interesting or instructive than that whose premises are drawn from nature. The metaphysician is never more happy in his illustrations, than when he is able to show an analogy between his cause and some natural phenomena. The lover of natural science, has only to taste its sweets to fix the direction of his mind. In whatever department he chooses to carry his investigation, he can there find his account; all is pleasing, delightful, and instructive. You cannot convince the astronomer that he can yield a more solemn and reverential attention to God, than when he is admiring the "majesty of the heavens." Benevolence, in however favorable light it may be exhibited, as forming one of the component parts of the human character, can not anywhere be manifested in a more striking manner, than in the works of nature.

It has ever been considered by the wise and good as one of the noblest features of the mind. It is essential to dignity of character. Even if the sentiment were not innate, man would learn to be benevolent, were his lessons taken from nature: she shows it in her productions, in her designs, and in her general economy; but it is the capability which is given to us of perceiving the beautiful relations and adaptations of things to each other, her magnificent scenery, her wonderful designs, and her remarkable care for every creature, which crowns all her manifestations of good will. Every animal has means of defence, which were given to it by some kind and protecting power. The little infant has no traits of character more strongly manifested than innocence and fear. Ignorant of the dangers by which it is surrounded, destitute of matured reason and experience, it would be constantly liable to destruction from every quarter, were it not that some kind and protecting power, had early implanted in its disposition, the intuitive principle of fear. Accordingly its approach to every thing with which it is unacquainted, is marked with extreme caution. Every new thing terrifies it.—As it increases in age, fear gradually gives way to reason and experience, for these are now competent to protect from danger, and hence the excessive caution of early childhood is not necessary. Here benevolence is displayed in an eminent degree. Intuitive fear in youth, reason and experience in after life, are equally competent to protect from danger. That refined and elevated happiness, which results from a proper exercise of the moral and intellectual faculties, displays in a very striking manner the benevolence of the Creator, as the author of our susceptibility of being happy.

That active spirit which goes in search of misery that lies concealed from the public view, is likewise worthy of great commendation. Those sufferers of the human race who endeavor to conceal their wants and misery from the public gaze, and are ashamed to beg, are the true objects of charity. The silence of these speak louder to the truly benevolent man, than all the trumplings of noisy beggars that walk the earth. Two kinds of benevolence are exhibited in the social condition of man. One is not influenced by any selfish motive; the other is dictated by private gain. The former is benevolence in every sense of the word; the latter can not with propriety be called so, for how can an action be said to be benevolent, which originated in selfishness, and merely wears the cloak for the purposes of hypocrisy? Hence, instead of saying there is no disinterested benevolence, we can with more propriety say, all is disinterested. The benevolence of man is frequently alloyed with selfishness, but that displayed in the works of nature, is of a far different character. No element of selfishness can enter here to produce debasement. The sun shines not for himself; he freely gives his light and heat to all things which need them, and asks no recompense in return. The tree groans beneath its load of fruit, but claims not the least share for itself, yielding it all to those who need it. The dew falls not for itself. In the gentle shower, the rain descends not on its own account, but kindly to offer nourishment and assistance to all things which can not live without its aids. The atmosphere circulates not for itself, but for the benefit of the living. Were it not for the annual and diurnal revolutions of the earth, we should be exposed, either to the perpetual and scorching rays of the sun, or be buried in the gloomy depths of everlasting darkness; we should be exposed either to the continual and piercing cold of winter, or to the intolerable heat of a never ending summer. Universal ruin would be the inevitable result, desolation would mark the face of things, and utter extinction of life would complete the scene of destruction. Now what prevents such a calamity? Some kind, protecting hand, has given the earth two motions, one on its axis which causes the succession of day and night, the other in its orbit around the sun, which, together with the inclination of the ecliptic, causes the change of the seasons. What recompense does this kind and protecting power ask for all these favors? Go to the altar of benevolence, and ask her what sacrifice you are to make at her shrine as a return for all the kindness which she has shown, and instead of requiring a sacrifice at your hands, her only answer will be, in bestowing another free gift, another blessing.

Such is the character of benevolence as exhibited in nature. Whatever contributes to happiness, must be referred to some kind and overruling power. The operations of the mind are well calculated to exhibit the benevolence of the Creator. The mind delights in looking forward to future bliss. Whatever is beautiful, grand, or sublime, is directly a source of enjoyment. The benevolent mind finds delight in relieving the wants of the poor and needy. There is delight in combining the elements which constitute a process of reasoning. Fear may be indirectly a source of enjoyment. The greatest calamities teach us how to appreciate the good, by placing it in contrast with evil, and thus the elements of misery may indirectly be promotive of happiness. The fond mother is greatly afflicted at the loss of her child; the most distressing feelings agitate her mind—feelings whose index is the falling tear. Distress, and gloom, and sorrow and anguish, for a little season absorb every other emotion; yet were she deprived of her tender affections, she would be less capable of enjoying happiness. Were it not for these sympathies, she could take no comfort in social life; it is better therefore on the whole, to be subjected to temporary grief, than to be deprived of the great sources of enjoyment.

But some may object to the view in which things have been exhibited, as if the objector should say, if all nature manifests good will to man, and if every principle in her economy is calculated to make him happy, and is so benevolent, so good, and so conducive to comfort and enjoyment, how do you account for all the misery in the world? you have exhibited only the fair side of the picture. In answer to this inquiry, it may be said, that we must know evil in order to appreciate goodness. Were it not for evil we could have no data, by which to distinguish goodness. If we had never tasted any thing sour, we never could have known the difference between that and sweetness. If we never had known darkness, how could we appreciate the glories of the rising sun? If we never had experienced anything of benevolence, we never could have known any thing of benevolence. If we never had experienced pain or misery, we never could have known that happiness was happiness, that good was different from evil. Any one who knows not that fire will burn, knows not the difference between being in the fire and out of it. From these premises it follows, that in order to know the difference between two conditions, it is necessary to know something of both: also, that a knowledge of happiness, requires a knowledge of evil. Now, if no evil had been introduced into the world, what a blissful place it would be! All the world, perfectly happy without being conscious of it—like the inanimate clod, happy without knowing it, man would be so too. How do we arrive at a knowledge of the difference of things? It is by means of their opposite qualities. Good and evil are opposite qualities. If there had been no difference in the qualities of things, we could have no means of distinguishing them, and he who knows the difference between two things, knows just nothing at all. Hence opposite qualities in things, are essential to our knowledge of them. Viewing the subject in this light, it is easy to conclude that the introduction of evil into the world, is an act of benevolence in the Creator, as it may in the end conduce to more happiness, by teaching man to place a just value upon goodness by contrasting it with evil. To conclude, it would be impeaching the goodness of the Creator, to complain of the hardness of our lot, or to call this beautiful earth, "a vale of tears." We have the fair and beautiful face of creation spread out before us, and the magnificent and star spangled vault of heaven over our heads. We have the glorious sun; transcendent in his beauties; rising every day to give us light, heat, and comfort. We have the gentle shower and evening dew, to fertilize the earth. We occupy a most beautiful sphere, third in order from the sun, and rolling in "majestic grandeur" around him in her orbit. Finally, we have an unknown incomprehensible Being, who sits enthroned amidst the works of nature, sustains her operations, and manifests the greatest benevolence to every living thing.

SALVATION AND DAMNATION.

BY C. WORDEN.

"The Gospel of Christ—the power of God unto" damnation "to every one that" "dis-believeth."

Perhaps the reader of this article may be somewhat astonished at the misconstruction of this passage, and decidedly reprobate the writer for thus perverting the language of holy Writ. But let me tell you, gentle reader, to be careful how you condemn that in others, which you approve in yourself! "Let him that is without sin, cast the first stone."

The construction and arrangement which I have given to the passage, contained in Romans 1:16, is in perfect harmony with the doctrine of the popular clergy, and the teachings of the advocates of endless misery at the present day. For say they, when the heralds of the cross go forth and publish the glorious Gospel of Christ to mankind, if they will hearken, believe, and comply with its requisitions, well—who-soever doeth this shall be saved; "but he that believeth not shall be damned." But what does this damnation consist in? Why a burning hell in a future state of existence; eternal punishment in the regions of the damned, with the devil and his angels; everlasting banishment from the presence of God, is the reply! Now if this idea be correct if the damnation resulting from a disbelief in or non-acceptance of the Gospel, ("ho that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," be endless torment, in a future state, then it is perfectly obvious to every intelligent mind, that before the promulgation of the Gospel, all mankind were secure from this bottomless pit. Because if disbelieving or rejecting the Gospel when tendered, excludes one from future bliss, and dooms him to endless woe; surely he must have been in possession of the former, and free from the latter, before receiving a knowledge of the Gospel, or else the language is absurd. If an individual had committed some heinous crime, and been sentenced to prison during life, would it not be preposterous in the extreme, to say that any offence thereafter committed, which would have incurred the same sentence under which he then existed, did actually accomplish it? Or in other words, to talk about sentencing one to prison, when his sentence is actually sealed; or condemning one to endless punishment, when already thus condemned, would be an utter violation of reason, itself! Hence according to the popular creed of the day, the Gospel of Christ is the power of God unto eternal damnation to every one that disbelieveth it.

Now how much better would it be to believe that the Gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth—not salvation from hell fire in a future state, but from sin, and its bitter consequences here, from the peace-destroying idea, that our Almighty Creator is a cruel, and vindictive being who hates the children of his creation with a malicious, and infinite hatred, also from the fear of death, by the assurance of a glorious immortality beyond the grave? Are we not warranted in believing that the damnation pronounced upon those who disbelieved the Apostles' happy tidings, when commissioned to go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature, consisted not in chaining down immortal souls beneath the ire of God's wrath to all eternity, but condemnation for their erroneous principles, and evil practices? "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil."

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

"Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil." Hebrews vi. 13. "Which hope,"—what hope, reader! Let us search and see. "For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself." 13 ver. What did he swear? Ans. "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord; . . . that in blessing I will bless thee, . . . and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." (Gen. xxii; 16, 17, 18.) How were all the nations of the earth to be blessed? Ans. "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindred of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God having raised up Jesus, sent him to bless you in TURNING AWAY EVERY ONE OF YOU FROM HIS INIQUITIES. (Acts iii: 25, 26.) God has sworn that in the seed of Abraham all the nations and kindreds of the earth shall be blessed, by being turned away from their iniquities. Why did God swear this? Ans. "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise, the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." (Heb. vi. 17, 18.) that is, the hope of the promised blessing, "which hope we have as an anchor to the soul," etc., and which God has confirmed by an oath, that we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon that hope.

O, reader what a glorious hope is this! A hope based upon the oath of the Great Eternal! A hope which anchors the soul to the throne of the immaculate Divinity! A hope which extends across the Jordan of death, "and which entereth into that within the veil! A hope which encircles all the nation and kindreds of the earth, and which shall turn them away from their iniquities, and crown them with immortal bliss. O, what what a strong consolation! This is the hope and the consolation of the Christian. It is this that comforts him in the hour of affliction, and gives him courage to press forward through the dark valley and shadow of death. It is this, that speaks peace to his troubled mind, and fills his soul with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Reader! what strange hope, what stronger consolation could you ask than the oath of Jehovah? Is not his promise sure? "Hath he said and shall he not do it?" Yes, he shall do it, for he cannot lie." The Christians hope is strong and secure. It shall never fail, for it is built upon a rock, "and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." It shall stand till old ocean shall cease to roll, till nature shall sink in years, and till time shall be no more. Then shall "death be swallowed up in victory," and hope in endless reality. A. F.

THE RESULT.

Br. Grosh, in his letter to the Rev. Messrs. Fowler, Savage and Eldridge, addressed to them during the last great protracted meeting held in this city, concerning the manner in which said meeting was conducted, used the following language—"You must judge for yourselves whether such excitements do not lessen the Christian's relish for the ordinary means of grace—whether indifferentists, scoffers and skeptics, are not furnished with weapons to undermine the faith of many—and whether the rational man, possessing a merely traditional faith in Christianity, may not become disgusted with every thing bearing the name of religion." We all know with what scorn and contempt Br. Grosh's letter was spoken of both in and out of the pulpit, at that time. But time, that great trier of all things, has abundantly shown, and shown, too, to the mortification of two at least of the clergymen addressed, that what Br. Grosh intimated was likely to take place, has in reality come to pass, viz., a disrelish for the ordinary or usual means of moral and religious improvement. It is a fact which can not in truth be denied, that there has not been, for the last ten or fifteen years, so great a coldness, such a general apathy and indifference in the churches of this city, in regard to religious matters, as at this present time. This, the sincere and candid of the Partialists themselves admit and deplore—and they now, at least many of them do, look upon the present state of things as the result of that very meeting. But Utica is not the only place in which the deleterious effects of these whirlwinds of fanaticism have been seen and felt. Churches in other sections of our country have been so injured by them, that individuals of talent and influence, connected with Partialist denominations, have been constrained to utter their voices against them. The Rev. Mr. Johnson, Rector of St. John's church, Brooklyn, has given his opinion of these meetings thus—"The revival system has done injury to the cause of religion. I do not mean to condemn that increased, and special attention to the subject of real religion, which frequently attends the faithful exhibition of Gospel truth, and the use of the appointed means of divine grace. God forbid! But when I say revival system, I mean specially to refer to that system begun a few years ago, and which like a Siroc has desolated the land! There can not be the shadow of doubt, that such extravagances countenanced as they have been, by men held high in the estimation of these numerous sects, have caused some to become indifferent, others to doubt and hesitate, and many, very many, to discard the claims of the religion of Christ."

The Rev. Mr. Kirk, of Albany, who was once the most fanatical of fanatics, and who is well remembered here as having been a conductor of one of these very excitements, has seen his error, and expressed himself in the following manner—"The effects of the labors of evangelists (meaning vagrant revival preachers) are often most disastrous. They make a few sermons on a few favorite, exciting subjects—go into a place—produce an excitement—make the impression that the minister is a dull, cold-hearted man—break up the people—this makes them feel that they must take hold and do their work, while the evangelist is with them. When he leaves, the excitement abates—the work is abandoned. This is fatal to the interests of religion." Says Dr. Beecher, who was once, as we all know, a great friend to these excitements, "These evangelists are like those who break up civil governments. The influence of evangelists is to break up the established system and order of Christ's house—they distract the church and destroy the ministry."

A writer in the Christian Advocate and Journal, gives the following doleful account of the effects of these excitements—"During the great revivals with which the different churches were favored, many persons were pressed into the societies without due regard to their fitness for membership. This was the case with all the leading denominations in our country. Indeed there seemed to be in many places a vying with each other, not to say strife, for the ascendancy in numbers and influence. Never shall I forget scenes of this description; the anxious seats and altars were supplied, and church books and class papers filled by a kind of violence. This process took the rounds, and was kept up by protracted meetings and other extra efforts, for months in succession. This state of things is succeeded by a loose tone of feeling, analogous to the human body after extreme excitement—a spirit of slumber. The consequence is, the church has lost the power to command the confidence of the world. It is no longer to the extent it formerly was, the light of the world. Communion with God is lost—the house of God is abandoned—its ministry and ordinances neglected and slighted. The Holy Bible is superseded by newspapers and novels, and other productions, calculated to vitiate the taste, corrupt the heart, and estrange it from God and all good. O, the times! the times! God save the church." Verily they have their reward—and it is just what they might have expected. When churches that profess to have named the name of Christ, so far forget what belongs to the religion of Jesus, that instead of teaching sinners the way of truth and holiness, that instead of teaching mankind to deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God, they resort to every expedient, fair and unfair, to every low, mean and unjustifiable artifice, to augment their numbers, for the purpose of making a great sound in the world as to numerical strength, then they must expect that as sure as there is a God in heaven that takes cognizance of the doings and actions of men, as sure as there is a God that judgeth to the earth, their iniquities will be visited with a rod, and their transgressions with stripes.

INDIVIDUAL INFLUENCE. NO. III.

"I declare it is too bad—the meeting-house has not been swept for three months—there are half-a-dozen panes of glass broken, and all the heat escapes through them, and the open scuttle above; and then there is nothing but green wood to burn! I do wish that some one would get up a subscription, or have the trustees do it, that the house might be properly cleaned and warmed."

Certainly, in this cold weather such a consummation is to be most devoutly wished for, and as you have so critically noticed these wants, and so feelingly deplore them, suppose you set about getting them repaired. "I—I do it! no—no—let some older and more influential person undertake it." But as it does not require an ocean to drown a fly, nor a tempest to float a thistle down, so it does not require a very, very influential person to do such a small amount of business as this. Wait until the society needs a new house to meet in, and then we will call on the very influential members to move first in the action. "But what would people say if I meddled in this business, when I am not even a member of the society, but only one of the congregation?" Say? why, if they told the truth, they would say, that if you could not pay much toward supporting preaching, you could make yourself useful in keeping things right, and making people comfortable. They would say, that you did not regard taking a little trouble, when you could do some good thereby. They would say that they only wished there were more like you in the congregation, for then the horses would not long be without comfortable sheds in this cold weather—nor the preacher without his dues—nor the poor around us without aid. This is what they would say; so, go and get your broom and sweep the house—get some one to go and shut the scuttle—and then go to the trustees, and give them no peace till they mend the windows, and get a supply of good wood for the stove. Do have self-confidence enough to be of some use in the society.

REV. ALBERT BARNES.

In the number of this paper for the 6th of December ult., two very interesting extracts were made, by one of the Corresponding Editors, from the writings of the above named gentleman; and he was highly and deservedly complimented for the liberality of said extracts. The first was of the importance and necessity of reason, and the great injury done to the credit and cause of religion by the frequent and unmeasured abuse and denunciation of reason by the theological tyros. It is taken from his Introductory Essay on Butler's Analogy. The second was on the importance and necessity of full, free, and untrammelled discussion and thorough investigation upon all important subjects, in which he entirely repudiates that sickly cowardice, that weak and disgraceful pusillanimity, that deters many professed theologians from fully investigating certain points of doctrine on account of their sacredness, as though they were so sacred we should not meddle with them on any account, or seek to ascertain either their truth or falsehood! This extract is from Mr. Barnes' Address at Hamilton College, in 1836.

No enlarged and liberal mind can read and attentively consider the extracts here referred to, without fully responding to the noble sentiments thereof, and rejoicing to see them emanating from such a source. Yea, he will desire their general and universal prevalence, as being calculated to disenthral the mind from the mental bondage of ages, dignify human nature and exalt our race from theological pignies to moral and intellectual giants.

Since reading the extracts here mentioned, I have perused the whole of Barnes' Introductory Essay to Butler's Analogy; and I can not but admire, more and more, the talents and independence of the author. In this Essay there are many valuable and precious gems of the very first water, gems that ought by no means to be lost or lie hidden in the tomes of orthodoxy, so called, where, in general, they find so little that is congenial with their own boldness, truth and freedom. From the many and valuable things contained in said Essay, I select the following, as one of the best and truest. After speaking of the various systems, forms and technicalities, by which theology is taught in the schools; of the injustice done both to truth and the mind of the pupil by such a course; of the fact that truth lies scattered here and there over all the volumes of nature and revelation; that it is to be gathered up and properly regarded wherever found, and not first squared and hewed till it will fit a particular niche in the theological system of some modern creed-maker; and of the honor due to those who first discover and lay open a rich vein of truth undisguised by human invention or perversion; he says—

"We honor the toils of a man who tells of the uses, beauties and medicinal properties of the plant, far more than of him who merely declares its rank, its order, its class in the Linnæan system. So in theology, we admire the greatness of mind which can bring out an original truth, illustrate it, and show its proper bearing on the spiritual interests of our race, far more than we do the plodding chiseller who shapes it to its place in his system. It makes no small demand on our patience, when we see the system-maker remove angle after angle, and apply stroke after stroke, to some great mass of truth which a mighty genius has struck out, but which keen-eyed and jealous orthodoxy will not admit to its proper bearing on the souls of men, until it is located in a creed, and cramped into some frame-work of faith, that has been reared around the Bible. Our sympathy with such men as Butler, and Chalmers, and Foster, and Hall, is far greater than with Tarretine or Ridgely.—With still less patience do we listen to those whose only business it is to shape and reduce to prescribed form; who never look at a passage in the Bible or a fact in nature, without first robbing it of its freshness, by an attempt to give it a sectarian location:—who never stumble on an original and unclassified idea, without asking whether the system-maker has left any niche for the late-born intruder; and who applies to it all tests, as to a non-descript substance in chymistry, in order to fasten on it the charge of an affinity with some rejected confession, or some creed of a suspected name. This is to abuse reason and revelation, for the sake of putting honor on creeds. It is to suppose that the older creed-makers had before them all shades of thought, all material and mental facts, all knowledge of what mind has been and can be, and all other knowledge of the adapt- edness of the Bible, to every enlarged and fluctuating process of thought! It is to doom the theologian to an eternal dwelling in Greenland frost and snows, instead of sending him forth to breathe the mild air of freedom, and to make him a large-minded and fearless interpreter of the oracles of God."

We can not too highly commend the justice, liberality and freedom of the above extract. And we could fain wish that the Presbyterian denomination (to which Mr. B. belongs) would ponder upon the same, imbibe its spirit and act upon its noble liberality. Nay, we could wish even that Br. B. himself had always kept in view the principles here laid down, and that even in this very Essay he had not been so far blinded by tradition and the trammels of a creed as to forget his avowed principles and commit the very fault which he so pointedly condemns in others. That he is thus blinded to the truth by his own creed, or system, I propose to show by further extracts from the said Essay in a future article. In the mean time we will take another beautiful gem from his Essay in perfect harmony with our own views, and as opposite to the Presbyterian Confession of faith, as are the poles to each other. Speaking of the grounds on which the early advocates of Calvinism undertook to defend that system, he says:—

"But when they told of imputing the sin of one man to another, and of holding that other to be personally answerable for it, it is no wonder that such minds as that of Butler recoiled, for there is nothing like this in nature. When they affirmed, that men have no power to do the will of God, and yet will be damned for not doing what they have no capacity to perform, it is no wonder that he started back, and refused to attempt to find an analogy; for it is unlike the common sense of men.—When they told of a limited atonement—of confining the original applicability of the blood of Christ to the elect alone, there was no analogy to this, in all the dealings of God towards sinners; in the sun-beam, in the dew, the rain, in running rivulets or oceans; and here Butler must stop, for the analogy could go no further upon the then prevalent notions of theology."

To the above add the following:—

"How grand the completion of the system—man lord of all, clothed with power over the bursting millions, the priest of this new creation rendering homage to its Great Sovereign Lord, and 'extolling him first, him midst, and him without end.' Like beauty and grandeur, we expect will come out of this deranged moral system. Our eye loves to trace its development. With tears we look back on 'Paradise Lost'—with exultation we trace the unfolding elements of a process that shall soon exhibit the beauty and grandeur of 'Paradise regained.'"

I will not mar the beauty of the above extracts now, by copying any of the crude inconsistencies which Mr. B. introduces in some other parts of his Essay, but leave that task for a future number. In the mean time let us not lose nor undervalue the good things which which he says above.

TRUTH TRIUMPHANT.

"Truth crushed to earth, will rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshippers."

Truth! how much is meant by that single word!—Blot truth from the moral firmament, and how little would remain of the universe of God. Or, rather, of that which remained; how little would be the worth.—How dark—how mysteriously inscrutable would be every object that greeted the eye of man. How undefinable every voice that now chimes upon his ear. Methinks that angels would turn away in disgust from the contemplation of a scene so forbidding, and seek to hide their senses in the dark shade of oblivion, rather than recognize the non-existence of truth. Let fancy exert its power for a moment, in the creation of an ideal perfection. Exalt it as high as you please; examine it in every possible contingency, and see that it possesses every virtue and every excellent quality; let nothing escape your notice which can be bettered, let nothing be left undone which can add to its value; and when you have done all this, deprive it of the principles of truth, and what is it? A mere mockery! A thing without a name! A mass of incongruous and worthless properties, which contain within themselves the seeds of their own destruction—which, though they may flatter the giddy parasite, leave a sting which they can not heal.

Is there truth in nature? Can there be aught but truth there? Look upon the countenance of a friend. It is not for its mere outward beauty that you admire it most. It is for something of more value. It is to you an index of that which is imperishable. Would you love that smile if it was not the token of an open and a generous heart? Would you dwell upon the lustre of that eye, if it did not speak with the language and power of intellect—if it did not reveal the mighty workings of mind? What generosity is to the smile—what intellect is to the eye, truth is to the ways of God in nature. It is nature's oracle. Without it all her teachings would be meaningless; all her power, weakness; all her beauty, deformity. But truth does pervade all things that have not been tainted by the breath of ungodly men. The ancient singer says, "Thy mercy is great unto the heavens, and thy truth unto the clouds." And we may take up the theme which the Psalmist has opened before us, and trace this principle in all the works of God. Or rather, we may follow him while we have the light of truth to guide us into more brilliant and beautiful rays—for we can not penetrate the laws of God, and find where truth is not. It makes its temple amid the winds of heaven, and seeks a habitation in the silence of the spheres. It is heard in the sound of the tempest when it proclaims that God is there, and in the still small voice which whispers of love immutable and impartial. It gives the purest fragrance to the incense of an innocent heart, and it is written in burning characters in the condemnation of him who rejects its teachings and scorns its invitations.

Great men have sought it in all their investigations; and the ardor, the faithfulness, the untiring zeal with which they prosecuted their inquiries, showed how deep were their convictions that it existed to an extent far greater than any thing to which they had attained. And the joy with which they hailed every development of its power, was an indication of their readiness to enter still deeper into the arcana of truth. Newton had a mind that could hold converse with the stars, walk in the pathway of revolving worlds, and trace out the silent and invisible, yet mighty influences of the laws of gravity. And well was that mind employed. His very familiarity with the material placed him at such a distance from his contemporaries, that he seemed to approximate to the spiritual and immaterial. And so he did in one sense. Truth, eternal truth was his object, and toward that was his eye directed in all his attainments. Franklin shrunk not from the fearful element, but played with the lightning's flash, as a child plays with the glittering of the gilded bauble, but with a higher and a nobler aim. And why should he shrink, when he felt that truth was just within his grasp? Gall and Spurzheim took another field, and called man to the contemplation of his own nobler powers. They sought truth, where it had scarcely been dreamed of before, in the very faculties which enables man to perceive truth. The truth which they sought was the true philosophy of mind. Theirs was truth with reference to the moral and the intellectual. It was truth with reference to that which knows, and appreciates, and retains. And in all the investigations which have ever been made, the result has shown the unfailing triumph of truth. All the error, all the opposition, all the prejudice that could be arrayed against it, could not tarnish its glory in the eyes of those who had witnessed its rays—could not successfully prevent its onward progress. It was and always must be triumphant over error. And we feel especially assured of this result, in view of the extent of its prevalence in all the dealings of God, as far as the human eye has been able to see, or the human mind to understand them.

Now reflect that with all the wonderful teachings of nature, there is not a single truth recorded upon her page, but what goes forth in corroboration of revealed truth—not a single jarring element between nature and revelation when they are rightly understood; reflect that truth is never inconsistent with itself, and can not be, for it is co-eval with God's existence, and how brightly shines the page of inspiration! How joyously can we dwell upon its holy teachings! We may imagine that there is a fearful desolation sweeping over God's moral heritage, but his truth tells us that it operates as the refiner's fire and the purifier of silver. We may deeply lament that the seeds of disobedience, and ingratitude, and moral blindness have been sown so thickly in the hearts of men, but the spirit of truth tells us that "every plant which our heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up;" nor are we to suppose that the heart is to be made forever desolate with it, for "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as a rose." Yes, truth shall triumph. Error must recede, as it has done, from before its victorious advance. Vice, ignorance, error, every thing that is opposed to truth, must yield to the celestial victor's power. What a blessed assurance! What a corroboration of the justice of the Christian's hope. We behold the truth in the moral power of the Gospel, exerting its sway over the hearts of men, in making them wiser and better; we find its principles pervading every science, every duty of man, and every law of God in nature; and when we behold this, though we may sympathize with the slave of superstition, pity the votary of vice, and weep even for him who is too senseless to weep for himself, we will turn to the page of Holy Writ, and rejoice in our souls while we say of them, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

WOMAN.

I was much pleased with the substance of the following eulogium, eloquently pronounced by Dr. Draper, of Philadelphia, in his introductory lecture on medicine, in this city. He was speaking of the importance of educating woman particularly, in a general knowledge of those diseases and their remedies, in which she is often obliged to act as physician (until another can be procured at least) as well as the nurse of her family and her friends. I give it as nearly in his own words, as my memory enables me to repeat them, several days after hearing them.

Woman—lovely woman—it is she who hears the first cry we utter in the world. It is woman, from the fountains of life at whose breast we inhale our first nourishment. It is woman who tends our helpless infancy, and reads and supplies our unuttered wants. And when we reach maturer childhood, it is on woman's lap the head is reclined—by woman's hands we are clothed—and by woman's voice and animating looks we are cheered on our course in the acquisition of that useful knowledge which shall fit us for the active duties and rational enjoyments of after years. It is the speaking glance and beaming smile of woman that, in early manhood, unfolds and develops into full blown fragrance the bud of affection in the manly bosom. It is woman who then becomes the companion and helpmate of man in the duties and trials of life—who cheers us when discouraged, consoles us in disappointments and sorrows, and brightens the blessings Providence scatters in the pathway of life. When sickness lays its iron hand upon the frame, and prostrates us on the bed of languishing and pain, it is woman's hand that presses the fevered brow, and wipes the clammy sweat from the countenance—that administers our medicines, and renders comfortable the couch on which we lie. And when all the world is hushed and still in repose around us, still it is woman's almost noiseless step that is heard lightly moving around the silent room, and watching our broken slumbers and irregular breathing. And when we grapple with the King of terrors, it is on woman's bosom, where first we were cradled in infancy, that the son, husband or father yields up the departing spirit; and it is woman whose tears then fall fast and thick upon the marble features of the dead. She follows us to our last home, and when the clouds fall upon the coffin-lid with hollow sound, her heart reverberates most loudly with the soul-rending echoes; and as she retires from that dear spot, it is in her heart our memory is most fondly enshrined. In birth—through life—in death—woman is our best nurse, our nearest companion, our dearest friend; and this knowledge is necessary, the better to enable her to be, what God and nature intended she should be—MAN'S GUARDIAN ANGEL.

THE NAZARENE.

Such is the title of a new Universalist paper—a neat, well filled, weekly folio—just commenced in the city of Philadelphia, by Rev. J. H. Gihon & Co., Publishers and Proprietors, and Rev. S. W. Fuller, Editor. It is published on a super royal sheet, at two dollars a year in advance—two dollars and fifty cents if not paid in six months, and three dollars if not paid within the year. Address—J. H. Gihon & Co., S. W. corner of George and Swanwick-streets, Philadelphia.

If this new paper does not injure the prospects of an older periodical near to it, we shall rejoice that it was started—we wish its success next after the older favorite—and as an evidence of brotherly affection and fellowship we cordially grasp the extended hand editorial of the Nazarene.

A. B. G.

The brethren engaged in editing and publishing the Nazarene, will act as our agents—we will reciprocate.

OUT OF PLACE ARTICLES.

A Christmas sermon at midsummer, or an Easter sermon at Christmas. Such it has not been our lot to receive; but we have received, in our time not a few "Reflections on the close of the year," sometime in January—or "on the New Year," after every body has forgotten its newness—and which, by the time we could find room for them, would be as much out of time as the sermons above named. When we give it as our decided opinion, that the adaptation of an article to time, place, or circumstances, is as great a merit as the best style, or the profoundest arguments, or the most brilliant wit, they will understand why we quietly consign such articles to the bottom of the heap. If we happen to light on them when the proper season comes round again, we will publish them—if not, we will save the writers the pain of coldly reading the articles, after all the feelings which inspired them have evaporated.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

The Independent Messenger, noticed in our last, has been revived by some of its associate Editors—and Mr. Dean has started a new paper called the Phenix, to supply the place of the Messenger, which he reported, and still reports as dead!

The coarse retailer of manufactured anecdotes against Universalism and Universalists, who disgraced this city two years ago, is (or lately was) in Albany, and has been so fortunate as to get Dr. Welch to endorse his character for veracity! Thereupon Br. S. R. Smith addressed Dr. Welch through the Evening Journal, a respectful but meritedly severe note, and promised a review of the veracious and refined Elder's Budget.—The review was given in due time, to a full house, who were satisfied that Dr. W. was a very unfortunate man in that endorsement! I have heard that Br. Smith is pursuing a regular course of evening lectures to crowded houses, which are doing much good.

The same veracious Elder was in Baltimore, and has been the means of filling our meeting-house there with a numerous and attentive audience to hear Br. Williamson in defence of God's impartial and efficient grace.

Br. Jasiel P. Fuller, of Henderson, Ills., has removed to Troy, Missouri, where our cause is prospering anew under our labors.

The pews in the Universalist meeting-house in Cabotville, Mass., lately rented at about 1200 dollars for the present year—some hundreds more than they ever brought before. The cause is flourishing there under the care of Br. Folsom, their new pastor.

SOUTHERN STATES.

Br. Allen Fuller, Salisbury P. O., South Carolina, is our General Agent for the Southern States, and will receive current South Carolina notes at par, in payment for subscriptions to this paper. As Br. Fuller is Postmaster at that place, remittances can be made to him free of postage, as well as free from the discount we have to pay on South Carolina bills—and all payments made to him will be the same as if paid to us. PUBLISHERS.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CHRISTIAN CHARITY.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

"Ill it suits us to disdain
The altar, to deride the Fane
Where simple sufferers bend in trust,
To win a happier hour." WORDSWORTH.

That altar is not thine—
The prayer thence offered, bears with thine no part;
But oh, thou scorner! from that lowly shrine
Goes up a fervent heart.

Scorn and condemn it not;
For, with its sins all gushing out in tears,
It sanctifies to God the humblest spot,
And there an altar rears.

It suffereth in its crimes—
It kneels to win the pardoning seal of God;
And, ringing on the air its soul-deep chimes,
Makes temples of the sod!

The Father hears the cry,
And droops his presence to th' imploring soul;
He hears thanksgivings in the half-breathed sigh,
As when deep anthems roll.

He sees the heart-wrung tears,
With the same eye as the baptismal rite,
That seals the holy brow of one who wears
A spirit-robe of white.

Then scorn thou not the fane,
The holy altar, or the humble shrine,
Where a true heart seeks humbly to obtain Pardon and peace divine.

Shirley village, Mass.

MY BROTHER'S GRAVE.

Beneath the chancel's hallowed stone,
Exposed to every rustic tread,
To few, save rustic mourners, known,
My brother, is thy lowly bed.
Few words upon the rough stone graven,
Thy name—thy birth—thy youth declare—
Thy innocence—thy hopes of Heaven—
In simplest phrase recorded there—
No 'scutcheons shine, no banners wave
In mockery o'er my brother's grave.

No sound of human toil or strife
To Death's lone dwelling speaks of life,
Nor breaks the silence still and deep
Where thou, beneath thy burial stone,
Art laid in that unstartled sleep

The living eye hath never known.
The lonely sexton's footstep falls
In dismal echoes on the walls,
As, slowly pacing through the aisle,
He sweeps the unholy dust away,
And cobwebs which must not defile
Those windows on the Sabbath day;
And, passing through the central nave,
Treads lightly on my brother's grave.

But when the sweet-toned Sabbath chime,
Pouring its music on the breeze,
Proclaims the well-known holy time
Of prayer, and thanks, and bended knees;
When rustic crowds devoutly meet,
And lips and hearts to God are given,
And souls enjoy oblivion sweet
Of earthly ills, in thought of Heaven;
What voice of calm and solemn tone
Is heard above the burial stone?
What form in priestly meek array
Beside the altar kneels to pray?
What holy hands are lifted up
To bless the sacramental cup?
Full well I know that reverend form,
And if a voice could reach the dead,
Those tones would reach thee, though the worm.
My brother, makes thy breast his bed;
That sire, who thy existence gave,
Now stands beside thy lowly grave.

USELESS ORNAMENTS.

"It is a vulgar taste that delights in the display of breast-pins, neck-chains and finger rings."

We clip the above from the New-York Mirror, and endorse every word of it. We have about as high an opinion of the intellect of an Indian squaw who coils beads around her neck, or of the good sense of an African who suspends brass rings from his nasal organs, as we have of the brainless rōp who voluntarily enters the chain-gang and encumbers his person with baubles.—Does a chain of gold or one of diamond give brilliancy to the eye? Does a branch of stained glass, the size of a carriage window—even though it be cornelian—add a tint to the blush of the cheek? or do massive rings make the fingers more tapering? The custom of wearing a superfluity of gem-gaw trinkets is abominable, and displays any thing but good taste—more particularly republican taste. Franklin did not rest his reception on such trumpery when he went to the court of St. James; nor did Washington seem to think that he would more firmly ingratiate himself in the hearts of the people if he were to appear as a tinselled puppet, instead of dressing, as he always did, like a gentleman. Taste—elegance—even fashion in dress, we admire, and never think meanly of the man who pays attention to them; but he who is the slave of 6 by 4 breast-pins, watch-chains like the tiller rope of a Mississippi steambot, or finger rings that would enchain a culprit, is, in our opinion, deficient of the necessary weight of brains—a man with a partially furnished attic story. We have seen those who fancied that their intelligence was to be measured by the length of their watch-chains, and who claimed an importance in ratio with the size of their broaches. Sensible men avoid a display of such useless ornaments; it is a custom "more honored in the breach than the observance."—N. O. Picayune.

To MAKE HOME HAPPY.—Nature is industrious in adorning her dominions; and man, to whom this beauty is addressed, should feel and obey the lesson. Let him, too, be industrious in adorning his domain—in making his home—the dwelling of his wife and children—not only convenient and comfortable, but pleasant. Let him, as far as circumstances will permit, be industrious in surrounding it with pleasing objects—in decorating it, within and without, with things that tend to make it agreeable and attractive. Let industry make home the abode of neatness and order—a place which brings satisfaction to every inmate, and which in absence draws back the heart by the fond associations of comfort and content. Let this be done, and this sacred spot will become more surely the scene of cheerfulness, and peace. Ye parents, who would have your children happy, be industrious to bring them up in the midst of a pleasant, a cheerful, a happy home. Waste not your time in accumulating wealth for them; but plant their minds and souls in the way proposed, with the seeds of virtue and true prosperity.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, January 14th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. WARREN G. COMSTOCK, of Leyden, Lewis county, to Miss CLARISSA A. COMSTOCK, of Smithfield, R. I.

In Rushford, December 22d, 1839, by Rev. I. B. Sharp, Mr. H. C. MORGAN, of Cuba, to Miss LURANEY SWIFT, of the former place.

In Conesus, January 8th, by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. ELEAZAR BENNET, to Miss SALLY ANN PATTERSON.

In Camden, Mich., November 19th, 1839, by E. T. Chester, Esq., Mr. RODNEY BEACH, to Miss CHARLOTTE DOUGLASS, all of Brockville, Ia.

DEATHS.

In Livonia, December 7th, Mr. CALVIN POWELL, aged 75 years. The deceased was distinguished in life by his more than ordinary powers of mind, by his moral uprightness, by his labors both public and private, and by his writings, which are numerous. Among them is a book entitled, "Poems, hymns and divine songs, intended to illustrate the infinite wisdom, power and goodness of God in the creation, redemption and final restoration of all men," containing 271 pages, and 314 hymns.

He was naturally possessed of a religious frame of mind. In early life he became a member of the Presbyterian church in Harford, Vt. over which Thomas Gross was then pastor, and who at length became a zealous advocate of Universalism, and published the "Gospel Advocate" in Buffalo, a few years ago.

Br. Powell embraced the doctrine also many years ago, and was an advocate of it, until his death. The "doctrine of the restitution" was his theme, and for the advancement of which, he devoted much of his time in writing, preaching, praying, exhorting, and in private conversation with the neighbors. He was often engaged in the exercise of family worship. And what appears to me very mysterious, is the fact that notwithstanding for several months before his death he was mentally deranged so that his language generally was very broken and incoherent, yet when engaged in prayer upon his bed of sickness and of death, he appeared to be perfectly sane; his language was well connected, glowing and eloquent, and spoken fervently from the heart; it carried a subduing power, a melting influence to those who heard. And in these moments his soul seemed to be enrapt in more than earthly joys while he contemplated the boundless perfections of God and their result in the purification of the world. O, the blessings and sustaining influence of Universalism in the closing season of man's earthly existence! May the comforts and blessings enjoyed by him, be enjoyed by his surviving relatives and neighbors.

O. R.

At Varna, December 20th, EUNICE CREAMER, consort of Isaac Creamer, aged 23 years. Thus the young, the virtuous, the beautiful and greatly beloved sister Creamer has passed away to join the seraphic multitude that people the "spirit land," and left her lone companion to mourn, as she deeply does, her untimely exit. May that hope which is an anchor to the soul, enable him to triumph in the midst of affliction. Funeral services by the writer.

W. BULLARD.

In Exeter, on the 18th ult., of consumption, Mrs. SALINDA, wife of Mr. Nathan Brainard, aged 57 years. Sister Brainard died as she had lived, a believer in a world's salvation from sin and death.

Also, in Burlington, the 30th ult., Mrs. SARAH FLINT, aged 82 years. She found the hope of illimitable grace to be abundant consolation not only in life, but also in death. She made special request that the writer of this should perform her funeral rites, and selected for the text the 23d Psalm and 4th verse, which was complied with on the 1st inst., to a respectable congregation of mourners and friends.

J. POTTER.

In Danube, December 16th, in the 88th year of her age, Mrs. ELIZABETH JOHNSON, mother of Silas and Andrew Johnson. Her husband departed this life about 11 years since. In the death of this aged and amiable woman, the circle of mourning relatives have sustained a loss, on earth, irreparable. But may they mourn not as those without hope; but console themselves with the soothing reflection, that,

"She has gone unto peace; she has laid her down

To sleep till the dawn of a brighter day;

And she shall awake on that holy morn

When sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

The funeral was attended on the 18th, by the writer.

THE DOOMED WOLF.

BY ABEL C. THOMAS.

Our pleasant and somewhat retired village was in the midst of commotion. A Revival of Religion, commonly so called, was in "the full tide of successful experiment." The people, with few exceptions out of a population of more than 300 adults, attended the meetings, and they were greatly moved—for the moving preachers were there, and they were armed with all and singular the terrors of Pandemonium, superadded to the blackness, and darkness, and tempest of Sinai.—Is it remarkable that the villagers should be moved even to agony, with all the artillery of Revivalism sounding in their ears from day to day? Shall not the aged tremble, and the youthful quake, when the strong man is bowed as a reed in the rush of the whirlwind?

But a circumstance occurred in the progress of the excitement, which brought it up to the highest pitch of endurance, and then—the long agony was over—and the preachers departed—and the people removed—and the village became a waste and howling wilderness. Peruse the narrative, and deem it a vision, if thou wilt—nevertheless, diligently seek and consider the intent thereof.

It was a delightful afternoon in September.—The outward harvest had been secured as the reward of industry, and a harvest of souls was being gathered in the sanctuary as the fruit of many days' excitement. The preacher was pouring out the third vial on the rivers of peace and the fountains of joy—and they became blood. And shall the people drink blood? Better that than worse. And so they quenched the spirit of resistance to terror, and bowed down in implicit obedience to "the son of thunder" and (peradventure) of lightning. Every eye was fixed on the speaker, and every heart fearfully awaited the issue.

But there is a stir next the door. What means it? There are voices, and anon there are departures in haste. The whisperings spread till they pervade the house—and there is a general uprising. The Deacon announces the cause of the commotion. A ferocious wolf has been making depredations, not on the sheep-fold, (for that were a small matter,) but on the children left at home. The meeting is dissolved, and woful is the reality to many a parent's heart! The wounded, and dying, and dead, are found in divers parts of the village! Ye preachers of Revivalism! here is work for you—but, remember, it is Gospel work. See that ye attend to it. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith our God."—Truly it is a sorrowful time—and will the funeral be less sorrowful? Verily there is work for you. See that ye comfort the people.

In the midst of it all, there is still Revivalism, for is not here a subject of most woful and touching appeal? The heart is now open, and ye can look into it, and breathe into it your own will. But there shall come a more vivid theme. This ye can fathom—but that which shall be to-morrow ye can not understand—and ye shall labor in vain to solve the mystery. Wherefore, prepare.

On the morrow, ere the sun had risen, there was a fearful wolf-howl heard—a cry as of suffocating agony—and the mother clasped her babe still closer to her breast, and wept as she thought of the funeral scene of yesterday. And the men went forth to destroy the destroyer. Think ye that they went forth in quietness of feeling? But the destroyer was beyond their reach—for, behold! he was suspended high in air, directly over the meeting house! The villagers gather in groups to contemplate the spectacle, and to exchange surmises in relation thereto. Those whose families have suffered by the devastation of the wolf, can not conceal their gratification that he is now receiving the just punishment of his ferocity; and there are even a few who shout in exultation as they witness the doom of the destroyer. Let vengeance make haste—for the time is short!

Mysterious indeed, and awful is the scene!—He is suspended by the neck, yet not so as to prevent a continuous wild and agonizing howl, nor a fierce struggle for release. The rope is distinctly seen as the sun appears above the horizon—but it tapers upward, and upward, and is lost in the blaze of light.—The preachers are aroused to solve the mystery. They come forth, and gaze horrified. "It is the judgment of God," said they. And then the air resounded with a wilder cry from the struggling animal. "Hearken ye, and repent and believe," continued the preachers. And a deeper gloom settled down on the village.

The hour for meeting arrived—but who shall describe the feelings and thoughts, the sayings and doings of that day! The solemn tones of the church bell mingled with the doleful sounds above—and O what a worship-warning was heard in the combination! The hymns were sung—but the howl of the wolf mingled with the voice of the Psalm! And the sermon—imagine it, if thou wilt, but be not apprehensive of conceiving too horribly of its representations. The scene was laid.

"Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair!"— and an illustration was drawn from the perdition of the wolf, who struggled, and was not released—who howled, and was not comforted—who lives in torment and shall not die!

The people were moved, even to intensity of wo. The sinful were convicted—the praying were converted—the penitent were redeemed—but there was no shout in the camp of Israel—for did not the wolf-howl chill the fevered-blood of enthusiasm? Verily, verily I say unto you, the sunshine of that day was obscured by clouds of gloom.

Noon arrived, and the people were dismissed with a benediction which they heard not—for their thoughts were with the agonized destroyer. And when they went forth, and looked upwards, they spake to each other of what they saw; and feeling and thought were expressed in tones of sorrow. The bereaved parent forgot his own dead child in sympathy for the living and tormented foe. No longer did any exult in what they beheld, but all desired the cessation of the spectacle. Did not I say, Let vengeance make haste, for the time is short? Consider it, and be wise.

What shall be done? A rifle is brought, and a strong arm elevates it, and a keen eye aims it, but the ball falls short of the mark. "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God," said the Deacon; "the destroyer can not die!" Still another attempt is made, and another—for were not the people human? Verily, they would even hazard the issue, for peradventure a fortunate shot might terminate the sufferings of the wolf. Are ye the men who so lately exulted in his wo?—Nevertheless, in vain ye strive—for the destroyer can not die!

The bell again summons to public worship, but the summons is regarded by few. Why shouldst thou enter the sanctuary, and leave thy thoughts and feelings in the open air? Why shouldst thou listen to that which thou canst not hear? Or why shouldst thou elevate thy voice in the psalm, with the wolf-howl ringing in thine ears? Thou canst not do it, unless thou wilt mock God.

And so the sanctuary is well nigh deserted.—Not so the streets of the village. Means are devised to release the sufferer—but desire hath not always the means of accomplishment—and all is vain. Put away thy rifle—for powder, and lead, and keen sight, and a strong arm, will avail thee nought. The tapering rope is lost in the light. Dost thou not know that it is held by a hand which thou canst not see? Wilt thou fight against God? Thou canst not slay what he hath quickened into undying life.

Twilight came, and still the wolf was seen struggling and heard howling. Night shut out the sight—but darkness can not smother sound. And what a night to the people of that village! The wolf howled in his pangs, and the dogs howled in their terror. And shall the people sleep? Some stopped their ears—but they could not smother thought. Children nestled closer to their parents, and sank into broken slumber—but old men and young men, and matrons and maidens—saints and sinners—preachers and people—toiled through the weary night-watches, and rose unrefreshed at day-dawn, and went forth—and there still hung the destroyer, still struggling, and still sounding the doleful dirge of deathless doom!

Another day—and what a day! The bell will shortly summons you to the sanctuary. Wherefore will ye obey the call? Ye can not sing the song of praise. Ye can not hear the pulpit message. Nevertheless, obey the summons. Go one, go all—for haply ye can pray. Pray for yourselves and for your children—for will ye sit down patiently, and become mad? Ye are feverish with night-watching, and your nerves are not brass. Go therefore to the sanctuary, and pray.

To the sanctuary they repair, and they pray. O how fervently they pray. Even for the wolf they pray, "O Lord, it is enough! Merciful Heaven, O how long?" Friends, remember the devastations of the destroyer. Remember the burial scene. Nevertheless, pray—for ye are human, and ye have been converted. "O Lord most merciful! release the sufferer, lest thy people be cut off from the land!" And the wolf's wild wail sounded fearfully in the still air. "Or if this be not thy will, in great mercy permit the destroyer to die!" But the destroyer still struggled, and the woful howl chilled every heart.

And they went forth from the sanctuary in despair. Sirs, ye may well be solemn in this time of gloom, for it is a solemn and gloomy thing to know that ye are within sight and hearing of an agonizing creature which can not die!

And so the day waxed till the meridian, and waned till the night-fall; and the people became haggard and grief-worn, and shut themselves up in their dwellings—but the voice of wo is a penetrating thing. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth." But what if thou knowest whence cometh the doleful sound which thou hearest this night?—True, thou knowest not whither it goeth, nor what the end hereof shall be,—nevertheless, thou hearest what thou listest not; and thou shalt think of it, whether thou wilt hear or forbear.

But, friends, ye are wearied with watching, and ye will sleep. Peradventure ye will dream.—Ay, if ye sleep ye will dream—and ye will see, and hear, and feel, and think, and pray, and shudder! For are ye not human? and is humanity ever dead while soul and spirit cling to the body? And while ye sleep, will the poor wolf repose on a bed of flowers? Yes, ye will dream this night—and also ye will suffer, and awake in agony.

Another day has dawned, and the same sun has risen, and the same people have gone forth to gaze on the same spectacle. Humanity can bear much—but it can not bear every thing. A few days ago, there was a burial scene, and there were maledictions on the suspended wolf. But vengeance is swallowed up and lost in sympathy; and the desire now is, that the destroyer may be permitted to die! A small boon, surely—but he can not die—and the people can not remain to behold him writhing in pain, and to hear the woful wail of a dreadful doom.

And, family by family, they prepare to depart. It is a common impulse. No one asks his neighbor, Why? for every one has the answer in his own heart; nor, Whither? for every one feels that he neither knows nor cares, provided he can flee from the awful spectacle.—And ere the sunset of a fortnight, they are all far, far away.—Only one living creature is in or near the village—and that living creature can not die!

And grass has sprung up, and nettles, where happy children were wont to play; and desolation covers the long hallowed scenes of domestic joy. And the wind sweeps mournfully through the dwellings fast falling to decay, bearing with it the doleful howl of the still suspended and still suffering destroyer!

The once happy villagers are scattered far and wide; but they have not forgotten the fearful spectacle, nor any of its circumstances; and when they present themselves at the throne of grace, they remember to pray that the poor wolf may be permitted to die!

First tell me wherein it is improbable, except in the suspension of the destroyer? And is it any more improbable that God has thus suspended a wolf, and will not grant him the small boon of permission to die, than that he will ever immortalize some of his own offspring, merely that they may suffer undying pangs?

If thou hadst been in that village, wouldst thou not have prayed for the wolf? Verily, if thou hast the heart of humanity, thou wouldst pray even for the devil, under such circumstances!

Friend, thy imagination has peopled a gloomy world of endless despair. Suppose, if thou wilt, that a score of those woful sufferers, instead of being wholly out of sight and hearing, were suspended in the heavens, directly over thy dwelling. Thou canst see them writhing in deepest pangs—thou canst hear their continuous wail of despair, tortured as they are in every fibre!—Among the number are some of thine own kindred and friends—perhaps thy father, mother, or child!—once happy—now doomed forever! How long couldst thou stand unmoved? What! already praying for their release?—or, haply, that they may be permitted to die? Even so. And I tell thee, friend, that if thy prayer were long unanswered, thou wouldst curse God in the bitterness of thy heart, and flee from the horrible scene!

But whither wilt thou flee? They follow thee. In the broad glare of day, they are still seen suspended over thy head. In the pale moon-beams and in the cold star-light, thou shalt still behold their struggles; and thine ears shall ever be filled with their terrific cry! Thou mayst dig a cave, and exclude thyself from the day—but thou canst not stifle thought, nor canst thou strangle either memory or imagination! The scene of horror is with thee still, and fearful is the agony of thy soul. Pray God that the doomed may die, or thou wilt soon be mad!

“FEAR NOT: BELIEVE ONLY.”—Jesus.

Heavenly words! how little of thy peaceful spirit and holy breathing is felt and understood by the many at this present day. Fear, fear, FEAR, is now continually sounding in our ears. All the terrors of Sinai seem insufficient to rouse the sleeping sinner from his death-like stupor: down, down, down to the caverns of irretrievable woe he is sinking. Every energy of soul is called into action in this all important work of snatching sinners from the hand of a God of infinite justice, mercy and love. Instead of snatching them from the monster sin, their only enemy in the universe, they are endeavoring to create a feeling of distrust and unholy fear towards their best and eternal friend. Instead of pointing the wandering, sin-stricken soul to the Lamb of God, who is waiting with outstretched arms to receive them again to his warm embrace, they are portraying him with a frowning, angry look—ready to blast their already withering spirits in eternal wrath and hatred! Would to God, that all those whose duty and calling it is to preach the blessed Gospel in its purity, had studied more the true spirit of its first and most glorious promulgator, Christ! O with what power might they appeal to the most abandoned sinner's heart—“Fear not—believe only.”

“Cast aside thy unholy fears; distrust not my love, my willingness to save you from the galling bondage of sin and misery—I, who have been in all points tempted and beset on every side, know full well the sore trials you must encounter. Come, then, lean on my arm—take my yoke upon you, which is the yoke of love, and you shall find rest to your soul! No longer be allured by the syren song—the ways of sin are strewn with flowery sweets in this world. Believe it not, it is a deadly enemy to thy soul who thus seeks to delude thee! Learn of me. Be forgiving in thy every act—be kind, be compassionate, be ye imitators of your persecuted Saviour in all things, and thy life shall be one of unbroken serenity—thy joys shall flow forth like the crystal fountain, pure and unmingled—thy last moments shall be calm and peaceful as the going down of the glorious sun—not a cloud or a mist shall dim the glory of thy freed spirit as it soars on faith's light pinions to the realm where the golden tints of the rainbow fade never!—where ‘the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.’” Such would be the language of our dear Friend and Saviour, could he again appear on the earth. “Believe only.” It was his great and constant aim to increase the faith of his hearers in the goodness and never-failing protection of their heavenly Father. His whole life was made up of merciful acts and precepts, blended with undying love for the whole world of mankind. He performed many miracles; he raised the dead, he healed the sick, he caused the blind to see, the lame to walk, the dumb to speak—and all for what? Was it to increase the amount of human happiness? Was it to increase the faith and strengthen the confidence of man in his Maker? Was it to shew his power that he commanded even the winds, and they obeyed him? Most certainly! and yet how little confidence have the sons of men in this same Saviour! how small their faith—not even like a grain of mustard seed! What did he leave undone that could have added one jot or tittle to the glory and majesty of his name, or the sincerity of his intentions towards his own ransomed and redeemed people? But he stops not here. He goes even to Calvary, and there, amidst the scoffs and derisions of an unbelieving, sin-hardened world, he freely lays down even life itself—suffering death in its most excruciating form; and in that hour of agony, when extended between two worlds, as if to put doubt, fear and unbelief eternally to silence, he exclaims, “It is finished.” He rises. He triumphs over death and the grave. He appears to his terrified and despairing disciples. They believe not at first for joy. He shows his bleeding wounds; he blesses them, and exhorts them to be firm and unshaken to the end; he bids them adieu; the clouds receive him out of their sight. “Fear not: but believe.” H. J. S.

AN E C D O T E .

For patriotism and our country's good we will risk our lives and fortunes, but in what page of history will we find that for the good of the people, any one ever refused a crown? In this respect, our own Washington stands pre-eminent. In the history of Persia, we meet with a monarch nearly as much renowned for his virtues and his patriotic, self-sacrificing love of country. The preservation of tranquility throughout his wide dominions, and the happiness of his people, were the principal objects of the exertions and government of Malek Shah. On the eve of a battle with his brother for the throne, Malek was performing his devotions to Iman Reza, a celebrated saint. As the Sultan rose from the ground, he asked his Vizier, who had knelt beside him, what had been the object of his secret petition. “That your arms may be crowned with victory,” was the prudent, and probably sincere reply of the minister. “And I,” said the generous Malek, “implored the Lord of hosts, that He would take from me my life and crown, if my brother be more worthy than myself to reign.” A. UNIVERSALISM NOT A DEMORALIZING DOCTRINE.

AN INTERVIEW.

A Universalist minister, not long since, entered a store where he had previously left a few copies of the Universalist Almanac and Companion for sale, and turning to the merchant, said, “Well, how do you succeed in selling Universalist Almanacs?” The merchant readily presented what remained for the purpose of ascertaining the number sold. It happened, or else it was so ordered, that there were some half dozen staunch opposers of Universalism present, who, apparently feeling strengthened by the consciousness of the superiority of their numbers, thought it a favorable time to commence an attack upon that awful doctrine which teaches that an end will be made of sin and sorrow, by the final establishment of holiness and bliss.

“What pamphlet is that?” said Mr. A., at the same time reaching out his hand for one. A copy was given him, and as he opened it, the minister standing by his side, kindly assisted in shewing him the titles of the several articles in the Companion, remarking that those tables, by referring to the various places where the original words, translated hell in the common English Bible, occur, were of great importance to every inquiring Christian. But the leaves were turned hastily over, till they came to the article entitled, “A dead faith,” when the preacher observed, “This article is designed to impress the minds of Universalists with the vast importance of exemplifying their faith by a life of piety and godliness.”

“That is of no consequence,” said Mr. A., who was an elderly man of remarkably sanctimonious look: “If every body is to be saved, it is no matter whether people live pious or sinful lives.”

“Indeed, Sir,” said the preacher, “and do you really mean to say that the pious and godly man is no more happy himself, and does no more to promote the happiness of others, than the impious and ungodly one?” Mr. A. had the candor to acknowledge that he deemed the pious more happy than the impious one. “Then it is a matter of some importance how people live, is it not, if they wish to be useful and happy?”

Seeing Mr. A. thus defeated, B. and C. commenced asking questions and quoting Scripture (some of which was in the Bible and some was not,) so rapidly that scarce any opportunity was left for replies. At length, Judge D., who had hitherto remained silent, demanded a hearing; and having obtained silence, he observed that he knew many Universalists who were men of amiable dispositions and good moral character, but he thought that the doctrine could not have had any tendency to make them such, but that they were good men independently of their doctrine.

Preacher.—What do you call the basis of Christian morality?

Judge D.—To love God with all the heart and our fellow-men as ourselves, is the foundation on which all true Christian morality rests.

P.—Then why suppose that a doctrine which presents God as the boundless perfection of love, and mankind as destined to an eternity of peace, joy and universal love, does not tend to promote Christian morality? No answer. JOHN.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Br. Grosh:

As articles from Michigan are rather scarce with you, I think you will not be very apt to "decline," and venture to send you a chapter of mine own affairs, which you will print or not, as you think proper.

I have been a resident of this State nearly four years, and have been compelled by force of circumstances to devote my time and attention to secular employment, preaching but seldom, and generally on funeral occasions. An unfortunate bargain with a clerical brother, shortly before I left York State, and much sickness since I came here, has made it necessary for me to resort to some other means to "raise the wind" than a preacher's support. I was too proud to beg, and resolved to dig, which I have done with a good degree of success. When I have fully and honorably paid Br. Price for his "Union," which will be soon, I hope, I shall feel at liberty to devote my attention to the ministry, having no creditor which can justly claim a more lucrative investment of my time.

In the course of my business I have gotten together a considerable quantity of tools and lumber for cabinet and wagon making, and have secured a fair run of custom, which would be a good inducement to some young man who might wish to settle in this country, to take the whole from off my hands and improve upon what I have commenced.

Branch is the seat of justice for Branch County, and bids fair to be a place of considerable importance. Although at present it is not very flourishing, it possesses good natural advantages, and is an important point on the Southern Railroad, which passes directly through it. I own a good location in the village, which I would sell or rent upon accommodating terms.

If I give up my present employment and devote my time to the ministry, a part of it will be called for by the friends in this place, and the remainder will be subject to the calls of friends in other places, within thirty or forty miles of this.

I wish, however, that my brethren would bear in mind that every visit which I may make them will be attended with considerable expense to myself, and that if they do not render any pecuniary assistance I must do as I have done before, suspend my labors—or as others have done, leave and go to some other field.

It is all important that something should be done by the friends of liberal Christianity to establish our Redeemer's cause in the central and western parts of Michigan. While every place and corner is swarmed with brimstone Doctors, there is not so much as one herald of the cross sustained in the Gospel field west of Ann Arbor.

Seeing that it is high time, let the friends awake out of sleep before they are like Sampson shorn of all their strength and compelled to bow the knee to priestly despotism. While the haters of religious liberty are organizing and preparing chains to bind us, we are doing nothing to secure our own liberty or preserve the rising generation from the evils which most of us have suffered at the hands of arrogant and pharisaical religionists.

If there is any consolation to be derived from the Gospel of Jesus Christ—if civil and religious liberty is worth preserving—if we consider ourselves men and freemen—let us show our adversaries that we have spirits to feel and energy to act, and not tamely place our necks in a yoke prepared by an aspiring priesthood instead of that of our Saviour, which is easy to be borne. As they already chuckle over our folly and sluggish inactivity, it is high time for us to awake, be up and doing before it be too late—"putting on the whole armor of God that we may withstand the wiles of the devil."

QUARTERLY CONFERENCE.

The second quarterly Conference of the Black River Association was held in Champion, Jeff. Co., January 8th and 9th. B. S. Jones, and W. H. Waggoner were chosen and served as moderator and clerk. A letter of fellowship was granted to Br. H. L. Hayward, a young man of talents and zeal. Seven sermons were preached to an attentive and constantly increasing audience. The singing (by the Watertown choir) was of the most excellent kind. It buoyed up the spirit and fed the soul with pure delight. It gave animation to the speaker, and caused him to enforce the word with feeling and with power. It is believed that this Conference has given a new impulse to the good cause in Champion. The friends there feel renewed in the spirit of their minds, and with their judicious leader, Br. H. L. Hayward, they are now moving prosperously onward. The Lord smile upon their laudable efforts, and give them the Kingdom.

Thanks are rendered to the Presbyterians for the use of their church, and to the friends for their affectionate hospitality.

DEDICATION IN LITCHFIELD.

On Wednesday the 22d. according to notice, the new Meeting house, erected by the Universalists in Litchfield, Herkimer county, was dedicated to the worship of our Heavenly Father, and the promulgation of that truth which maketh free indeed. The order of the dedicatory services was as follows.—1. Voluntary by the choir.—2. Reading select Scriptures by Br. Bartlett.—3. Hymn.—4. Prayer by Br. T. D. Cook.—5. Hymn.—6. Sermon by Br. Grosh.—7. Hymn.—8. Dedicatory Prayer by Br. Skinner.—9. Dedication Anthem.—10. Benediction. After an intermission of a few minutes, the congregation again listened to a sermon by Br. Clowes of Clinton, assisted in the other services by B. S. Cook and Belding.

Although the day was rather unfavorable, the congregation began to convene at an early hour and by the time the services commenced, the house was filled to overflowing, and among those who had assembled we were glad to see many, very many whose religious views were opposed to ours, listening with candor and deep attention to the reasons which were given for the hope that was in us. And especially grateful to us was the excellent singing, under the direction of Mr. E. Washburn, who though an opposer in faith, evinced his lively Christian charity and freedom from prejudice by manifesting an interest in the performances of the choir which could not be excelled by any other member thereof. We thank God for the assurances which we have that the spirit of devotion which has been breathed from his heart here, will not cease with this life, but will join the ransomed family of man in the future world, in chanting the song of Moses and the Lamb forever.

The house is of wood 28 by 40 feet, plainly but neatly finished, and painted inside and out. It has an Orchestra in the front part of the house, over the entry way and forming a half circle around the back of the desk. In all, economy has been studied, but not at the expense of good taste or convenience. The trimmings to the desk, etc. are an evidence that the ladies of the society have not failed to manifest their efficient zeal in the completion of a house of worship. May God prosper the society, and build them up in the unity of the spirit, and the bond of peace.

PROPOSALS

FOR PUBLISHING BY SUBSCRIPTION,

A Discussion of the Doctrines of Endless misery and Universal Salvation, in an Epistolary correspondence between Alexander Campbell,* (Baptist,) of Bethany, Virginia, and Delpus Skinner, (Universalist,) of Utica, N. Y.

This work will consist of forty letters (twenty by each disputant, and occupying equal space) besides six or seven shorter preliminary letters by Messrs. Spencer, Campbell, Montgomery and Skinner. It will fill between 400 and 500 pages—will be neatly bound, and lettered, and furnished to subscribers at the very low price of ONE DOLLAR per copy.

The four following are the momentous questions discussed in this controversy:—

1. Are Sheol, Hades and Gehenna, (translated Hell,) or either of them, ever used in the Scriptures to express a place, or state, of endless misery?
2. Do the words Olem, Aion, Aionios, etc., (translated everlasting,) when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end?
3. Is there any word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or which can certify us that God, angels or saints, shall have duration without end?
4. Shall eternal life (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness) be, according to the Scriptures, the ultimate destiny of all mankind?

Of the first and second questions A. Campbell takes the affirmative, and D. Skinner of the 3d and 4th.

This work was published, as the letters were written, periodically, in the Millennial Harbinger and the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, from February 1837, to July 1839, when the Discussion was brought to a close; and now for the first time it is published in book form by itself, and offered to the public. No questions can be of deeper moment to the theological student, or the inquirer after truth, than those here discussed.—What justice has been done to these questions by either side, the reader must judge after carefully perusing the same.

The work will be put to press at an early day, and it is expected it will be ready for delivery to subscribers by the time the Spring business and the navigation of the canal shall commence.

Any person paying $5 shall receive six copies of the work. No trust will be allowed, but payment down required in all cases, except where persons ordering the work are known to be perfectly responsible, and to them but a short credit can be allowed. Subscriptions and orders for the Discussion to be returned as early as possible, either to D. Skinner, O. Hutchinson, or the Magazine and Advocate office, Utica, N. Y. Also, P. Price, Union office, New-York; J. H. Gibon & Co., Nazarene office, Philadelphia; A. Tompkins, Ladies' Repository office, and Thomas Whittemore, Trumpet office, Boston; will act as agents in disposing of the work to subscribers living nearer to them than to Utica.

All publishers of papers which advocate either the doctrine of endless misery or universal salvation, are requested to give the above Proposals a few insertions.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XVIII.

DANIEL.—This book was written by Daniel the prophet, it was originally written in Chaldee and Hebrew: Daniel is spoken of by Josephus as one of the greatest of their prophets, he was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, in the time of Jehoiakim, king of the Jews, and he was contemporary with Jeremiah and Ezekiel. He prophesied about 70 years. Additions have been made to this book, as may be seen in the Apocrypha; as the history of Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon, but they are evidently spurious, and of no authority whatever.

Dan. chapter 2.—In this chapter we have an account of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and the interpretation of it by Daniel.

The vision announced a succession of four empires. See verse 35. The first of these empires was that of Babylon; (see verse 38;) what the two next empires were we are not told, (see verse 39,) but they were evidently the Persian and Macedonian, as these rose up in succession after the Babylonian. We are not told what the fourth kingdom was, (see verse 40,) but it was no doubt the Roman, as this succeeded the Macedonian; and with respect to power, extent, and duration, it was greatly superior to any of the preceding three. This kingdom was overthrown by intestine divisions and civil war. See verses 41, 42, 43.—The stone which was cut out of the mountain, and was to break in pieces these kingdoms, was the kingdom of Christ, to be established on earth, which will finally spread and prevail throughout the whole earth, and bring all other kingdoms in subjection to it. See verses 44, 45.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. F. MANLEY.

Section II.—John the Baptist's Birth and Parentage.

LUKE i: 5.—There was in the days of Herod the king of Judea, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abia: and his wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elizabeth.

6. And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.

7. And they had no child, because Elizabeth was barren; and they both were now well stricken in years.

8. And it came to pass, that, while he executed the priest's office before God in the order of his course,

9. According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord.

10. And the whole multitude of the people were praying without, at the time of incense.

Verse 5—"Herod the king."—This was Herod the Great. And as a large number of the Herod family is mentioned in the New Testament, I will here give a list of them with the passages where they are referred to.

Herod the Great is mentioned in Matt. ii: in several places, and Luke i: 5. Archelaus, Matt. ii: 22. Philip, Luke iii: 1. Antipas, Matt. xiv: 3; Mark vi: 14, 17; Luke iii: 19, 20; xiii: 31, 32; xxiii: 11. These were the sons of Herod the Great, among whom he divided his dominions at his death. Herod Agrippa, Acts xii: 1. This was grandson of Herod the Great, and son of Aristobulus. Agrippa Junior, Acts xxv: 13; xx: 1; the son of the former. Herodius, Matt. xiv: 3; Mark vi: 17; Luke iii: 19. She was the lawful wife of Herod Philip, but the unlawful wife of his brother Antipas. See Matt. xiv: 3, 4. Bernice, Acts xxv: 13, and xxvi: 30. She was sister of Agrippa Jun., and daughter of the elder Agrippa. Drusilla, Acts xxiv: 24, was sister of the former.

"The course of Abia."—The sacerdotal families were divided into twenty-four classes. That of Abia was the eighth in order. See 1 Chron. xxiv: 1; 2 Kings xi: 7; 2 Chron. xxiii: 8.

"Of the daughters of Aaron."—She, as well as her husband, belonged to the sacerdotal families—was of priestly descent.

6. "Before God."—This expression is merely used to denote emphasis. Zacharias and Elizabeth were remarkably religious. The same expression is used, in the same way, in a great number of instances. See among others, Gen. x: 9, and Jonah iii: 3.

9. "His lot was," etc.—Jewish writers inform us that the duty of each priest was determined by lot. In this way it became the duty of Zacharias to burn incense morning and evening.—See Ex. xxx: 7, 8.

ESSAYS ON WAR . . . NO. X.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Better all the wealth on earth should be sunk, and every being destroyed, than to have a single moral principle in God's universe violated."—THE AUTHOR.

I have here quoted my own words for a motto, because Br. Grosh selected them from the sixth number in order to bring them more distinctly before me and the reader, to see if he understood them. I therefore turn aside from the path which I had marked out, to consider them again in a very brief manner. I would remark here, that when a sentence has once dropped from our pen, and afterwards is presented again to us, we may not always be able to state clearly our own meaning; for we are very probably in a different frame of mind from what we were when such a remark was made. Indeed, we may entirely forget that we ever made such an observation; which was actually the case here, for a good brother reminded me of this statement, and I wondered where he could have found it in my writings.

But the great point now to be settled, is, what could I have meant in such a sweeping remark? for really it seems to sweep the universe. It is indeed tremendous in its aspect, but nevertheless may possibly be true. Let us look at the connection in which it stands: for Br. Grosh has torn it away from all the illustrative remarks with which it stood. When this statement dropped from my pen, I was showing the immoral influence of war. "What," I asked, "is the waste of wealth, and the loss of life, when compared with moral principle?" Then follows the remark, "Principle," it is added, "is of far more value than life. Jesus preferred to sacrifice himself rather than to sacrifice the principles he came to establish. We place too great a value upon our lives, and too little on moral principle. We seem to think that life must be preserved at all hazards. Now, this view of the value of life would not be so bad, if we would place the same value upon the life of our neighbor, that we do upon our own." The reader has now distinctly before him the observation which has so astonished Br. Grosh, and also the connection in which it is found. He will see that I was endeavoring to bring out a great moral truth—that was, the extreme value of moral principle. The idea which lay in my mind was this, if I remember right. It would be better for us to lose all our wealth and our own lives, than to violate a moral principle to preserve them. To illustrate: I believe it wrong to take the life of another, in order to preserve my own. And here I think I follow my Saviour. Now, then, in accordance with this view, would it not be better to sacrifice our wealth, and our lives, than to violate this moral principle? Christianity teaches us not to sacrifice others, but to sacrifice ourselves. The kingdoms of the world have always acted on the reverse principle. I think if Br. Grosh will look over the whole subject carefully again, he will see that I was correct according to my views of moral principle. If I am wrong, I am willing to be convinced. Let him remember that Christianity teaches us that the friend must die for the enemy, not the enemy for the friend. "God commendeth his love toward us in that while we were yet enemies, Christ died for us." And when we are prepared to lose all our wealth, and all that we hold dear on earth, and even our lives, then we have come up to the great standard of Christianity. "If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and his mother, and his wife and children, yea, and his own life also, he can not be my disciple." True: the expression is much softened by another evangelist. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me;" but then the great moral principle is retained. And here we leave the whole matter in respect to this observation which Br. Grosh has quoted; and in our succeeding numbers we shall show the influence of war on civilization; then meet some prominent objections, and close with stating some remedies that may be employed to cure the war-spirit.

CHRIST EQUAL WITH GOD.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

"Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus; who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross."—Phil. ii: 5-8.

There is an absurdity involved in this portion of the sacred word as it is quoted from the common version, which every one, who reflects on it a moment, will not fail to perceive. It was the design of the apostle to exhort the Philippians to be humble, meek and obedient—to take Christ for their pattern in these things, who acted the part of a servant, and was obedient unto death.—It was then irrelevant and inappropriate to represent Christ as claiming an equality with God, and then set him before them as a pattern of meekness. As if he had said, "Now in order to be humble, you must have the same mind that was in Christ. He being created in God's image, thought himself equal to God; and as you are also created in that image, think it no robbery to claim equality with the Most High, by making yourself of no reputation, taking the form of a servant, and, becoming obedient unto death." None can fail of perceiving the inconsistency here involved, and which can not be avoided without supposing that the words of the apostle are incorrectly rendered in our common version. Paul could not have intended to say, in such a connection that Jesus thought it not robbery to be equal with the Most High. Such an explication would be palpably inconsistent with the context. It would be giving an example of ambition for a pattern of meekness, it would be exhorting them to possess lowliness of mind by claiming the most august titles; to make themselves of no reputation, by making themselves equal with God.

Our present English copy of the Scriptures was translated by uninspired men, like ourselves, and it would not be a wonder, if it should eventually appear, that they had frequently mistaken the language of the sacred writers. That they have done so in this instance, we think is evident. Christ never claimed to be equal with God; but represented the Father as knowing more (Mark xiii: 32,) and being greater (John xiv: 28) than himself. I am aware that it is written (John v: 18) that the Jews sought to kill Jesus, because he "said that 'God was his Father,' making himself equal with God." But this was a charge made by the Jews, and which Christ denied. "Then Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily, verily, I say, unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do," etc. And this declaration could not have been true, had he been equal with the Father.

Neither did the apostle intend to assert that Christ "thought it not robbery to be equal with God."—Clarke translates it, that Christ "being in the form of God, did not covet to be honored as God.* Whiston, that "he did not assume to be equal with God." Newcome, that "he did not eagerly desire to be like God." Parkhurst renders isa theos (equal) is or like God.

Either of these translations would obviate the difficulty involved in our common version. Christ did not assume to rob God by claiming an equality with him. So the ancients understood the apostle. In a letter from the churches of Vienna and Lyons, written in the year of our Lord 177, while speaking of the modesty of the faithful, it is said, "They would not take on themselves the august title of martyrs imitating Christ, who bearing the likeness or image of God, did not think the title of God equally belonged to him."

Origen, in his commentary on St. John, says: "Christ's greatness has appeared more resplendent in his humiliation, than if he had thought it no robbery to be God's equal." Let us learn from the subject before us, to use our rational and intellectual faculties in the investigation of divine truth. Let us learn that wherever the sacred Word appears absurd and inconsistent, there is some mistake in the translation, or that it is an interpolation, or that it is our ignorance of ancient idioms, usages and customs, which prevents us from understanding it. Whatever God has revealed, it is our privilege to understand.

THE RIGHTEOUS AND THE WICKED.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

I have often thought individual experience the best criterion by which to determine character. Let any man turn his thoughts within himself, and see how the case stands there. Let him take into consideration the course he is pursuing, and has pursued. Let him reflect upon his general course of conduct, and then see what have been his motives and intentions, all the while.—Have they been such as his own individual conscience could sanction? Can he look every human being in the face, and say, I have not meaningly done you wrong? And can he say the same of himself? and has he done his duty towards his Maker? If so, then he has done his duty to himself, his fellow-men, and his God: and when he reflects upon his course of conduct, and sees that all his motives have been good, he will be satisfied with himself. No guilty fears will damp his joys; and to a man of this cast, it may truly be said, "he feareth God, and worketh righteousness, and therefore is accepted of God."

Let us now turn our attention to the opposite character. He has not followed the same upright course with the other. His intentions have partaken largely of fraud, deceit and treachery. His ways have been marked with duplicity, and he has acted as though the end justified the means. Ask such a man if he is satisfied with the course he is pursuing, and his downcast eye will tell you that he is not, and can not be; and should he declare the true state of his mind, he would tell you that his soul was far from being the habitation of peace.

Ask that miserable, deluded youth, who is already far gone in the ways of sin; who has been frequenting the haunts of vice and dissipation; who has fondly imagined happiness was to be found in the path of iniquity! oh, ask him if he is satisfied with his present practices—if his condition is just what he desires! Has he no want; is there no lack of any thing to render him contented and happy? Yes, he wants the one thing needful, and that one thing is innocence. Without this, though all earth may lend its aid, all is vain. For him the songster may tune his sweetest notes, for him the flowers may bloom and the fruits ripen, for him the fields may yield their hundred fold. Nay more, the nearest and dearest friends may stand around him to soothe his peace-forsaken soul—all is useless, all alike unavailing and unsatisfactory. Memory, which, to the righteous man, is the harbinger of peace, and which brings back by-gone days, and kindles anew the joys of other years, to him is but the messenger of wo. Ah, vain would he make an utter oblivion of the past, and bury it in dark forgetfulness! But alas! the recollection of deeds past recall, haunt his guilty soul! He looks back, and thinks of the time when he innocently passed the first of his youthful years. Virtue then, as now, lifted her warning voice, but vice prevailed, and ruin followed.

And now, let each one make experience the test, and then tell me whether you can reflect upon a single wicked act, in your whole life, and feel satisfied—feel as though you desired to repeat it. No, you can not. It is not in the moments of sober contemplation, when taking into consideration cause and consequence, that men are wont to devise wicked schemes, and then attempt their prosecution. No! but it is when reason forgets to do her office—when passion takes the lead. Then they are hurried on to the indulgence of vice and the perpetration of crime. Let every one then, during the season of calmness, reflect seriously upon the way of the righteous, and the way of the wicked, and you will be ready to say with Balaam, the son of Beor, "Let me die the death of the righteous; and let my last end be like his;" and, in addition to this, you will say, let me live the life of the righteous, and let all my days be like his.

But, should any one not feel entirely satisfied with the bitter things he has found mingled in the cup of the transgressor, and should he attempt to go still farther, and learn more of the ways of the wicked, let me tell you, you are treasuring up repentance, against the day of repentance. You know what your own experience has told you thus far: and can you, dare you hope that it shall not be so in future? God has said, "there is no peace to the wicked," and every wicked man, if he is honest, will tell you the same. And if you are but an apprentice in vice—if you have not gone a long way in the practice of iniquity, ask him that has, and learn of him whether the road grows more smooth as it is advanced in.—Where is the old transgressor—he who is hardened in crime and villany, whose soul is black with guilt? To him would I appeal in this matter. How is it with the murderer—he whose hands are imbued with his brother's blood? Ask Cain; and he will tell you in the agony of his soul: "My punishment is greater than I can bear."

Doubtless, the Partialist will say, these are strange sentiments, coming as they do, from a believer in the doctrine of God's unlimited grace (for it is often asserted, that we believe in no punishment for sin.) To him, then, would I say, that I have but advanced the sentiments of every genuine Universalist. It is one of the established items of our faith, that God shall reward the righteous, and that "he will by no means clear the guilty." In confirmation of these facts, I have named experience, which, the world over, is explicit upon this subject. It is a witness that can not, does not lie. It has been the great teacher of man, from the morn of creation down to the present time. Go to the records of history—that chronicle of the past, and you will find it testifying to the truth of what I have said! Go to the Bible—and there the sentiment is reiterated again and again—peace to the righteous and wo to the wicked. What more shall I say? I have no arguments greater, or more weighty, than these. I can but repeat them over and over; and would to God they were deeply impressed upon every mind, and indelibly engraven upon every heart. Then would the hands of the righteous be strengthened, and the heart of the upright rejoiced. Then would the temple of virtue be frequented by a throng, vast as that mentioned by the revelator, "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands:" while the way of the wicked would be unknown; and his name blotted out from the earth forever.

REV. ALBERT BARNES—AGAIN.

One would hardly suppose, after reading the liberal and ennobling sentiments breathed in the extracts made in former numbers of this paper, from the above named gentleman's Essay, that it were possible for this same Mr. Barnes to be, not merely a Presbyterian, but a Calvinist! nay, to undertake the defence and meulation of the monstrous dogmas of that oft refuted and exploded scheme. Yet such is the lamentable fact. True, he holds Calvinism in a somewhat modified form, and has labored assiduously to divest it of some of its most odious features; but it is all in vain. The ugly features of the system remain the same. And his efforts to hide them only reminds one of the arts of a proud but faded beauty to hide with paste and rouge the pits, and wrinkles, and cadaverous hue of her odious face. It is somewhat amusing to see with what complacency and assurance even, he denominates Calvinism the "Evangelical System," the "Evangelical Scheme," the "Doctrine of Grace," etc., and then in exhibiting those doctrines, presents the reader with the doctrines of the fall of man, total depravity, Calvinistic election, etc., and attempts to find in nature examples and analogies for them all. He says:

"From the beginning, formidable objections have been brought against what are called the Doctrines of Grace, or the Evangelical System, or Calvinism. These objections have seldom, if ever, been drawn from the Bible. Their strength has consisted in the alledged fact, that these doctrines are in opposition to the established principles, by which God governs the world. We concede, that there is just enough of apparent irregularity in those principles, to make these objections plausible with the great mass of men, just as there was enough of irregularity and improbability in the Copernican system of astronomy, to make it for a long time liable to many and plausible objections. Certain appearances strongly favored the old doctrine, that the sun, moon, and stars travelled, in marshalled hosts, around our insignificant orb, just as, in the Arminian system, certain appearances may seem to indicate that man is the centre of the system, and that God, and all the hosts of heaven, live and act chiefly to minister to his comfort. But it is now clear, that all the proper facts in astronomy go to prove, that the earth is a small part of the plan, and to confirm the system of Copernicus. So we affirm that the Calvinistic scheme—despite all Arminian appearances, is the plan on which this world is actually governed; and that all the objections that have been urged against it are urged against facts that are fixed in the very nature of things. And we affirm that a mind which could take in all these facts, could make up the Calvinistic scheme without the aid of revelation, from the actual course of events; just as in the ruins of an ancient city the skilful architect can discern in the broken fragments, pillars of just dimensions, arches of proper proportions, and the remains of edifices of symmetry and grandeur."

It appears to me Mr. Barnes has made a capital mistake to begin with. He seems to have taken it for granted, that the issue was to be made up between Calvinism and Arminianism—that there was no other alternative, but one of these systems must be true to the exclusion of the other. Had he looked abroad on the outspread volume of nature, and attentively perused its ample pages, comparing its testimony with the clear voice of revelation, untrammelled by a creed, unbiased by preconceptions, he would have discovered the wisdom, power and goodness of God, all harmoniously united and combined in planning and accomplishing the greatest good of the whole universe, uniting all that is good, and excluding all that is bad, both in Calvinism and Arminianism, and resulting in a system far more glorious and honorable to God, and more worthy the adoption and admiration of man than either. True, if the choice is to be made between the two, Calvinism is the more consistent, because its plan is fixed and certain—it allows of no contingency, and its Divinity can never be disappointed nor defeated, like that of the Arminian. Still the Arminian may well hesitate to give up his weak, disappointed, but benevolently disposed Deity, for the powerful but partial and vindictive one of the Calvinist.

* Arpagmon (translated robbery) has been supposed to imply a thing eagerly to be seized, coveted, or desired; and on this interpretation the passage has been translated, "who being in the form of God, did not think it matter to be earnestly desired to be equal with God." This rendering Clarke approves in his comment on the passage, Phil. ii: 6.

Had Mr. B. adopted all that was good and rejected all that was bad in both these systems, allowed to his mind that noble and exalted freedom that he so highly commends in some of the former extracts published, and fully carried out the principles there set forth, he would not have run into the same quagmire with others of whom he speaks: and he would, moreover, have rendered his Essay much more serviceable in the cause of truth, and more invulnerable to the shafts of infidelity, than it now is. But taking it for granted that God was partial and vindictive, and that the doctrine of endless sin and suffering was true, he seemed to think he must find some analogy thereto in the volume of nature, and the ordinary dealings of God with mankind, and accordingly has undertaken to bend to his service in this respect, circumstances and events which we shall see in the end make as directly against him and his views, as they do against the infidel, that they were particularly aimed against.

He assumes in one part of this Essay that virtue and vice possess respectively a kind of cumulative power and tendency—that if unchecked by each other, and unrestrained by any other power, they would go on increasing their strength and magnifying their results, till virtue, in a community where it prevailed by universal consent, and whose tendency is to life, and peace, and happiness, would completely triumph and banish vice and misery, rendering such community signally prosperous and happy; and vice and corruption, on the other hand, in a community where vice universally prevailed, whose tendency is to misery and destruction, would become more and more fearful and fatal in its developments, until, perforce of its own self-destroying tendency, it would lead to fatal results, to irretrievable ruin. Such self-destruction individuals (as for example, the drunkard) commit; and likewise communities and nations, as Gomorrah, Babylon, Athens, Rome, etc. Nor are the results of virtue and vice confined particularly to time or space. They may extend through a long series of years, and even ages, and over distant and different countries and climates, and still receive their appropriate rewards and punishments, though far from the point of time or locality where the deeds were performed.

To these sentiments, in the main, we make no objections. They appear rational and consistent, and for the most part are borne out by observable facts in the moral government of the world. But what is the point to which these observations tend in the theory of Mr. Barnes? What is the main focus towards which these rays are concentrated? Mr. B. shall answer for himself. Let us hear him. He says:—

“Such is the frame of society, and such the frame of an individual. So we expect, if God gave up the world to unrestrained evil it would accomplish its own perdition. We think we see in every human frame, and in the mingled and clashing powers of every society, the elements of ruin, and all that is necessary to secure that ruin is to remove the pressure of the hand that now restrains the wild and terrific powers, and saves the world from self-destruction. So if virtue had a fair trial, we apprehend it would be as complete in its results. We expect, in heaven, it will secure its own rewards—like the machine which we have supposed—always harmonious in its movements. So in hell, we expect there will be the elements of universal misrule—and that all the foreign force that will be necessary to secure eternal misery, will be Almighty Power to preserve the terrible powers in unrestrained being, and to press them into the same mighty prison house—just like some adamant enclosure that should keep the engine together and fix the locality of its tremendous operations.

“Long ago it had passed into a proverb, that ‘murder will out.’ This is just an illustration of what we are supposing. Let a murderer live long enough, and such is the organization of society, that vengeance will find him out. Such, we suppose, would be the case in regard to all crimes, if sufficient permanency were given to the affairs of men, and if things were not arrested in the midst of their way. Results in eternity, we suppose, are but the transfer to another state of results which would take place here, if the guilty were not removed. We ask the infidel,—we ask the Universalist, why this state of things should be arrested by so unimportant a circumstance as death? Here is a uniform system of things—uniform as far as the eye can run it backward into past generations,—uniform, so as to become the foundation of laws and of the entire conduct of the world,—and uniform, so far the eye can trace the results of conduct forward in all the landmarks set up along our future course. Unless God change, and the affairs of other worlds are administered on principles different from ours, it must be that this system will receive its appropriate termination there. It belongs to the infidel and the Universalist to prove, that the affairs of the universe come to a solemn pause at death; that we are ushered into a world of different laws, and different principles of government,—that we pass under a new sceptre, a sceptre too, not of justice, but of disorder, misrule, and the arrest of all that God has begun in his administration;—that the results of conduct, manifestly but just commenced here, are finally arrested by some strange and unknown principle at our death;—and that we are to pass to, a world of which we know nothing, and in which we have no means of conjecturing what will be the treatment which crime and virtue will receive. We ask them, can they demonstrate this strange theory? Are men willing to risk their eternal welfare on the presumption, that God will be a different being there from what he is here, and that the conduct which meets with us here, will there meet with bliss? Why not rather suppose,—as Christianity does—according to all the analogy of things, that the same Almighty hand shall be stretched across all worlds alike, and that the bolts which vibrate in his hand now, and point their thunders at the head of the guilty, shall fall with tremendous weight there, and close, in eternal life and death, the scenes begun on earth? We know of no men who are acting under so fearful probabilities against their views, as those who deny the doctrine of future punishment. Here is a long array of uniform facts, all, as we understand them, founded on the presumption that the scheme of the infidel cannot be true. The system is continued through all the revolutions to which men are subject. Conduct, in its results, travels over all the interruptions of sleep, sickness, absence, delirium, that man meets with, and passes on from age to age.

“The conduct of yesterday terminates in results to-day; that of youth extends into old age; that of health reaches even beyond a season of sickness; that of sanity, beyond a state of delirium. Crime here meets its punishment, it may be after we have crossed oceans, and snows, and sands, in some other part of the globe. Far from country and home, in lands of strangers where no eye may recognise or pity us, but that of the unseen witness of our actions, it follows us in remorse of conscience, or in the judgments of the storm, the siroc, or the ocean. We are amazed that it should be thought that death will arrest this course of things, and that crossing that narrow vale, will do for us what the passage from yesterday to to-day, from youth to age, from the land of our birth to the land of strangers and of solitudes, can never do. Guilty man carries the elements of his own perdition within him, and it matters little whether he be in society or in solitude, in this world or in the next—the inward fires will burn, and the sea and the dry land, and the burning ciemes of hell, will send forth their curses to greet the wretched being who has dared to violate the laws of the unseen God, and to ‘hail’ him as the ‘new possessor’ of the ‘profoundest hell.’”

Here, then, we have the ultimatum of Mr. Barnes, the final result of his observations on the tendency and destiny of virtue and vice, converging, step by step, to the grand climacteric of his creed—the doctrine of infinite rewards and punishments—the tremendous dogma of endless damnation! And he would fain have the reader believe that the whole course of nature, and the moral government of God over mankind in this world, tend directly to give countenance and support to the horrid dogma. But, although he is a man of great ingenuity, and for the most part, i. e., on other subjects, analogy bears him out in his positions, yet upon this point he is exceedingly lame, and analogy, so far as it bears at all on the subject, will be found directly against his theory.

The more fully to demonstrate this, let it be remarked, that Mr. B. himself maintains that the natural tendency of vice is to destruction, whether in individuals or communities—that if allowed to take its course unrestrained and unopposed, it leads directly to ruin or self-destruction. He says, “we think we see in every human frame, and in the mingled and clashing powers of every society, the elements of ruin, and all that is necessary to secure that ruin is to remove the pressure of the hand that now restrains the wild and terrific powers, and saves the world from self-destruction.” Now if vice possess in this world a self-destroying tendency, and lead to the destruction both of its perpetrator and itself, why, reasoning from analogy, may we not suppose that, if it exist in another state, it will have there, as here, the same self-destroying power? Why will it not as naturally produce self-annihilation, in that state as this? Why, Mr. B. tells us that “Almighty power will preserve the terrible powers [of the wicked] in unrestrained being, and press them into the same mighty prison-house [hell] just like some adamant enclosure that shall keep the engine together, and fix the locality of its tremendous operations.” If, then, the Almighty preserve voluntarily the powers of the wicked to all eternity, just to prevent them from destroying themselves according to their natural tendency, it must be because he approves of sin and iniquity, and delights in the contemplation of misery! And, indeed, by his saying that “all the foreign force that will be necessary to secure eternal misery, will be almighty Power to preserve,” etc., it would seem that he considered eternal misery necessary and desirable, and that it must be secured at all events! But is such the character of the true Divinity? Or can Mr. B. truly love and adore such a Deity? We should hope not.

But what, in the mean time, becomes of Mr. B.’s analogy? Here he represents vice as working its own destruction, but in another world (whose secrets he would arrive at by the law of analogy) he supposes, either that the laws of God’s moral government will be reversed, or that almighty Power will interpose to prevent the law from its natural and legitimate operation! Here God disapproves of vice and employs means to terminate it, either by the destruction or conversion of its perpetrators; but in the next world he will so much approve and delight in it, that he will interpose his own omnipotence to preserve the powers that commit it in full force, and confine them exclusively to its perpetration! How strange that a man of Mr. B.’s talents and acumen, should make such egregious blunders in reasoning! It can be accounted for on no other grounds but by the blinding influence of tradition and the trammels of a creed.

Now, we do not deny that the tendency of vice in this world is often to destruction, both in individuals and communities. Individuals often bring on themselves temporal destruction, or premature death, by their vices; and communities not unfrequently do the same, or by their excesses and wickedness break up all the bonds of union, dissolve their body politic, and a new class, new organization, and new state of things succeeds.—But analogy would by no means lead us to infer from hence, either the doctrine of the soul’s annihilation, or of its endless misery; because temporal death is the lot of all, sooner or later, whether accelerated by vice, or occurring from natural causes, as sickness and old age.—And all communities in this world, whether good or bad, will sooner or later be dissolved or broken up; besides, the respective members thereof are constantly passing off the stage of action.

Again, it often happens that the vices and iniquity of individuals, with the bitter rewards that follow in their train, operate the effectual cure of their subject and forever wean him from the love of vice. And even in communities the same results are observed, and wickedness reaching a certain pass, brings down, as its natu-tal fruits, such woes, such condign retribution, as to arouse the sleepy conscience to do its work, and thereby that community is startled, humbled, penitent, reformed. Now what would analogy lead us to infer from these facts? Certainly not the doctrine of eternal misery; but the possibility, yea, the probability, that, should the retributions for iniquity follow man into another state of being, they will there work their destined end, and in due time bring him, like the prodigal, to himself, first, and next to his Father's house.

Mr. B. says, "results in eternity, we suppose, are but the transfer to another state, of results which would take place here, if the guilty were not removed?" Very well, Mr. B., now, as many of the guilty would be humbled, subdued and brought to repentance and reformation, in this world, by the sufferings they would endure, and the sanctifying power of the divine spirit, were they not so soon removed out of the world, we ask why may not these results follow in another state of being? Why must the general plan be interrupted, and the apparent design of the moral government of God thwarted by the sudden death of the individual? To use the very language of Mr. B., only substituting the word Partialist for Universalist—"We ask the infidel—we ask the Partialist, why this state of things should be arrested by so unimportant a circumstance as death?"

As I happen not to be of the number of those who, like the infidel, believe that death terminates the consciousness and being of man forever; nor of the number of those who believe that all punishment is necessarily confined to this state—that the course of justice is arrested, and man freed from all further guilt or responsibility for past sins by death alone; (for did I thus believe, I should not know how to evade the force of Mr. B.'s argument here;) but as I have ever believed that the work of retribution and discipline would go on in the next world, where it had not accomplished its full object in this; I trust I can, without incurring the charge either of inconsistency or rashness, turn the tables upon Mr. B., and in a kind of parody on his own language, in which I shall vary but a very few words from him, show the absurdity of his conclusions, and the reasonableness, on the principles of analogy, of the doctrine of the restitution of all things.

Now Mr. B. will admit, for no Christian can deny, that vice often receives in this world adequate and condign punishment—punishment that often humbles the proud, brings the haughty low, and by the sanctifying influence of that Divine Spirit, prostrates him at the feet of Jesus, where he sues for, and obtains, mercy, in the pardon of his sins, and the assurance of everlasting grace and salvation—that many saints now in heaven, were once sinners on earth, and were thus reclaimed and brought to the knowledge of salvation—that many young sinners have been cut off from the earth in the morning of life, and others in the midst of their days, without a moment's warring of death, who, had they lived longer, would, in all probability, have met with the happy change that others have experienced, would have been effectually weaned from the love of sin, and had their mouths filled with songs of praise to God and the Lamb. Keeping these things in view, may we not with propriety say, in nearly the words of Mr. B.

Results in the next world are but the transfer to another state of results which would have taken place here, if the guilty had not been removed till after their punishment had wrought its desired effect in humbling them and bringing them penitent to the foot of the cross.—We ask the infidel—we ask the Partialist, or Limitarian, why this state of things, this obvious design and tendency of punishment, should be arrested by so unimportant a circumstance as death? Here is a general system of divine government adopted, by which the punishments annexed to transgression tend to check and ultimately cure evil dispositions, unless suddenly arrested or diverted from their legitimate aim,*—general, so far as the eye can run it backward into past generations,—general, so as to become the foundation of laws and of the conduct of the world,—and general, so far as the eye can trace the results of conduct and discipline forward in all the landmarks set up along our future course. Why, then, should God appoint a law, or system of government, so wise and so general here, that is to fail the moment we pass to some other part of our being? Unless God change, and the affairs of other worlds are administered on principles different from ours, it must be that this system will receive its appropriate termination there. It belongs to the infidel and the Partialist to prove that the affairs of the universe come to a solemn pause at death; that we are ushered into a world of different laws and different principles of government,—that we pass under a new sceptre, a sceptre, too, not of justice and mercy harmoniously blended, but of disorder, misrule, and the arrest of all that God has begun in his administration—that the results of conduct, manifestly but just commenced here, are finally arrested by some strange and unknown principle at our death; and that we are to pass to a world of which we know nothing, and in which we have no means of conjecturing what will be the destiny of individuals, or the treatment which crime and virtue will receive—where either all conscious being ceases at once, or if perpetuated by the Deity, he will there so far approve of vice, and show his love of sin, disorder and misery, as to render them perennial and secure their endless existence under his government! We ask them, can they demonstrate so strange a theory? Are men willing to risk their reputation as analogical reasoners, and the effects of that reasoning on community, upon the strange presumption, that God will be a different being there from what he is here, and that sinners whom he here chastises that they may be reformed and become partakers of his holiness, he will there confirm in sinfulness and compel them to endless rebellion against him? Why not rather suppose—as Christianity does—according to all the analogy of things, that the same Almighty and Beneficent hand shall be stretched across all worlds alike, and that both the bolts which vibrate in his hand now, and point their thunders at the head of the guilty, and the voice of mercy that calls him away from his crimes and his misery, shall extend even there, and operate with equal or greater efficacy, and finish the work which they left but begun on earth, till all things shall be subdued unto Christ, according to the Scriptures, and he deliver up the reconciled kingdom to God the Father, that God may be all in all? We know of no men who are acting under so strong probabilities against their theory, drawn from analogy, as the infidel and the advocate of endless misery. Here is a long array of analogies and facts, all, as we understand them, founded on the presumption that neither of their schemes can be true: and the system is continued through all the revolutions to which men are subject.

Virtue will not be suffered to go unrewarded; nor can vice escape its condign punishment. Though the wicked may be the old or the "new possessors" of the "profoundest hell," and may carry it within them from youth to middle age, from middle to old age, from country to country, from clime to clime, and even from one world to another, still the same God presides over them and their destinies, bears to them the same relation of Creator and Father in one state as another; and when, like Jonah, they cry to him "out of the belly of hell," he will hear their voice, or when like David, who before he was afflicted went astray, but afterwards learned to keep God's law, they truly repent and call on God through Christ for mercy, he will, as in the case of the Psalmist, "deliver their soul from the lowest hell."—They shall obtain mercy that had not obtained mercy—she shall be called beloved that was not beloved, and it shall come to pass in the place where it was said, Ye are not my people, there shall they be called the children of the living God.

Thus we see that reason, analogy, Christianity, revelation, all go against the theory of Mr. B.—that his own weapons are seen to be quite as sharp and pointed when turned against his theory, as when employed against the infidel, and far more so than when aimed against "the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began;" in short, that they can not be legitimately turned against this glorious theory; for it is supported by analogy and revelation, and harmonizes with the best affections and holiest desires of all good beings. "Whoso readeth, let him understand." D. S.

THE TESTIMONY SET ASIDE.

"I am astonished, Mr. B., that a man of your good sense should believe in that old Book, when its teachings are so contradictory, as well as full of superstition and absurdity, that they cannot, and should not receive an honest man's credence; and when the patterns it holds up to us, were notoriously corrupt and profligate"—said a skeptic to one of our preachers one day, before a large company. "Ah," said Br. B., "and how do you prove the Bible to be a pack of lies, and unworthy of our confidence?" "Quite easily," replied the other.—citing two or three apparent contradictions, in proof "Well," said Br. B., "suppose I admit that you are correct, how will you prove your other assertion?" "Was not David declared to be a man after God's own heart, and was he not guilty of the most abominable crimes?" said the skeptic, triumphantly. "I can not admit that he was," replied Br. B. "But," said the skeptic, "the Bible says so, and"—"Hold," quickly retorted the preacher, "I can not admit the testimony of that Book; for you have, yourself, just now declared it unworthy of an honest man's belief!" The skeptic was fairly caught in his own net, as Br. B. intended he should be, and laughingly he acknowledged himself "beat this time." A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in February by Br. HAYWARD in Adams—Br. BARTHOLOMEW in North Norwich—Br. C. S. BROWN in Prompton, Pa. [some notices too late, and those in P. S. do not say for whom, besides being, in part, too late also]—Br. GROSH in Bridgewater—Br. BIDDLECOM in Collinsville.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in February, by Br. C. S. BROWN, in Prompton, Pa.—Br. GROSH, in Taberg, and in school house near Br. Cames, in Lee, in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday in February, by Br. C. S. BROWN, in Prompton, Pa.

A Conference of the Black River Association will be held in Mexico village, Oswego county, on the last Wednesday and Thursday of February (26th and 27th). Ministering brethren are invited to attend.

P. MORSE, Standing Clerk.

ALTERATION—The Conference of the Otsego Association will be held at Richfield Springs, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in February, instead of the first, as previously noticed. Ministering brethren are invited to attend.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE WESTERN MISSIONARY'S BRIDE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

I go with thee—I will be thine
 In weal, in want, in woe;
 Thy path, where'er it leads, is mine—
 I go, my love, I go!

To dim old woods, to trackless dells,
 Where brooks sing soft and low,
 Where tall rank wild flowers droop their bells,
 There, love, with thee I go!

I leave that fond, maternal love
 Whose long tried truth I know,
 For one who may less faithful prove—
 Yet, yet, my love, I go!

I go to forests dark and lone,
 Where flowers in shadows grow
 Where scarce the gentle stars have shone, Beloved, there I go!

'Tis not for wealth I seek the shade
 Of forest bower and tree;
 To share the sorrows on thee laid—
 For this I go with thee!

To bind the bruises of thy heart
 When scornful foes denide;
 To be with thee, where'er thou art,
 Thy loving, faithful bride!

To train the vine around our hut—
 A bright and verdant screen,
 Lest thou shouldst sigh to think my lot
 At home too rudely mean!

Through long, long days, and fearful nights—
 A sleepless watch to keep;
 To tremble like a startled fawn,
 Above thy troubled sleep!

To comfort thee, when faithless friends
 Are sleeping in their sins,
 And all thy wasting labor ends
 Just where thy work begins;

To sing to thee when hope grows dim,
 And faith wanes dark and low,
 To sing to thee some strong, old hymn—
 My love, for this I go!

O spare my heart that pining look—
 These weak tears shall not flow;
 'Twas that last foolish gaze I took—
 I'm ready now to go!

Shirley village, Mass.

THE QUAKERS.

The following we cut out of the U. S. Gazette. Of course, time and prosperity have wrought their usual changes on the denominations spoken of. The Friends have departed somewhat from the plainness of dress and speech, and the plainer the fashion, the richer and more extravagant the materials of which the dresses of their wealthy members are composed. It may be doubted, also, whether their "waiting for the spirit" and other peculiarities in their worship, have not become as much of form as any forms in use among other sects. But still in general the letter truly describes the true Friends of the present day.

The letter being written in a country where the priesthood is a piece of the State machinery—where even the dissenting clergy are obliged to meddle in political strifes to aid their people in gaining their civil rights—needs some modification to apply to the clergy in this country, where, in most denominations, they are considered as the Friends generally consider their most esteemed and active speakers.

The remark respecting the irreligious implicit faith of infidelity, will touch many a brawling skeptic of our own day.

A. D. G.

Extract of a letter from Queen Caroline (wife of George the Second) to the Princess Charlotte.

Bid I court applause, I would preface this letter with an apology, for the ignorance of hinting at religious principle. To suppose the Great swayed in their conduct, by a respect for religion, is an affront to the delicacy and refinement of their taste. Hence, the day set apart by the laws of their country for religious service, they deride and insult as a vulgar and obsolete institution; should you propose to them the renewal of family devotion, which concluded the guiltless evening entertainments of their ancestors, you would become an object of their pity rather than of their contempt. The sublime truths, the pure and simple manners of the Gospel, are now trodden under foot. Can we wonder if that profession, which asserts these truths, and preaches these morals, be treated with similar contempt? But irreligion knows no bounds when once let loose; and Christianity herself has been obliquely insulted within those consecrated walls, where decency and policy, in the absence of reason and virtue, would forever have held her in legal reverence. But notwithstanding the general contempt of religion among the Great, you are not to imagine the present age is deep in speculations of infidelity. No such thing—for that would imply a certain attention to these subjects—a certain degree of self-conscience and thought; and this would clash with the ruling manners of the times. Indeed, there have not been wanting laborious husbandmen who have painfully sown their tares, not in the night season, but in the broad daylight. These have at length shot up into a large and fruitful crop of irreligious implicit faith, for implicit faith is belief or disbelief without evidence, and why they disbelieve, few of the present age can tell. They have other attentions than the meagre sophisms of irreligion, and are, therefore, well content with the conclusion without the premises.

Fortunately for mankind, there has arisen out of this vile system of disputation, anarchy of belief and disbelief, a religion called the religion of the Quakers; and although the great have nothing to do with this simple, original worship, I shall make a few remarks upon it, because I am conscious you are as yet ignorant of its beauty, importance, and truth.

It appears to me, my Charlotte, that the progress made by this interesting people, vulgarly called Quakers, and officially called Friends, above all other sects, in simplifying Christianity, and freeing it from those mixtures which have so much disgraced and abused it, has been so extraordinary, that it may justly set them at the head of all reformers, and stamp them with a decisive character, in which their little peculiarities of manner are worthy of remark. In the first place, they are the only sect who admit no priests or ministers, as a separate order of men, into their constitution; an advantage of so capital a nature; that some think it is well worth purchasing by the institution of a distinct society for that direct purpose only. For what a legion of evils does this cut off! not to mention the greater mischiefs, which the struggles for wealth and power, by an established clergy, have in all countries occasioned. Are not their rivalries, their parties, their controversies, their interests, their intermeddlings, the banes of concord and brotherly affection in all the communities of separatists? Does not their ordinate authority frequently as much infringe the rights and liberties of private congregations, as it always does of national churches? Do they not afford a ready means of laying at the feet of power, the political influences of dissenting bodies? It would be too much to assert that it never was in the contemplation of the founder of the Christian religion, to institute such a body of men, and that the supposed necessity of them is contradictory to the notion of a divine revelation, freely and clearly communicated in writing; but we can not help lamenting, at least, that so many corruptions, forgeries, and interpolations of Scripture, which they have been accused of, should deform the page of history.

Secondly—I find the Quakers are the only people who have completely detached religion from state policy, and thereby avoided that doubtful combination of two dissimilar interests, which has too frequently spoiled and calumniated both. They have confined religion to its proper province, of amending the hearts and lives of men, and have abhorred the plan of making it subservient to the narrow and temporary purposes of a party or a government. They have not dared to enlist the Almighty in the service of a particular nation, or to point his thunders against their fellow creatures, merely because their worldly interests interfered.

They have not set apart days for the religious celebration, or commemoration of public events—the final consequence of which no man can see, and which are regarded with totally different feelings by different parties. Keeping their own hands unstained with blood, they have viewed the shedding of blood by others as a subject of humiliation rather than of thanksgiving; and if ever they offer prayers for national blessings, it is for those of peace, brotherly love, and righteousness, in which they desire that all mankind should equally participate and as strenuously endeavor to effect.

Thirdly—I do not know that they differ from other Christians in their speculative notions of the efficacy of prayer, and the interposition of Providence in human concerns; yet I can see that they are much more wary and reserved than others in making petitions for particular favors; and hence according to my judgment, they preserve a greater consistency in the theory of divine perfections, and inculcate a more tranquil and reverential submission to the will of the Deity. In this respect, they are a strong contrast to the Puritans of the last century, and the first Methodists of this, whose copious and minute addresses to Heaven often degenerated into indecent familiarity, and a querulous, impudent importunity.

Fourthly—by boldly discarding, instead of endeavoring to simplify and rationalize, those rites of religion which, from a kind of emblematical veil thrown about them, will always be abused and misunderstood by the vulgar and fanciful; they have eradicated from among themselves a vast mass of superstition and error, from which no sect that retains them is entirely free, and which, in some, has almost overwhelmed all that is valuable in revelation. How far they have been justified in doing this from the authority of Scripture, I do not inquire; but the advantage of having got rid of such inlets to false opinion, must be manifest to all who are capable of making comparisons, and of valuing the peace and happiness of mankind.

On the whole, it appears to me that no society of Christians ever acquired the essential of their religion at so cheap a rate, or in so pure a form; and these privileges are so intrinsically valuable, that I should not doubt of the ability of such a sect to maintain its ground, even though it were to resign its little peculiarities of speech and dress. But this is a measure I would by no means recommend to them; their dress, in particular, should never be renounced; its simplicity may expose them to the ridicule of fools, but at the same time, secure them the approbation of the wise and good. That you may be one of the latter number, is the prayer of,

CAROLINE.

A young lady at an examination in grammar, was asked why the noun bachelor was in singular. She replied immediately, and with much naivete, because it is very singular they don't get married.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, January 23d, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. JOHN GOLDEN, to Mrs. JEANETTE TURTELLOTTE, both of Little Falls.

In Denmark, January 2d, by Ev. J. French, Mr. ARCHLAUS C. ELLIS, of Potsdam, St. Lawrence county, to Miss JANE CHADWICK, of the former place.

In Rutland, January 5th, by the same, Mr. SCHUYLER WELLS, of Rutland, to Miss JEMINA HURLBURT, of Pinkney.

In Bristol, January 8th, by Rev. Wm. Gooden, Mr. SYMNER GOODING, to Miss EMILY PHILLIPS, all of Bristol.

In Springwater Valley, January 9th, by the same, Mr. A. R. SPENCER, to Miss ELIZA ANN MACK, both of that place.

In Salisbury, January 21st, by Rev. J. D. Hicks, of St. Johnsville, Mr. HENRY CROSBY, of Trenton, to Miss JENNET TUTTLE, daughter of Mr. Alfred Tuttle, of Salisbury.

DEATHS.

In Champion, November 7th, of Canker rash, MARY FRANCES, daughter of Joseph and Rachael Twining, aged 8 years, 4 months, and 5 days. She was sprightly, amiable and kind. She has now gone to the fair climes of immortal peace and rest. Funeral on the 9th, and sermon by the writer. J. FRENCH.

In Velasco, Texas, in the Fall of 1838, LEONARD J. HORNE, son of Elias and Visa Horne, of Ellisburg, N. Y., in the 24th year of his age.

* * Union and Trumpet please copy.

At Lassellville, December 22d, 1839, MARY D. HAGER, daughter of Wm. and H. S. Burnham, and consort of Mr. John Hager, in the 24th year of her age. The funeral was attended on the 23d, in the meeting-house at Lassellville, and a discourse delivered by the writer, to a crowded and attentive congregation, founded on 2 Corinthians v: 1.

Great praise is due to the inhabitants for their general attendance, and especially to the Methodist denomination, who, together with their preacher, Rev. Mr. Waters, took part in the services. The deceased was married last March, and this early dissolution of the marriage tie is truly afflicting to her bereaved husband. The infant child of the deceased, that had been buried a day or two previous, was taken up and beautifully laid out in its funeral dress, upon the arm of its mother, which made the scene most beautifully solemn. May that religion which comforted and sustained her in her last struggle, comfort and sustain the bereaved through all the meanderings of this mortal life.

J. D. HICKS.

In Livonia, on the 2d inst., of scarlet fever, HELEN JANE SEEVER, youngest daughter of John and Almira Seaver, aged 1 year, 3 months, and 9 days. The funeral was attended by the writer on the 3d inst., in the Presbyterian church at Livonia. O. B.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. II.—Duties of the Wife.

"—— To study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote."

As the duties of the wife are extensive in compass and complicated in their nature—as they vary in accordance with the station, circumstances and disposition of the husband—a minute illustration of the whole circle, might be extended to a well filled volume. Hence in a single chapter, I shall be able only to glance briefly at a few of the most prominent of those duties which are incumbent upon all wives in all ordinary circumstances.

The Deity has designed every creature for a particular sphere of action—the characteristics of which, depend upon the nature, the capabilities of each being. It is the operation of this general rule, that the young lady, on becoming a wife, finds (or should find) a new class of duties, obligations, and responsibilities devolving upon her—all growing out of the peculiar station she is called to occupy. She is not the husband, nor the master, nor the domestic, nor the child, but she is the wife, the companion, the mistress of the household; and as such, she has a sphere of action different from others, and peculiar in itself—a sphere of another character from that occupied by her husband, yet no less important, no less responsible, and no less necessary to be prudently and faithfully filled. If the husband does not properly discharge his duties, the fountains of all family prosperity and happiness are destroyed. But though the husband may be industrious and faithful in all that pertains to him, still if the wife fails in discharging her obligations, his efforts will all be in vain—neither prosperity nor enjoyment can attend the family. Hence the responsibility resting on the wife to discharge her duties faithfully, is as weighty, and calls for as perfect fulfilment, as that of the husband.

The first and most obvious duty of a wife, is to strive to promote her husband's happiness. This, it is true, is a reciprocal duty, equally binding on both parties in the marriage contract. But still from the tenderness and affection which dwell in woman's heart, and from her greater ability to be attractive and pleasing, it seems more directly within the province of the wife, as it is certainly more in her power, to set the example in those pleasing and reciprocal attentions, which so highly conduce to the enjoyments of married life. And there is no other possible manner in which she can succeed in making her husband kind, agreeable, and pleasant, than by striving to promote his enjoyments by assiduous and unwearied attentions. Hence the necessity which calls upon the wife to make her husband's happiness an object of paramount importance. When the husband is happy, his wife necessarily participates in his enjoyments. But when the husband is unhappy, can the wife fail to be unhappy also? If she can—if his troubles are not troubles to her—if his discontentment or despondency does not interrupt her enjoyments—she possesses not the love and attachment which rest in the heart of every good and virtuous wife. The truth is, where real, reciprocal affection exists between a married couple, the happiness or unhappiness of one, must be the happiness or unhappiness of the other. Therefore in urging the wife to be studious to promote her husband's happiness, I am but urging her to secure her own peace and enjoyment.

In reflecting upon this subject, the wife should ever bear in mind, that the origin of that union which has given her a provider and protector for life, was not in herself, but in her husband. She did not seek him out and propose herself to him, but he sought her—he selected her from all the throng by which she was surrounded—he bestowed upon her his heart's undivided affections—he made her his bride, and promised before God and the world, to "love, cherish and protect her," while life should continue. He has provided for her a home, and he toils, and is willing to toil in his business to obtain all things requisite to her enjoyments. These attentions and favors demand an adequate return, and make it the solemn and imperious duty of the wife, to strive as far as possible, to promote her husband's happiness. And the wife who overlooks or neglects these obligations, not only fails in duty, but pursues a course which must invariably be productive of disappointment and wretchedness. The woman who has a kind and affectionate husband, can not prize him too high, nor do too much to keep him so. If she will but call to mind the thousands who are united to unkind, selfish, harsh husbands, she will realize the value of one who has a good disposition, and who is disposed to be generous, peaceable and affectionate. And she will perceive that she can not be at too much pains to promote the growth and stability of these valuable traits of character—not too cautious to avoid doing any thing which would have a tendency to weaken his affection or sour his feelings.

In promoting her husband's happiness, the wife should endeavor to ascertain his disposition and habits. Every man has his peculiarities. A wife by exercising proper discernment, can soon become acquainted with those pertaining to her husband; and her conduct towards him, should have direct reference to his peculiarities, and should be of such a nature as to allow those of an unpleasant character, to sleep in embryo, and those that are valuable, to be brought into due and constant activity. "It is impossible to enumerate all the little incidents which frequently annoy married men, or the little unobtrusive pleasures which it is in the power of the wife to give; but throughout her life, in her employments and in her amusements, she should ever bear his pleasure in her mind. She should act for him in preference to herself, and she will be amply rewarded by witnessing his delight in her and in his home. To a woman who loves her husband with all the devotedness of her nature, this will be a pleasure, not a task; and to make him happy, she will never grudge or feel any sacrifice of self." It is very probable she will not find her husband faultless. She may discover many things in his disposition and habits which are not pleasing to her. But so far from exposing these failings to the world, she should rather strive to throw the veil of concealment over them, and endeavor by a judicious course on her own part, to amend his imperfections and have him become all she could desire him to be.

A deep interest in the domestic affairs of the household, is another important duty devolving upon the wife. There are those in affluent circumstances, who suppose it beneath the dignity of a lady, to be at all conversant with domestic duties. But they entirely mistake the station and office of a wife. Why did her husband wed her? Was it that he might have a drone in his hive?—that he might have his money squandered in a wild race after fashion's extravagant follies? Far different was his object. He desired to procure a "helpmeet"—one who was capable and willing to superintend the affairs of his household—to see that every thing moves on in proper order, under judicious rules and regulations—to be careful to prevent all squandering, all wasteful extravagance, and to cause the domestic arrangements to be conducted with due regard to economy, neatness and comfort.* This is what every husband expects, and has a right to expect of his wife. And this is her actual duty—as much so, as it is the duty of the husband to devote his time and attention to those "out-door" affairs upon which the welfare of the family so greatly depends. The wife can with no more propriety, neglect her domestic duties, than the husband can excuse himself for becoming indifferent in regard to his business and entrusting it to subordinates who have no responsibility resting upon them.

In overseeing her household, it is highly necessary that the wife should give her direct and personal attention to its affairs. It is not to be supposed that domestics can have that interest in the concerns of the family, which is requisite to insure perfect faithfulness in the discharge of every duty. Hence affairs entrusted entirely to their management, must suffer more or less, through carelessness, obstinacy or ignorance. It may be noticed as an invariable circumstance, that in those families where the wife personally superintends the domestic affairs, every thing goes on in a much more orderly, quiet, pleasant and economical manner, than where all is left to the care of domestics, whose interest extends no farther than their wages. I do not contend that it is necessary for the wife to pass all her time in the kitchen or wash-room, overseeing every minute employment of her domestics. But it is manifestly her duty to pass a sufficient portion of time there, to insure order and promptness in the domestic economy, and a faithful discharge of duty by all the members of the household.

In case of sickness in the family, it then becomes the important duty of the wife to make the invalid an object of her immediate attention—especially when the sufferer is a husband or a child. What can appear more odious and repulsive to a sensitive mind, than to behold a lady abroad in public, mingling in the gaieties of fashionable life, when it is known that sickness pervades her home. Our respect for such a woman is gone, and we set her down in our estimation, as a cold, heartless being, destitute of the common sympathies of human nature. I well know that a sick room is far from being a pleasant or desirable place. And yet it is a sphere in which woman can display her most lovely, most attractive qualities—where she can show the sympathy that dwells in her soul for those in distress, and her tact and skill in adopting numberless expedients to give comfort and repose to the suffering. When the husband is languishing upon a bed of sickness, wearied and worn with racking pains, what can possibly be more grateful than to receive the healing cordial, or the refreshing draught, from the hand of an affectionate wife? What can be more agreeable and comforting to him in hours of pain, or in the interval of feverish delirium, than to behold the chosen one of his heart, hovering around his bed-side, as an angel of peace, performing all those little offices, and exhibiting all those numerous and kind attentions, so necessary and so comforting to the sick?—What can be more satisfactory to him, than to have presented to his lips by the gentle hand of an attentive wife, those numerous delicacies which woman alone can invent, so essential to excite his appetite and please his fastidious taste?—What more consoling and cheering, than words of hope and trust whispered in his ear by that voice, which of all others, sounds most sweetly to his soul? Oh, woman! such is the time, and such the circumstances, and such the means, to exhibit the strength of your love for your husband! If you have reason to suppose he harbors one doubt, or suspicion, of your regard, this is the opportunity to remove it entirely from his mind, and to satisfy him, by your watchful attentions, by your forbearance with the irritability which disease forces upon him, by your unwearied attention to all his wants, of the strength, and purity, and durability of your love.

* I pray you, good wife, inquire of your husband if the author is not correct in stating these to be his expectations in marrying you! And while you are conversing with him upon the subject, you may also inquire whether any amendment is necessary in your proceedings, to fulfil these expectations.

There is a duty devolving upon the wife, in regard to her husband's relatives, which she should be careful to fulfil. Being united to her husband by an indissoluble tie, she should strive to love his relatives as her own. And although in first coming among them, she may discover some peculiarities not pleasing to her view, yet she should guard against allowing herself to imbibe prejudice against them. However unprepossessing they may appear, she must remember that they are her husband's relatives, and are undoubtedly dear to his heart, and for his sake, if not for theirs, she should strive to treat them kindly. What can be more disagreeable to a man of sensitive feelings, than to have an aged father or mother, a brother or sister, treated coldly, disrespectfully, or harshly, by his wife? Nothing could make him more unhappy; and the unavoidable tendency of such a course would be to alienate his affections from his companion! No man with a proper spirit, would allow a relative, especially a parent, to be ill-used or made unhappy under his own roof. The prudent wife, the careful wife, the wife who has a proper regard for her husband's feelings, and for her own comfort, will be exceedingly cautious upon this point. She will strive to conduct at all times, with the utmost kindness and tenderness towards those who have become her relatives by marriage—she will patiently bear with their imperfections—she will labor assiduously to obtain their good will and secure their esteem—and she will endeavor to satisfy them, that she cherishes toward them none but feelings of friendship and regard. Her reward for these exertions will be, speedily to win their confidence and love, greatly to gratify her husband, and cement still stronger his affection, and to cause a spirit of harmony and love to prevail and shed its cheerful sunshine throughout all her domestic associations.

Affection to our kindred is not inconsistent with the fondest attachment of the heart to a husband or a wife. Do not, therefore, encourage that littleness and pride, which would lead you to think yourself defrauded of something that was your own, when you see any tender regard paid to them. It is a mean jealousy of temper that makes us prompt to consider ourselves rivalled. It is a base pride that leads us to put an invidious construction on those signs of respect and esteem which are shown to others. Let married persons guard against such a cause of unhappiness to themselves, by considering that the distribution of affection does not necessarily diminish its quantity, but that it is even capable of increasing, as the objects on which it is exercised multiply. Conjugal affection can indeed be shared only by two persons, but this may grow and strengthen, without any loss sustained to it from the cultivation of filial or fraternal affection. While the bonds of matrimony must not be suffered to dissolve those of filial piety, it may be well, however, to suggest this hint to married persons:—Let them avoid, as far as is consistent with duty to relations, that kind of manner in their treatment of them, which is calculated to awaken jealousy in the married partner. Through an indiscreet neglect of this rule of prudence, the visit of a relation has sometimes been the epoch of misery to a couple, who had hitherto lived in harmony. Can not we be glad to see a parent, a sister, or a brother, without reducing a wife or a husband to a cipher in the house, during their stay in it? Is it prudent to be so profuse in the expressions of our regard for them, as to lead the partner of our life to have an interest in their departure?"

Another duty devolving upon the wife, is to assist her husband in accumulating that property which is essential to the support and comfort of the family. This will undoubtedly be considered a strange requisition, by all those ladies, who suppose it belongs exclusively to their husbands to labor and toil to acquire riches, for them to squander in every species of extravagance their vanity may suggest.—But to the thinking and the discreet, this duty will not be considered improper in its nature, or uncalled for in practice. It is not, of course, required or thought necessary, that the wife should go into the counting-room, or the workshop, or the field, as a laborer. All which this duty enjoins, is that the wife, in her proper sphere, should co-operate with the exertions of her husband, for the general good of the family. She should study to exercise prudence and economy in her expenditures for herself and family, and aid in preserving, not in squandering, that income which is the fruit of his exertions. An intelligent woman can discover numerous opportunities for the exercise of industry, frugality and economy, much to the aid of her husband and the benefit of her household. The wives of the Romans, in the earlier and better days of that nation, set a worthy example for future ages. Columella says, that "the Roman husbands, having completed the labors of the day, entered their houses free from all care, and there enjoyed perfect repose. The most beautiful woman depended for distinction on her economy, and endeavors to assist in crowning her husband's diligence with prosperity. All was in common between them; nothing was thought to belong more to one than another. The wife, by her assiduity and activity within doors, equalled and seconded the industry and labor of her husband."

It is especially necessary that the wife should exercise frugality and economy, and exert herself in every consistent manner to aid her husband, when misfortunes have stripped him of his possessions. The woman who, in such a case, gives way to despair and sinks into a dull lethargy without life or ambition, is but a dead weight. But she who is worthy of being connected with a kind, intelligent and persevering husband, so far from sinking into utter hopelessness when overtaken by adversity, will awake to new life, and develop new capabilities, and become the comforter and supporter of her husband, and strive to the utmost of her ability, to assist him in recovering from the most bitter blast of adversity. And there are few pecuniary misfortunes so great, that a man of character, intelligence, and perseverance, aided and cheered by the exertions and encouragement of a faithful wife, can not recover from them.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

NUMBER XIX.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

Daniel, 7th chapter.—In this chapter we have an account of Daniel's vision of the four great beasts. These four beasts represent the same as the four parts of the image which was seen by Nebuchadnezzar. The first beast, which resembled a lion, which had wings, represents the Babylonish empire; the lion denoting its strength, and the wings the rapidity of its conquests. By its acquiring the heart of a man was signified that in process of time its force and ferocity would be greatly lessened. See verse 4.

The second beast, which resembled a bear, signified the Medo-Persian empire; and by its raising itself on one side may be intimated the ascendancy of the Persians over the Medes. The three tusks denote instruments of destruction besides its own natural teeth; and these may mean Lydia, Babylonia and Egypt, which the Persians conquered, and the power of which they converted to their own use. See verse 5.

The third beast, resembling a leopard, must mean the Macedonian empire; as the extraordinary rapidity of its conquests under Alexander is denoted by its four wings, and its division into four parts after the death of Alexander, by its four heads. See verse 6.

The fourth beast must mean the Roman empire, which succeeded the Macedonian. A sufficient indication is given of its superior power by its fierce aspect, its great strength, and its iron teeth. It is said to be different from any preceding beast, and the form of the Roman government was remarkably so, having changed from kingly to consular and imperial, besides other intermediate changes. The ten horns denote the division of the empire into ten parts, corresponding to the ten toes in Nebuchadnezzar's image. See verse 7.

The great power which should rise up, spoken of in verses 8, 9, 10 &c., which was to arise among the ten kingdoms, three of which are to be removed to make way for it, is no doubt the Papal power, and the three to be removed were probably the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of Lombardy, and the city and territory of Rome.

This horn having eyes like a man, signifies its great sagacity and cunning; and its mouth speaking great things happily expresses its extraordinary pretensions to power, temporal and spiritual.

In the interpretation of this vision, verse 25, it is added that it "had power to wear out the saints," and no princes have been so great persecutors as the Popes; and they have not only changed the institutions of men, but those of God also, in their regulation concerning many things too numerous to mention.

"And I beheld till the thrones were cast down." See verse 9. "This," says Dr. Priestly, "is a wrong translation. It should be rendered—And I beheld until the thrones were erected."

The ancient of days, spoken of verse 9, was God, who is represented as judging this power, and he is condemned, not only to be slain, but that his body be cast into the fire, to denote utter destruction. See verse 11.

This was a more severe fate than that of the former beast. Their dominion was taken away, but they were allowed to exist, signifying, perhaps, that though the Babylonians, Persians and Macedonians lost their power over other nations, they were still governed by their laws in a manner similar to what they had been before, whereas, the last empire is not succeeded by another like itself.

Verse 14.—Here we see the dominion that had been taken from the last of these empires given by the Supreme Being himself to the son of man—no doubt the Messiah, to whom will be subjected all the subjects of the four preceding empires.

"A time and times and the dividing of times," spoken of verse 25, signifies a year, two years, and half a year, or three years and a half; or, reckoning a year for a day, it would be in prophetic style a period of 1260 years, one day in prophetic language signifying a year. If we reckon this time from the existence of the power represented by the little horn, which rose after the ten horns or kings, this will fetch it to the year of our Lord 455, when some think the empire or government of these ten kings ceased, and Valentine 3d, in conjunction with Theodosius 2d in the east, gave the Popes that jurisdiction which they exercised until the reformation, though the title of universal bishop was not given to them before the year 606. If to the former of these dates we add 1260, we have the year 1715, and at this time there was a visible diminution of the power of the Pope.

If we reckon from the year 606, when the title of universal bishop was given to the pope, and to this add 1260; this will bring it to the year 1866. Whether the papal power will then be completely overthrown or not, remains to be seen; but the probability is that as it rose by degrees it will decline in the same manner, though its final extinction may be sudden.

The greatest and the most amiable privilege which the rich enjoy over the poor, is that which they exercise the least—the privilege of making them happy.

PRAYER AND CONFERENCE MEETINGS.

Brother Grosh :

By the way of inquiry I would ask if prayer is not an important duty, and the highest privilege of the true Christian? Is it not calculated to elevate man and to make him more Godlike in all his actions—to restrain him from vice of every kind, and lead him to do good to all as he has opportunity—in one word to be what he ought to be, a worshipper of the one only living and true God, useful in his day and generation, and a blessing to the world? And is it not enjoined upon all Christians by the precepts and examples of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ? If the above questions are answered in the affirmative, then I would further inquire if Universalists are not too indifferent as regards this most reasonable duty? May we not believe that if Universalists, one and all, would come up to their duty on this point, it would result in such a reformation as would astonish us all, and convince our Partialist brethren that we have the Spirit of Christ within us? Would not this be a happy result, and one that is very desirable? and does not every Universalist's heart rejoice at the thought of such a result?

I should be pleased if you or some of your able and learned correspondents would write an article or articles on this important subject. I for one, feel as if something ought to be done, and immediately too; and I hope to see the subject of prayer, and prayer and conference meetings, in all its bearings on the cause of truth, brought before the Universalist denomination by the press, and also by the preaching of the heralds of salvation. And I hope to see as the result of all this, the cause of God's impartial grace spreading and prevailing through the length and breadth of our happy country, and causing its votaries to live as all Christians should live, leading quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty; for then shall our lives be acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. This is what I long to see. God grant that the time may soon come when as Universalists, we may arise, one and all, and let our light so shine before men, that they seeing our good works may be led to glorify our Father which is in heaven. Then truth shall prevail and error disappear. W.

PUNISHMENT.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN PETER HEADSTRONG AND WALTER DOUBTFUL.

D. Good morning, Mr. Headstrong. I have called on you this morning in order to get your views of punishment, which you agreed to give me whenever I would wait upon you.

H. Well, sit down, neighbor Doubtful, I am very happy that you have called for such a purpose. I'll endeavor to give you my views upon the subject in few words. In the first place, I believe that punishment is punishment, not revenge. The difference between the two is, that punishment has good for its ulterior object, and revenge has not. In the second place, I believe that it is inflicted where it can have such an object and not where it can not. This ulterior object I believe to be the reformation of the offender and the prevention of crime. Consequently "so much pain for so much guilt," or in other words murdering a man for murdering another, is a doctrine in which I have no faith. Such a spirit savors too much of the antagonism of cats and dogs to be dignified with the name of punishment. In the third place, I believe it is inflicted when a man is a sinner, and not when he is a righteous man—when he is mortal, corruptible and dishonorable, and not when he is immortal, incorruptible and glorious. And in the fourth place, I believe that it is certain. What I mean by certain, is that if a man puts his hand into the fire and burns it, pain will follow: not that it may follow, or will follow unless we are sorry; but that it will certainly follow. Consequently this escaping punishment is all nonsense. You might just as well talk of a man's running away from himself. These, neighbor Doubtful, are my views of punishment.

D. Well, friend Headstrong, I am very glad that you have stated your views so clearly. I now wish you to answer this question, in accordance with the principle you have advanced. Suppose a man commits murder and instantly murders himself, where does he receive his punishment?

H. Neighbor Doubtful, that problem is easily solved. The difficulty all lies in the notion that people have, that justice requires the retribution of so much pain for so much guilt. Now such is not the case. Justice requires punishment, not revenge. And punishment is not the "retribution of so much pain for so much guilt;" but the infliction of just so much pain as can have good for its ulterior object, and no more. The very moment that a person is in a situation where the pain inflicted on him can not have a tendency to prevent crime, that moment justice must cease to lash him, and that moment, too, justice requires nothing more of that individual for past offences, unless justice requires revenge. Now then to the question. Justice demands not the smallest possible amount of pain of that individual, solely because he has murdered another, for this would be revenge. But justice demands all the pain that can be inflicted upon him for a beneficial purpose—this the man deserves and not a particle more. Now if you can tell me of any other place besides "the earth" where punishment can be inflicted for a good purpose, then I will tell you of some other place besides "the earth" where this man may receive his punishment; but unless you can do this, my answer is, that he receives the punishment where he commits the crime, and where it can do good, and not where he does not commit the crime, and where it can not do good.

D. You acknowledge, then, that he deserves more than he receives.

H. I do not acknowledge any such thing. My position is, that he deserves just what can be inflicted upon him for any beneficial end. And as I do not believe that any good can result from punishing him in eternity; or, in plainer terms, from killing him after he is dead, consequently I hold that he deserves no such thing.

D. Do you, indeed, say that he receives all the punishment he deserves for murdering that man?

H. What do you mean by the word "all"? Do you think that punishment is dealt out by the quantity?

D. I mean, whether you think this man suffers the full length of time which the demerit of murder demands?

H. If I knew how long a time the demerit of murder does demand, I could tell you better. 'Tis true that earthly tribunals punish criminals by the day and year, but I was not aware that there was any such arrangement in the laws of Heaven. My views, as to time and quantity, are, that the OBJECT and END of punishment, and not the crime itself, ought to regulate its severity and duration. And I do hold that this man suffers as long and as much, "in the earth," as the object and end of his punishment demands. Are you satisfied with this answer?

D. No, not exactly. I want to know if justice does not require that this man should not suffer a certain amount solely for having murdered, without any reference to the future.

H. Your question now, if I understand it, is in amount this: Does not justice demand that the murderer should be murdered, (or put to death) solely because he has murdered? To this I beg leave to reply in the interrogative manner. Does justice require that one man should become a fool because another does? or, that one person should become cruel and unfeeling because another one has? Does it demand that you should strike your neighbor because he strikes you? And if it does, can you be a Christian and be just? The fact is, this returning "evil for evil" is no more just than it is in accordance with the precepts of our Savior. And in order that you may see the merits of your last question in all their length and splendor, I submit to you two considerations. If justice demands blow for blow, life for life, and blood for blood, wherein does it differ from retaliation? And if punishment is killing a man because he has killed another, what would revenge be? These questions you can answer at your leisure.

D. Well, there is one consideration still. The man commits suicide; where does he receive his punishment for this?

H. This question puts me in mind of one I have read of, that was proposed to a philosophical society, the amount of which was this: Why does not a vessel of water receive an addition to its weight by having a live fish put into it? The true answer to this question is, that you are asking us to account for what does not exist. Prove that the vessel does not increase in weight by such an addition, and then we will account for the strange phenomenon. This is my answer to your question. Prove that the suicide is punished, and then I will tell you "where" he receives it. It is my opinion that no man ever committed such an act in his right mind; and moreover, it is also my opinion that if he did—if any one ever committed such an act in his right mind, he himself had the worst of it. Some idea of the merits of this question may be inferred from these two considerations. Is an insane man accountable; and if so, is not a steam engine? This is one consideration. The other is, Would a sane man cut his own throat; and if he would, would he not be more an object of pity than of punishment? These two may be followed up by a self-examining one. If you, in a state of sanity should undertake to cut your own throat, would not the job itself, (to say nothing of the way to it) be a tough one?

Thus endeth the lesson.

A GOOD SAYING.

There never was a more true—seldom do we find a more practically important saying, than that of Marcus Aurelius. "It is not in your power, perhaps," says he, "to be a natural philosopher, a poet, an orator, or a mathematician; but it is in your power to be virtuous, which is better than all." We are all striving after pleasures of different kinds—after the pleasures derivable from wealth, from knowledge, from character, from rank, from learning; and if it be true, as we suspect it is, that few of us are seeking after the pleasures of virtue, we are neglecting the greater good in pursuit of the less, and therefore, few of us are entitled to be called by any thing more properly than the harsh epithet of fools. The pleasures of learning—those referred to by Aurelius—are indeed pure, refined, elevated pleasures; but we know that they are not equal to the pleasures of planning and doing little kindnesses, or good on a more extensive scale; nor to the pleasures of regulating our tempers, dispositions, and desires, nor of self-government generally; nor are they to be named in the same day with the pleasures of devotion, of communion with God, conscious harmony and peace with Heaven. We have never heard of any one, qualified to give evidence on the subject, who ever depreciated such virtue. No one was ever satiated with these—no one ever said of these, "vanity of vanities." While every testimony, therefore, confirms my own experience, let me seek after and fix my most ardent desires upon those most exstic, most enduring, most blissful of all enjoyments.

A SHORT SERMON.

BY REV. F. WHITAKER.

"Who will render to every man according to his deeds." Rom. ii. 6.

One excellent characteristic of the Divine government, is, that it is founded upon equity and justice; is well adapted to the constitutions and circumstances of its subjects, and requires nothing from them but what is consistent with reason, justice and impartiality. All the laws incorporated into its code are consistent with a salutary and equitable government, and aim not at the aggrandizement of their enactor, but at the improvement and amelioration of all under their influence. These laws were ordained in wisdom, dictated by love, and harmonise in all their points and bearings, with a being of spotless purity and perfection. The wise enactor of them is revealed to us as a just God and Saviour; as reaping only where He has sown, and gathering only where He has strown. He is present in, and rules over every part of His vast domain—from the largest grade of the animal kind, down to the smallest insect—from the highest towering mountain, down to the least particle of dust—and throughout all the sinuous courses of nature, are visibly to be seen His wisdom and goodness. He has wisely instituted laws in every branch of his vast dominions—in the world of matter—in the world of mind—and in every department of His immense creation can be viewed in characters too plain to be misunderstood, the wise regulations of Omniscience. These laws are not inoperative, but operate powerfully in each of their respective spheres. God rules in the kingdom of intellect as well as in that of matter. He rewards the virtuous, and punishes the vicious. There can be no virtue or vice, but what will receive from His hand its reward or punishment. We are aware that this is a deviation from popular opinion, for many people sincerely believe that the divine government, so far as this state of existence is concerned, is very imperfect. They virtually impeach the impartiality of God, and declare that in order to rectify the imperfections of His moral government that accrue in this state of being, it will be necessary to adjudge the wicked to a state of unending despair, and exalt the righteous to a state of endless joy. They think that there is no distinction made here between the virtuous and vicious; that all happens indiscriminately upon the good and bad, and that all deeds, whether good or bad, meet with no reward or punishment. They will say "Here is a man living in affluence and ease, surrounded with all the good things of this world, who is wholly regardless of all religious ordinances, and tramples under foot all the sacred behests of high heaven; and here is his neighbor, a man honest and upright in all his dealings, living in penury and want—with his family reduced down to the most distressing state by the ravages of disease, who has regarded all religious duties, and walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. Can God's dealing with these be equal and impartial?" The difficulty in this case is, that these people do not bear in mind that there are undeviating laws exercising an influence throughout the whole government of God, from which there can be no deviation without causing disturbance and engendering confusion. There are laws concerning the acquirement of property which must be regarded to succeed therein; also to enjoy good health, we must pay due observance to the physical laws. From a violation of laws civil, moral, physical or otherwise, all the distress, disease, derangement and disorganization which we behold in the world are caused. In the first of our cases, the man had observed the laws relating to the acquisition of property and the enjoyment of good health, and received their rich reward; and disregarded those pertaining to religion and morals, and endured their consequences. In the other case, the man had been made to suffer the consequences of not heeding the physical laws and those relating to the acquirement of property; and enjoyed the reward of paying an observance to religious duties. Because these people do not observe the penalty attached to the violation of the physical or other laws, they conclude that there is no punishment attached to their violation. They are looking at a distance for the penalty, when they might see it nearer by, if they would but bear in remembrance that the violation of one law is not punished with the penalty attached to that of another.

Our text is at variance with another popular sentiment. This is, that the penalty of sin, however trivial in its nature, is endless. As it is unquestionable that all are sinners, all must be made to endure endless misery, or else the words of our text are not true—"Who will render to every man according to his deeds." Our text conflicts with this opinion, because just as many as are saved, will not be punished for their sins; and those who are condemned, will not be rewarded for their good deeds. This makes the attributes of God conflict, one with the other—it represents the justice of God as requiring the endless suffering of the human race, and his mercy their everlasting happiness; and let the case turn as it will, let all be saved or condemned—let a part be saved and a part be condemned, either the justice or mercy of God, wholly or in part, will be deprived of its demands. Perhaps it may be said that Christ, by His sufferings, although the penalty of sin be endless, has received the penalty in our stead, and made a full atonement for the sins of the world. If this be true, we have no sins to answer for, because He, by His sufferings, has satisfied the demands of justice, and it has no demands against us. This sentiment, in the first place, impeaches the wisdom of God in attaching such a penalty to His law; in the second, it impeaches His justice in attempting to save a part from the punishment which they justly deserved; in the third, it impeaches His goodness in inflicting the penalty upon an innocent being, His own beloved Son.

Our text also is repugnant with the doctrine of total innate depravity; because if the sentiment be true that man in his natural state is averse to all good, and inclined to all evil, he is not an accountable being. He is not amenable or culpable for proceeding according to the dictates of that nature implanted within him by the hand of his Creator. Our text presupposes man to be an accountable being. It not only expresses the certainty of punishment, but it declares that He will reward to every man according to his deeds. This teaches that He will not render to us according to the deeds of another, or to another according to our deeds. The Scriptures expressly declare that "though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished;" "that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done." While they teach the certainty of punishment for every sin, they also teach that it is not an offspring of revenge, but of mercy; they teach us that God can be both merciful and just in punishing the sinner. David says, "Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his work." They teach us that the chastisements of God are corrective in their nature, calculated to bring their recipient from the depths of sin to the path of holiness and obedience. The design of God in punishing us, is to improve and correct us. St. Paul speaks of the chastisements of God as follows: "For our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." 2 Cor. iv. 17. Again, "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons: for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not. Furthermore, we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits, and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us for their own pleasure, but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby. Heb. xii. 6—11. Are not these testimonies widely at variance with the dogma of endless misery? Must we not from them believe that God punishes with a design to correct and ameliorate? Can endless misery ameliorate its subjects—yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who are made suffer it, and make them partakers of the holiness of God? There can be but one response. Endless misery will not benefit those upon whom it is inflicted—it will not afford joy, peace and satisfaction to those who are made to behold it; nor does it comport with the holy feelings implanted within the human heart, or reflect honor, goodness and wisdom upon the character of God. All punishment which is inflicted more than is sufficient to correct man, can be denominated by no other name than revenge. We should rejoice that while the scriptures teach us that God is just, they also assure us that He is merciful; that while He punishes for sin, He also punishes each one according to his deeds, and for his good.

HAPPINESS.

"Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Phil. ii. 5.

Happiness ever has been, and still is the object of all our pursuits; and hence the variety of means that have been resorted to in order to obtain this pearl of great price. Some have imagined it was to be found in wealth, and they have resolved to obtain it though it should cost a sacrifice of all the finer feelings of their natures; but have expectations been realised in this? Go ask the miser whose whole soul has been absorbed in the pursuit of it, if his gold and silver have returned to him the peace and happiness he fondly anticipated, and he will tell you No. He will tell you he has toiled all his life long for that which is fading and transitory in its nature and satisfieth not; that his gold and silver have become dim, and his abundance instead of yielding joy and satisfaction, is a source of continual disquietude. He will tell you that in his eagerness to amass wealth he has defrauded the hireling, oppressed the widow and the fatherless, and their cries have gone up to Heaven against him. He will tell you that the warm and tender sympathies of his nature have ceased to flow; that he has suffered his heavenly nature to become a barren waste; and he begins to feel himself, notwithstanding all his possessions, a neglected and isolated being.

Others have fancied that happiness was borne on the wings of fame, and they have said in their hearts, I will earn a name—though it should be purchased at the price of the rights of my fellow men—that will shine with undiminished lustre upon the historic page while time shall last. Again I ask have their anticipations been realised? Go ask the conqueror whose vigilance knew no bounds, so long as he could concert means to wrest from his fellow men their free born rights; ask him if he has found peace and joy in his pursuit, and he will tell you No. He will recount the many scenes of blood and carnage which his mad ambition has compelled him to witness. He will tell you he has brought the hoary locks with sorrow to the grave; he has caused the widow's heart to bleed, and the fatherless to cry for bread, and they stand as witnesses against him. He will tell you he has steeled his heart against every principle of virtue, and become almost insensible to all that constitutes man a religious or social being. He will tell you the voice of his brother's blood oft crieth to him from the ground, like the voice of many trumpets, saying, "God will in no wise clear the guilty."

spective view of scenes like these could fill the mind with peace and joy, though man should record his mighty deeds, and bestow all the encomiums that urbanity could command? The voice of reason answers No. The voice of wisdom is constantly exclaiming "though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished." And thus it might be said of the nameless ways and means wherein mankind in vain have sought for happiness. But, says one, is not happiness to be found on earth? Have I not enjoyed much through a long and prosperous life?

If you remember the time when you bowed before your Maker, and felt in your heart that "God was love," and that "his tender mercies were over all the works of his hands," and that the whole family of man were brethren, heirs of the same incorruptible inheritance; that they all stood in the relation of children by the tenderest ties of paternal love, to the King of kings and Lord of lords: if you have felt to bear them in your affections to the throne of grace to offer a tribute of praise and thanksgiving to Him who is all in all, then do you remember also that you have been happy. If you have ever been drawn by the silken cords of love from your gay and fashionable companions, and the illuminated hall, to the hovels of poverty and want, that you might smooth the couch of pain and sickness with your own soft hand, and calm and lull the desponding soul with your own soft voice, by pointing it to the Lamb of God "which taketh away the sin of the world;" then indeed has happiness been your lot. If you remember the time when the warm tear of sympathy coursed down your manly cheek like the gentle showers of heaven, to mingle with those of a fellow being whose heart was overwhelmed with sorrow and despair; then do you also remember that a thrill of joy ran through every avenue of your soul that the wealth of India could never have purchased.

"No radiant pearl which crested fortune wears,
No gem, that twinkling hangs from beauty's ears,
Nor the bright stars, which night's blue arch adorn,
Nor rising suns that gild the vernal morn,
Shine with such lustre as the tear that breaks
For others' woe, down Virtue's manly cheeks."

These are the bright and sunny spots upon the pages of human existence, where fond memory ever delighted to linger among her unfading bowers. Our Saviour, while sojourning here on earth, taught his followers that if they would be happy, they must partake of that bread "which cometh down from heaven." He exhorted them "to be perfect even as their Father in heaven is perfect." The language of our Saviour is no less applicable to us than to those to whom it was addressed; and would we assimilate to the character and perfections of our Heavenly Father, we must follow the examples of Him who was sent for our guide. Our Saviour, knowing the frailty of human nature, was well aware that precept unconnected with example could be productive of little or no good; therefore he took upon himself humanity and subjected himself to all the privations that are incident to human nature. In Him the poor and the needy ever found a ready help; and would we lay up unfading treasures we must copy his examples. Man, it is true, can not cause those that are naturally blind to see; but he can restore the sight of those that are morally so, and enable them to behold the bright star of Bethlehem, that will illuminate their pathway through the subsequent journey of life, and shed a bright halo around the night of the grave that will disarm death of its terrors. Man can not unstop the ears of the deaf, but he can cause those who have turned a deaf ear to all the teachings of Revelation, to listen to the sweet and heavenly strains that were sung by the angelic choir, when the heavenly message was announced to the shepherds on the plains of Judea. Man cannot cause the dumb to sing, but he can cause the sorrowing and the desponding to break forth and sing the loud anthems of "redeeming love." It is not lawful for man to open the prison doors and set the prisoner free; but he can unbar the prison door of the mind that has long been bound with superstition's unrelenting chains, and proclaim to him the unsearchable riches contained in the word of God; and cause him to feel its life giving influence, and then will he be free indeed. Man can not always heal the sick, or cause the lame to walk; but he can administer to their temporal wants, and not unfrequently calm the troubled soul by whispering "God is love," and that he has prepared a haven of rest where pain, sorrow and death can have no admission. Man can not raise the dead in the manner in which our Saviour did; but he can cause those who are dead in trespasses and sins to arise from their graves of iniquity and turn unto the "Lord who will have mercy, and to our God who will abundantly pardon."

Seeing therefore that much remaineth to be done, it is not meet, my Christian friends, because we can not perform the miracles that our Saviour did, to fold our hands and say we have nothing to do. Man has a great work to do would he enjoy present salvation; and it is hoped and fondly anticipated that every true believer in a world's salvation will unite their efforts in so glorious a cause. Then how soon would the scene be changed. This earth that is now felt to be a world of sorrow, a wilderness of woe and a vale of tears, would be transformed into a garden of paradise; and then indeed would happiness be our lot.

CHEERFULNESS.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

What is like unto it? It was truly said by the wise man, that "cheerfulness doeth good like a medicine." It is indeed so. Who has not felt its all pervading power, when worn out with the cares and vexations of which this life is made up, disheartened, bowed down in spirits, and almost ready to exclaim, "vanity of vanities, all is vanity." We meet perhaps a smiling, cheerful friend—the clouds disperse—the mists are cleared away as by some magic hand—the heart leaps to lose its ponderous burthen, and swells with emotions too big for aught but tears of joy to express. Where all was drear desolation, chilled by the cold touch of despair, now is life, joy, and smiling happiness! This world is transformed from a wilderness wild to a garden of flowers. O, the blessing of a cheerful disposition! It is beyond comparison. Without it, nothing appears lovely or desirable on earth—with it, we behold something to admire in the minutest works of God. Happy, thrice happy he, on whom this blessing is bestowed. It is a continual feast to its possessor, and a constant joy to all about him. We are creatures of sympathy. It is impossible for us to mingle in society and not imbibe the spirit and feelings which pervade it, in some degree at least; and we not only imbibe from others, but we impart either good or its opposite to others in every act and word of life. It is therefore the duty of every rational being to cultivate a social, cheerful frame of mind, which the crosses and disappointments flesh is heir to, can not destroy with every sweeping blast. It is a duty we owe to ourselves, as well as to those around us. It is by accustoming ourselves to look on the fair side of things that we are enabled to preserve a cheerful spirit while all without is in confusion and disorder. Within the heart lies the true seat of cheerfulness as well as happiness. If the mind is cultivated in the morn of life—if the affections are kept pure and inviolable—if they are raised and ennobled by being directed to their Great Source for happiness—such a heart can not—nay, it will not fail of finding within itself a little paradise! The rude and boisterous passions may howl around its dwelling—the fierce and angry peltings of the storm only serve to make the inward calm more serene, happy, and full of blessedness. No earthly power can destroy the equilibrium of such a heart. It has learned to look aloft when lowering clouds appear. It knows, yea, it feels that a Father's unerring hand is at the helm—and that neither men nor angels can make it fear. It sees by faith the storm outrode—cloudless skies are again above and around—smiling Nature is again arrayed in all her gorgeous beauty—and from every towering hill and verdant vale resounds the voice of music's mild harmonious strains. To such a one, the bright beams of noon-day sun, and the bleak tempestuous winds are alike fraught with instruction and delight. Thanks to God for this cheerful, happy, unshaken confidence in an Almighty, unchanging Benefactor! 'Tis this alone which renders life a blessing—and the joys of life an antepast of that immortal blessedness in the shining courts of the redeemed in glory above.

INDIVIDUAL INFLUENCE.....NO. IV.

"You can't think how unpleasantly I am situated.—My friends are all Partialists, and so bigoted against Universalism that I dare not open my lips on the subject. And then there are no meetings of our order in the neighborhood—nothing but fiery and denunciatory preaching and scolding—and very few Universalists, so that I have scarcely any religious enjoyment whatever! Oh, I do wish that I was again among Universalists, and where I could hear preaching, without hearing God abused by his creatures." Why, you should get some Universalist papers and books, and enlighten your friends in regard to the doctrine, and so—"Oh, don't mention it! I would not have the heart to let them see a Universalist book or paper, let alone to read to them." Why not? "Because I have no influence, and they are so dangerous—why, they don't even believe that I really believe the doctrine!" Quite likely, I—should almost think so, too, to judge your faith by your cowardice! "Well, but what can I do—I, so young [or, so old], and all alone?" What can you do? I really do not know until you try; but I can tell you what a noble hearted, but very poor and humble woman once did, who was placed in your situation—or, rather, what God did, by her agency; for "God was with her," as he is with all who have courage to do their duty.

This worthy and pious woman was dependant on her feeble labor for means to support herself and two children. The Winter approaching, she feared that her increased expences would require more labor than her health would allow, so she resolved to accept the offer of her parents, who lived in the country, and were willing she should live with them. She accordingly removed there. Her parents and her brother's family, were rigid, Calvinistic Baptists—much prejudiced against, because ignorant of, Universalists and Universalism. But the mildness, candor and good sense of Mrs. P. (for so we will designate her, for brevity's sake), could not but win their esteem, backed as it was by parental and fraternal affection; so they allowed her peaceably to read the Universalist books and papers which she carried with her, knowing, as she did, that there were but few Universalists, and no Universalist preaching in that neighborhood. At last, they quietly heard her read such pieces and extracts as she deemed would most interest them; and then read the books and papers for themselves. And the consequence of her courage and fidelity is, that her relatives are now rejoicing in the knowledge that God's goodness will save all his children from sin and woe—others have, with them, come to the light of universal salvation—others, still, are inquiring, "What is truth?"—and the Universalists around, have been aroused from their lethargy—a subscription has been started, regular preaching is maintained one-fourth of the time, and a stated Conference meeting is held every two weeks, where the voice of prayer, and praise, and exhortation is heard from the lay brethren. So much for that confidence in God which imparts confidence in self, sufficient to do the duties incumbent upon us. "Go, and do likewise."

GAMING.

We find no fault with the desire for amusement. It is natural for the mind to seek it in some form or other, in order to relieve itself from the insipidity which frequently attends constant employment in one calling.—But there are no rules which arbitrarily determine what, among the innocent employments, shall be considered amusement, and what shall not. To a well cultivated mind, any thing not improper—the merest temporary change from one employment to another—may be an amusement if it afford relaxation, or entertaining employment to the faculties. Hence, that will always be the most rational and commendable which combines the qualities of pleasure and usefulness. But whether we aim always at the most useful amusement, or be content some times with that which has the power only of relieving and entertaining the mind; whether we seek to amuse ourselves with books or work, with mental or physical exercise; whether we pass our leisure hours in public affairs or in the social circle, in silent reflection or in lively conversation, nothing should be suffered to enter our list of amusements, that carries with it a natural tendency to vitiate the mind. He who does so, is a traitor to himself. And yet see how extensively this is practiced.

Among all the vices which have crept into society, and which are tolerated by a professedly enlightened community, there are few which exert a worse influence than the practice of gambling. I speak now of gambling for amusement, not as a profession, for the latter every honest man despises. I say, as an amusement it is tolerated by the public. And it is this very toleration which makes it worse than it would otherwise be. True, some exertions are used to put down open public gambling; but at the same time, how many who do this, afford every facility, and give every encouragement for its uncensored practice in the private circle. I do not admire the principle of making hypocrites of men, merely because we happen to imagine that they can not be made honestly ashamed of their evil deeds. Nor do I think those much better subjects of admiration, who skulk away from observation to gain an opportunity of aping mates, and worse, of playing fools over a pack of cards, a billiard table, or any other instrument for killing time. I would rather see them cultivate their minds so as to find amusement in some thing at least rational and cheering. And it is a settled point, in my estimation, that if community would decidedly express their disapprobation of gambling in every form, and make that disapprobation felt, they would find this vice hastily retreating before the power of public opinion? If those who indulge in this practice, realized that they could not appear in respectable society; if they knew that they could not enjoy the confidence of any who knew them, most of them would learn most wonderfully quick, that there was no amusement, after all, in a pack of cards, or at least none that could compensate them for the consequences. But they can not be made sensible of this as long as gambling and the gambler receive such a sanction as they do in the very commencement of their career. Do you ask what that sanction is?

Most men are sensible of the innumerable temptations which wait on the professional gambler. They know of many who were once respectable and upright persons, who have been utterly ruined by gambling and other vices inseparably connected therewith. And in view of this fact, they will not hesitate to condemn the inveterate gambler. But this is not enough.—The gambler must have had a beginning to his career. He could not acquire a sudden liking to the practice. He must have had a gradual initiation into its mysteries, and this was probably effected by way of amusement. He moved step by step towards the vortex of moral degradation, while yet there was nothing appeared to alarm him—no sinister motive whispering in his heart, that he would ever have other than the merest amusement in view.

This has been the starting point with a majority of professional gamblers. And yet, with the knowledge that many have thus been led on step by step from supposed innocence to conscious weakness, and from conscious weakness to utter inability to resist temptation, the youth of our land have been virtually invited to sit down and spend their evenings at the card table—invited to do so from the simple fact that it was looked upon as a fashionable and innocent amusement. They have done it frequently, with the sanctioning smiles of the experienced. Their fathers and mothers have done it, too, though perhaps unwittingly overlooking the descent which they made from the true dignity of the parental character. Yes, very pious professors of the Christian religion, who hold in utter abhorrence the practice of gambling for money, will sit for hours and gamble away their precious time, which no money can redeem, and call it delightful amusement. But, dear reader, you have only to fancy a young man coolly amusing himself, as he calls it, with an occasional game of cards, in company with associates who are equally desirous of acquiring this undignified accomplishment, and of ranking themselves with what may be justly termed Chrysalis Black-legs, in order to estimate the nature and value of all such amusements.

There are those who will, notwithstanding the above considerations, attempt to justify themselves for card-playing on the ground, that they have often amused themselves in that way without experiencing any bad effects. Let us see. Man possesses powers of mind which it is his duty to cultivate. He who depraves these powers, by circumscribing them within unnatural boundaries, or giving them vicious habits or unnatural desires, is doubly guilty. Now I venture the opinion, that he who has cultivated a fondness for card-playing, might, with less trouble, have attained to a respectable degree of scientific knowledge. With half the example which was necessary to deaden his shame of gaming; with half the instruction and half the perseverance which was necessary to teach him dexterity in shuffling, and tact in managing the game, he might have cultivated a knowledge of, and a fondness for, mathematical principles, which would have enabled him to solve the most difficult problem, with a pleasure which can not be brought down to a comparison, even, with any virtue that was ever attached to gaming by its most faithful devotee. The same faculties are evidently employed in both pursuits, but one is leading the mind along in the path of truth and usefulness, while the other is giving it a disrelish for noble employments, and cherishing habits and feelings, which the moment he goes out into the world he is obliged to conceal and smother.—I put the question, now, if this debasement of the mental and moral powers, from their natural and legitimate offices, can be indulged in by any human being without his experiencing bad, yea, deplorable effects? Let the answer come from the heart.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.

As a denomination, we should be effectually aroused to the necessity of giving to our children a religious education. On this subject, I fear that there is error among us. We have seen the efforts made and making to indoctrinate multitudes of children into the narrowness and bigotry of a creed, infusing such a spirit in them, as makes them in adult years, exclusive sectarians.

Having beheld such efforts, we reason correctly, when we say that children should not be thus instructed, but that their minds should be free. But to avoid this evil, in order that their minds may be unsoured by sectarianism, we have fallen into the opposite extreme, and give them no religious instruction. This is a very lamentable mistake. There is all the difference between making children bigoted and giving them no religious instruction, that there is between taking bad food, and no food whatever. Both are wrong. Let not their minds be narrowed; let not their growing affections be walled up by illiberal notions; nor let their feelings be made to assume whatever shape bigotry may dictate. But at the same time, they should not grow up without any knowledge of their Creator, Saviour, and the revelation of Heaven. For if they are left entirely ignorant of these subjects, they are liable to fall victims to any error they may meet, or to have their passions excited with fanaticism. These courses are extremes, and are to be avoided. If it is incorrect to give any religious instruction to children, it is, on the same principle, wrong to let them attend where religious principles are preached.

If children are taught Christianity as it is, it will never make them bigoted, but save them from bigotry—it will never lead them astray, but guide them aright—it will never leave them in error, but will give them that truth which will assist in forming their characters for virtue and holiness. What, for instance, can be more appropriate, than to teach children the character of God as displayed in nature and revelation, and to impress upon their minds the fact that virtue is always pleasurable and vice always miserable? What can be productive of greater benefit to them, than to frequently tell them of the character of Christ, how obedient he was to his parents when a youth, how kind he was, how he died for his enemies, how he rose from the dead, and how children should obey him? Nor can there be the least objection against teaching them the law of loving enemies, and that the reason why they should do so, is, because their heavenly Father loves his enemies. And I am sure no sane person can offer the least opposition against teaching them the doctrine set forth in the account of the good Samaritan. Yet, in teaching them these principles, they imbibe a knowledge of some of the noblest truths of Christianity. These facts, rigidly instilled into their minds, will sow such seeds, as will lead them in adult age, to view all people as one family, to be charitable to all sects, and to be pure in life. I am sure that such facts will not swerve their minds one hair from the path, which will cause them to grow up practical Christians.

CHOICE SENTIMENT.

Listening not long since to a popular preacher of the popular dogmas, while he was endeavoring to prove that souls were in danger of being lost, by which he meant to be understood that they were in danger of being endlessly damned, I was almost led to the conclusion that the doctrine was deemed so very important as to justify almost any charge which the speaker saw fit to make, against the dealings of God, however much it might implicate his goodness. Indeed the preacher seemed to think it a very bad trait in a certain class of Christians, that they should dwell so much upon the goodness of God, or in other words, that they should contend for the propriety of loving God "because he first loved us." Among the least objectional phrases which were used, I present one, as a moderate specimen of the means sometimes used to reach sinner's hearts. The speaker was urging the tendency of riches in destroying the soul, when he used the following language—"God rolls in wealth, and wealth, rolls souls down to hell"—and I could not help thinking that he had become quite refined in his estimate of God's blessings. Had I said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free," this doctrine of cause and effect would have afforded him a fine target, for his sneering and satire. But he could place God in close affinity with malice itself, by representing him as deliberately bestowing upon man that which he knew would be an eternal curse to him, and feel that he had secured the approbation of all the dear saints. Verily, how much of such preaching would it require to evangelize the world? A. R. B.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Br. George Rogers, of Cincinnati, proposes starting soon on his fourth overland journey through Lexington, Ky., and Nashville, Tenn., to Alabama, etc., visiting the places where he preached on his last journey. He has probably started by this time, and will be gone three or four months.

The late Jeremiah Smith, of Ridgefield, Conn., has donated the annual income of his farm, valued at ten thousand dollars freed from incumbrance, one-half to the Universalist society in North Salem, N. Y.; and the other half to the common schools in the Ridgebury society in Conn. I have been waiting for years to hear that some of our wealthy and heirless friends in this State, had thus remembered our highly useful, but still embarrassed Clinton Liberal Institute, in their wills or otherwise. Who will be first in this good work?

Br. Whittemore says that the last chapter of the Universalist's Guide, (a prospectus and notice of which we published a few weeks ago,) "will contain entire, Leslie's invincible argument, called 'short method with the Deists.'"

A new society of Universalists was organized on the 7th ult., in New Lebanon, this State. Br. W. Wilcox says they are opposed by the united forces of infidelity and Partialism.

Br. L. R. Paige has removed from Cambridgeport to Lancaster, Mass.—Br. I. Brown to Salem, Mass.—Br. A. A. Miner, to Methuen, Mass.—Br. H. Bacon has resigned the pastoral charge at Haverhill, Mass., with intent to remove elsewhere—and Br. Asher Moore, of Roxbury, Mass., has accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Lombard-street society in Philadelphia, (late Br. A. C. Thomas'), in April next. Br. Moore is a native of that city.

A union house was dedicated in Kensington, N. H., by Unitarians, Calvinistic Congregationalists and Universalists, some time last month.

A Methodist preacher, at a camp meeting in Georgia, was foolhardy enough to state publicly, that Rev. Hosea Ballou, of Boston, is a drunkard. Br. Whittemore called on the Editor of Zion's Herald (Methodist) for his testimony on the subject, who generously states that Mr. Ballou is a man of strictly temperate habits, and that he never heard any thing to the contrary. The Rev. slanderer may say, "that is the unkindest cut of all."

At the Essex Quarterly Conference, held in Andover, Mass., Br. S. P. Landers was installed as pastor of the society in that place, on the 15th ult. Sermon by Br. A. C. Thomas, of Lowell.

The Nazarene, (the new Universalist paper in Philadelphia, noticed two weeks since,) is printed on an imperial sheet, instead of a super-royal, as we then stated on its own authority. It appears to have a good run, as its first numbers are already exhausted, and called for to supply new subscribers.

An oral discussion of the question, "Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of endless punishment?" was held in Watford, Me., by Rev. M. Hotchkiss, (Methodist,) and Rev. T. J. Tenney, (Universalist,) on the 9th ult. It continued during the day, before a crowded and deeply interested audience, and was conducted with great mildness, propriety and candor. The same Methodist clergyman has agreed to discuss the question, "Does the Bible teach the existence of a personal devil?" with Br. L. P. Rand, in four letters from each party, to be published in the Universalist Palladium, in Portland, Maine.

Br. J. G. Adams, of Malden, Mass., (known to our readers of 1838 as a correspondent of this paper—would he were one now!) proposes publishing two needed works. One entitled "Practical Hints to those who believe in the Gospel of universal grace and salvation," designed to set forth the practical efficacy and duties of Universalism. Br. Adams is excellently qualified, not only by literary ability, but by devotional fervor and piety, to execute such a work. We shall give the prospectus next week, and therefore content ourself with cordially recommending it to extensive patronage and circulation. We need such a work so greatly, that I have long contemplated trying to meet the want by publishing a volume of practical sermons. But Br. Adams' plan is better, and I believe will be better executed than mine.

The other book will be entitled "The Christian's Triumph: Including happy Death scenes of believers in the Gospel." This work will powerfully commend religion in its best form to all who would live happy and die rejoicing, by showing the faith which guided many through a peaceful life and a joyous death. It will also be a standing monument in refutation of the oft-quoted objection, that "Universalism will do to live by, but will not do to die by," by showing from numerous facts that it does most triumphantly sustain and comfort the departing soul in its passage to another world. Success to our brother's labors. A. B. G.

TO INQUIRING FRIENDS.

"How are you getting along? What are your prospects?"—Letters.

In reply to these inquiries, often repeated, I answer—We labor under a continual pressure for the want of money to meet our engagements. Money comes in, it is true; but not as fast as our notes and bills fall due. Thus we get along—rubbing very hard all the way!

Our prospects are not decided. We were obliged to strike off and discontinue between 1200 and 1500 names from our list—new subscribers come in slowly—the number who pay (or promise to pay) in advance is increased—we have deferred engagements, to a very large amount, to meet during all of February to meet which our only hope is, increased receipts from those owing us. Such are our prospects—darkness, shadows, dawning, and darkness again, with a little hope to gild the edges!

The new firm is dependent for prosperity, as yet, on the success of the old firm in overcoming its difficulties—and both depend on subscribers to the paper paying what is due on former volumes, and in advance for the present. Could our debtors realize our situation, I am sure they would pay up speedily—in time to help us out of trouble—and I am in hopes that this frank statement of our difficulties ahead, will bring us that relief from them we want much, even now. For myself, I must say that my confidence in those who, collectively, owe us so much, induces me to believe that they will pay as soon as they can, and so put an end before long to our many trembling apprehensions. May God dispose their hearts to do us this justice. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR.

The first number of a new volume, (volume 4, new series,) has come to hand. We feared, from a little delay in its appearance that it had stopped, and are therefore much pleased at again seeing it. It contains articles on "The Mosaic account of Creation," Geologically considered and proved correct, by Br. G. W. Montgomery—an able article—"Historical sketch of the form and structure of the Hebrew language," popularly treated, by Br. S. C. Cleveland—"The New Testament doctrine of salvation," and "The birth of Jesus Christ and its consequences, a Christmas Sermon," both by the Editor, Br. H. Ballou, 2d, and both instructive and interesting articles—"Scripture Geography," also by the Editor—and a very superior poetical article, "The Maiden, King Death and his Conqueror," by Mrs.

Sawyer, of New-York. The number is a very good one—giving promise of another valuable volume. Are there none of our friends who want it?—many we know who need it—let them send on their names immediately. A. B. G.

ERRATUM.

In No. 3, current volume, in an article signed "Luke," under the caption, "Character of God," a line was omitted, and the sense of the sentence thereby obscured. The sentence should read thus, the words in brackets having been omitted—"Go where we will—view the face of nature in all her varied appearance; [and we shall discover countless manifestations] of the love of God, displayed in his wonderful works to the children of men." A. B. G.

NEW AGENTS.

MY PARTIALIST FRIEND.

'Twas Goodness proposed, it was Wisdom that planned—
The work was performed by an Almighty hand.
Three questions, then, drawn from the premises penned,
Are waiting thy answer—"my Partialist Friend."

If Goodness proposed the grand system we see,
And determined what was, and was not to be;
Then were not provisions, both ample and kind,
For each creature made, by an Eternal mind?

If Wisdom sought means, and perfected that plan,
Which Goodness proposed when creation began,
Is it not, then, quite safe, philosophical friend,
To conclude that the means will suffice for the end?

And lastly, if Power, by Wisdom directed,
Carries out and effects, what Goodness projected;
Do you need, Sir, the ken of a prophet to tell,
When the end is accomplished, that all will be well?

Answer, Mss., 1840.

STANZAS.

I've felt the storms of passion flow,
Around my hapless head,
I've seen fond friends in numbers go
To mansions of the dead.
I've met in stranger's land
With friendship's sweet caress,
And found a helping hand,
To aid me in distress.

I've heard the mighty thunders roll
Along the frowning sky,
That seemed to shake from pole to pole,
In awful majesty;
I've seen the billows foam,
As my frail bark they bore
Far from my native home,
Upon some rocky shore.

I've calmly seen the hand of death
Upraised to strike the blow,
While he who gave me breath
Did ceaseless mercies show—
Yes, all these scenes I've viewed,
And fondly looked above
This world's ingratitude,
Unto the God of love.

But slander foul whose poisonous breath,
Has o'er my prospects thrown,
Some fiends more foul than even death,
Have seeds of discord sown.
Come on! I fear them not,
Nor shall my spirits bend;
For whatsoever my lot,
My God will be my Friend. J. A. McN.

TRUTH BEAUTIFULLY EXPRESSED.—The following passage, beautiful in its truth, and in the expression of that truth, is from the Editor of the Baltimore American. It will be felt and appreciated by every parent, and most heartily do we commend it to the attention of children:

"If children could only be made aware of the heart-felt delight with which parents behold the development of talent and noble sentiment in their off-spring, with what avidity would they seek the means of expanding the sphere of their intelligence, and cherishing the moral sentiments that impart dignity to the human character.—From infancy to manhood the welfare and happiness of the child is the sole object of the parent's solicitude. Under all circumstances, through good or evil fortune, the present and future condition of those whom they may have rocked in the cradle, or dandled on the knee, is the polar star to which their affections point with undeviating constancy. Should their path through life be prosperous, the possession of wealth and distinction is only precious in their eyes, as affording the means of conferring on those who are, in future years, to be their representatives, the honors that attend riches and exalted character; and should adversity be their lot, and difficulties beset them, they are forgotten in the hope that circumstances may ensure a better fate to their children.

The child may be affectionate and tender, but the filial relation is not susceptible of the intensity of affection which belongs to the parental tie. It is this depth of love that enables the old to pass from the stage of life without regret. They feel that in their children they will continue to live, and that, however this world and its concerns may be lost to them, succeeding generations will recognise in their offspring portions of themselves. With what unspeakable delight does a father behold the first manifestations of exalted intelligence in a son, and how does he dwell upon actions that bespeak nobleness of purpose and soundness of integrity. If these feelings of gratification are inexpressibly delightful, so on the other hand the emotions with which he views indications of an opposite character, are unutterably painful.

To see the object of his parental solicitude, over whom he has watched day after day, and year after year, falling off from the path of virtue, and deaf to appeals of honorable motives, is to have a source of bitterness of regret, to which no temporal blessing can furnish an antidote. Honors may await, and the confidence and love of his fellow-beings may, for a moment, cheer his path through life, but when he reflects that this honor and this love are to be changed into contempt and dislike in the person of his own child, he feels as if it were better to be deprived of all, than to witness so heart-rending a contrast.

If there be reserved for human life a joy more exalted than others, it is that of beholding its last moments cheered by the fondness and affections of a worthy and virtuous progeny, and if there be a pang more agonizing than any other, it is that of a dying parent, whose last thought rests upon the crimes of a depraved but fondly loved child."

FEMALE PIETY.

The gem of all others which adorns the coronet of Female loveliness, is unaffected piety. The grace of her mein—the fascination of her countenance—her nobleness of heart—her primeval intelligence, and enviable intellect, are the happiness of man. Piety added, throws a garb of holiness over every action; brightens the shining intellect; adds gentleness to the heart, and in the voice of earthly love, it mingles the bliss of Heaven. Without it, woman brings darkness and death upon mankind; with it she is the enlightening orb of earth—the blessed gift of Heaven; to whom the virtuous, the good, and the great pay homage.—Then ye, who were designed as the guiding star of man to Heaven, to other graces add piety of heart. It will strew flowers in your pathway through the journey of life; and even in the hour of mortal dissolution, it will be to your soul the light of life and glory.—American Citizen.

TOLERATION.

What is it to me, if my neighbor permits his cucumber vines to run on the ground, instead of furnishing them with bushes as I do? or rubs his razor on his boot, or on the cover of an old book, instead of the metallic strap? or prunes his fruit trees with a pruning hook or a saw?—What right have I to find fault with the dress or education of his family, with the color of his hat, or the cut of his coat? and if he build a house, does it concern me whether it front to the north or south, or whether it be large or small, convenient or inconvenient? If it does not, then let my neighbor consult his own taste in these matters. Let us yield him this right. And when dipping our fingers into our neighbor's porridge dishes, we chance to get them rapped with a spoon, or get them scalded, let it teach us to mind nobody's business but our own.

MARRIAGES.

On January 5th, by Rev. D. Biddlecom, Mr. ELI POND, of Hamilton, to Miss CHARLOTTE CULVER, of Westmoreland.

In Portlandville, (Milford,) January 28th, by Rev. John Ellis, Mr. OLIVER G. BARTLETT, of this city, to Miss SARAH RICHARDS, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Litchfield, Herkimer county, on the 27th ult., RICHARD SMITH, Esq., aged 66 years. He emigrated to that town about 40 years ago, from Morristown, N. J., and early acquired and retained great influence by his intelligence, energy and upright conduct. He was once chosen to represent that county in the legislature of the State, and long acted as a Justice of the Peace in the town. He was struck with apoplexy on Sunday morning, and lingered till the evening of next day, when a large family of children, whom he had reared with kindness and care, were deprived of their only remaining parent—community of an active member, and the neighborhood of a kind and obliging neighbor.

The funeral was attended on the 29th, in the new Methodist chapel, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a large concourse of neighbors and relatives by the writer. A. B. G.

In Collinsville, January 10th, SARAH ANN, daughter of Isaac and Harriet Brinckerhoff, aged 9 years. This is the fourth, out of eight children which Br. and Sister Brinckerhoff have been called to consign to an early grave; yet they mourn not as those who have no hope, but trusting in God as the Saviour of all men, they acknowledge that his judgments are right, and that in faithfulness he doth afflict us. Sermon on the 11th by Br. D. Biddlecom.

In Wadsworth, Medina county, Ohio, on the 6th ult., Capt. CYRUS CURTIS, aged 72 years. A funeral sermon was delivered by Br. A. Peck, and from him we have hoped to receive an appropriate obituary notice. Br. Curtis lived and died a firm believer in universal salvation, and his conduct through life was such as to honor his profession. A large circle of relations and acquaintances mourn his departure. His aged widow mourns, but she knows where to look for comfort and consolation.

In Tunbridge, Vt., after a lingering illness of a consumptive kind, HANNAH KING, aged 42, daughter of Joshua and Lous King, of Tunbridge.

In Sheridan, December 24th, Mr. LEVI INGALSBE, aged 36 years. In the death of this brother, the opposers of universal salvation in this vicinity, were made to know that a believer in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind can die in peace. After giving directions concerning his little children, he requested that Br. Pickering of Buffalo, who was in the vicinity should preach at his funeral, and selected the following words of Job as appropriate to the occasion:—xiv: 14—"If a man die, shall he live again?"—Br. Ingalsbe did not possess a superabundant store of this world's goods, but he was rich in faith, and hope, and virtues that endeared him to all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance and society. May that doctrine which was so consoling to him in his last hours, pour its refreshing influence over the heart of the bereaved widow, and render her truly resigned to that wise Providence which has called from earth to heaven her amiable companion, where, in the immortal resurrection, kindred souls shall reunite and be "as the angels of God, being the children of the resurrection."

He left a particular request that his friends who reside in Hartford, Washington county, where Br. Aspinwall is located, be informed that he died resigned to the will of God, and in full assurance that "God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." The funeral services were attended on the 26th, by Br. Pickering, according to his wishes, at the Presbyterian West meeting house, where the consolation of a Christian hope were presented to the mourners and a concourse of sympathizing neighbors assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to the deceased. CORNELIUS HENRY FRANCISCO:

Not less than a thousand and one times, we believe, to speak within bounds, have our brethren of the various Limitarian sects, particularly the Presbyterians and Methodists, put in circulation, and published in every possible way, from the press and the pulpit, in the conference and the anxious room, in the private circle and by the firesides of willing dupes, the following false and slanderous tale about myself and the individual whose name heads this article. The substance of the story is this—That Francisco (though in retailing the slander, our enemies seldom give the name) was a confirmed Universalist, of this city, and getting tired of life, resolved on committing suicide, and going to heaven at once—that in order to let his minister see how triumphantly he could carry out his faith in death by his own hand, he called me in to witness his suicidal exit—that on seeing him determined on suicide, I remonstrated, and told him at last that there might be an eternal hell, after all, and he might go to it if he persisted—that he then asked me why I had not preached so before and in the pulpit, and that I replied, it would not do, for it would make people crazy—that he desisted, was struck under conviction, joined the Presbyterian church and adorned his Christian profession by a well ordered life and godly conversation.

The object of retailing this tale of falsehood and slander is, undoubtedly, to make people believe that Universalism naturally leads to suicide—that its advocates or preachers do not believe it themselves, or, at least, that I am a hypocrite, preaching a sentiment which I do not believe, and that when a real trying case occurs, I abandon the doctrine and preach an endless hell! The story has been again and again contradicted in our columns, and oftener reiterated by our enemies. We had long since thought that we would publish no more on this loathsome and disagreeable subject. But again the story is revived, and we are requested to state the facts of the case.

The following documents were all written and prepared several years ago, and the substance of several of them has already been given to the public, but never all of them in full. We should long ago have published the whole in our columns, had it not been for some dark and ominous threats of Francisco that our lives would be in danger if we dared publish all the facts of his case which were in our possession. Had myself and Br. Grosh, my then co-editor, been alone interested in the risk, we should probably have published the whole; but each of us had a family dependent on us, and knowing the murderous disposition and deep depravity of this modern Blue Beard or Nero, (for both names suit him,) we did not deem it prudent to risk, by the act, not only our own lives, but the peace and happiness of both our families.

In 1835, the Rev. N. Levings, of the Methodist connection, related this false tale at a protracted meeting in Albany; at the close of his exercises, Rev. I. D. Williamson, then of that city, arose and informed Mr. L. that the story was absolutely false, and either then or subsequently, by letter, informed him he could convince him of it if he would call at his house. He also called Mr. L. to retract the slander unless he could adduce some proof of its truth. Mr. L. in order to sustain his charge, or prove the story true, wrote to the Presbyterrians of this city, and to Dr. Lansing, then removed to New-York, and was accordingly furnished with the following certificate, which he published in the Albany Evening Journal, in May, 1835.

"This may certify, that at a meeting of the session of the Bleeker-street Presbyterian church in Utica, held March 23d, 1832, Cornelius H. Francisco came before the session to be examined for admission to the church. In the course of his remarks, detailing his religious experience, he made among other things the following statements:—He had formerly been in the full belief of the sentiments of Universalism, and in consequence of this belief, had twice attempted to destroy his life; once by taking opium, and once by shooting himself. Previous to the last attempt, he sent for the resident Universalist minister and some others, in order to evince to them the composure with which he could perpetrate the fatal act.

The minister came, and just as he was about to discharge his pistols, remarked: 'We do not know after all but there may be a hell.' That thought, he said, arrested his mind, and he was led to pause. 'Why have you not told us that before?' He replied, 'We did not know but it would make people crazy.'

J. C. WARNER,
SYLVESTER AYLSWORTH,
AMOS HOTCHKISS,

Members of the session, present at the examination.

Utica, May 1st, 1835."

To an exact copy of this certificate, Dr. D. C. Lansing, and Mr. Thomas Hastings, affix their signatures, dated New-York, April 29th, 1835.—And the Dr. further adds, "Should there be any further denial of the facts above stated, you are at liberty to inform the public that I have in my possession all the facts of the case, which were drawn up and signed by Francisco's own hand. There may come a time when it will be thought expedient to publish this narrative. When that time shall arrive, if ever, time, place, circumstances, and names shall be given.

"D. C. LANSING."

DOCUMENTS IN REPLY.

Utica, June 13, 1835.

No. I.—To Rev. I. D. Williamson.

DEAR SIR—I have seen the publication of Rev. N. Levings' letter in the Albany Evening Journal of the 23d ult., relative to Cornelius H. Francisco's attempted suicide, accompanied by the remarks of Dr. D. C. Lansing and the certificate of several of the members of the Bleeker-st. Presbyterian church in this city: and at your request send you a statement of the whole transaction so far as I am acquainted with it; which statement I drew up more than three years ago, immediately after the slanderous story was put in circulation in this region by Dr. Lansing and his satellites, with a view of publishing it. But as the character of F. was so well known in this community, and nobody believed the statements true whose opinion was worth regarding, I deemed the publication of it unnecessary, and was satisfied, and so was the community in this region, with the simple statement that the story reported was unqualifiedly false, length and breadth.

I will preface the statement with a few remarks, and annex the certificates of several respectable individuals of this city, which I should think would set the matter at rest, at least, so far as any remarks from Presbyterians, or any other Partialists, are concerned.

1. If Francisco ever made such a statement as the certificate sets forth, I am satisfied it was through the means of some such "graving tool" as Aaron used in giving shape to the golden calf, (Exo. xxxii: 4,) and that to evade the charge of fashioning it, Dr. Lansing would say, as Aaron did, "So they gave it me: then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf." (Exodus xxxii: 24.)

2. I have no idea that either Dr. L. or any of the members of his church, believed the statement true; but that they reported it merely to serve sectarian ends or gratify sectarian hostility. They are careful not to say they believed the statement of F., but merely say that he made such statement.

3. If they really believed it, the following certificates will serve to rectify their mistakes.

4. The certificates which follow will show that, whatever statements Francisco made, either voluntarily or otherwise, no confidence will be placed by any discriminating mind in the declaration of a man of his character.

5. His pretended conversion to Presbyterianism did not occur till about one year after his attempt at suicide.

6. By the certificates of Mr. Ladd and Dr. Meacham, it appears that F. married his second and third wives (if indeed he had not more than three) between the time of his joining Dr. Lansing's church and the death of his first wife.

7. Mrs. Francisco, the martyred wife of this monster of iniquity, was an amiable woman, an exemplary Christian and worthy member of the Universalist church in this city; and when she united with the church, Mr. F. was much opposed to her becoming a member of our church; which can not be reconciled with the false statement of his being a Universalist: for it was some months previous to his pretended conversion to Presbyterianism.

D. SKINNER.

(No. II.)

Statement of facts relative to the attempted suicide.
[Written in 1832.]

Till the day on which the much talked of suicide was attempted, (I think in March, 1831,) I never knew, nor to my knowledge had I ever seen, Cornelius H. Francisco. Nor was I then sent for by him, as has been stated. I was walking from the West towards the East part of the city, in the afternoon, and met (as I supposed by accident) Mr. Ladd, the father-in-law of F. He spoke to me, and requested that I would accompany him to the house (he and his son-in-law lived in the same house) and see if I could prevail on F. to give up his pistols; for he then had a brace of pistols loaded with balls, which he had carried to bed with him the night before, which no person or means could prevail on him to relinquish; and that he seemed determined on shooting himself. It is true, Mr. L. remarked to me that F. had expressed a wish to see Rev. Mr. Aikin, pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Utica, Mr. Doolittle, the man in whose employ F. then was, (being a boat builder by trade,) and myself; though he knew not why he wished to see us three. I accompanied him towards the house, stopping by the way, and requesting Rev. A. B. Grosh, to go along with us, which he did. On arriving in the street against the house, a boy came up who had been sent for Mr. Doolittle, the employer of F., and said Mr. D. refused to come, on the ground that F. had, the evening before, pointed a loaded pistol at him, apparently with intent to take his life; though I subsequently learned that this statement was in part erroneous. On hearing this, I hesitated about going in—not knowing what might happen. While thus hesitating, F. unlocked the door of the room in which he had shut himself up, and came to us, in his shirt sleeves, with a hasty and unsteady step, a bloated face and swollen eyes, and bursting into a flood of tears, seized me by the hand, and drew me forcibly towards the house, saying, "Mr. S. you are my friend, come along with me—I am wretched—I must die." "Die! I hope not," said I, "at least not by your own hand." "Mr. S., you say, don't you, that Christ died for all—that all will be saved?" "I say he died for all, to be sure; (for the Scriptures assert it;) not, however, for the purpose of giving license to sin with impunity, but for the purpose of reconciling us to God.—And by this act of self-destruction, which you seem to meditate, you show that you are unreconciled to God, and thereby boldly reject the mediation of Christ. But you must remember God is a righteous and just God, as well as a Saviour—He will render to every man according to his works, and the guilty shall in no wise go unpunished."

He then drew me through the hall into the room where he had been during most of the day, shut the door, and was about locking it, when I spoke and said, "But you will let my friend Grosh come in, will you not?" "O yes," said he, and after letting him in, said to his father-in-law, "Mr. Ladd, you can't come in"—and immediately closed and locked the door—(Mr. L. remaining and listening without.) The following conversation then took place.

S. What is the matter, Mr. F.—? what can be the cause of your unhappiness?

F. I am unhappy, and I must die.

S. Die! what, by your own hand! But why must you die?

F. I must die.

S. No, you must not die now, and in this way. Why destroy that life that God has given you for the noblest of purposes? Has not God always been good to you?

F. Yes.

S. Well, have you any reason to doubt but what he will always be good to you?

F. No; but I must die.

S. You must not die by your own hand—the voice of nature and nature's God, the voice of reason, of humanity, of Scripture, of religion, and the voice of every thing in creation, cries out against the dreadful deed.

F. I am miserable, and I must die.

S. This must not be, Mr. F. You have a wife, whom at the sacred altar you solemnly vowed to provide for, and a child, which, by every sacred tie of a father, you are bound to live and provide for. Will you thus violate all these solemn ties, and in opposition to the voice and laws of God and all nature, destroy that life that he has given you?

F. [Weeping.] My wife I love—my child I adore; but I must die.

After some minutes of similar conversation to the above, Mr. G. taking occasionally some part in it, without any apparent effect on F.—, I observed, "Perhaps you may esteem it a mark of courage or bravery thus to dare your Maker and rush upon death. It is, however, no mark of courage, but rather of cowardice—it shows that you have not the moral courage necessary to enable you to live and overcome the trials of life—true courage is, to conquer, not to yield to the evils that assail us." "No," said he, "I am no coward, Mr. S., I am a soldier; and you shall see that I am no coward." He then stepped to the back part of the room, drew out his pistols from his pocket, cocked them and presented the muzzle of one to his breast, and the other to his head. "Stop," said I, "Mr. F., you will not be guilty of that dreadful deed in our presence, will you?" and immediately stepped around behind him, reached my hands over his shoulders, (he being seated on a stool or trunk,) took hold of his wrists, and entreated him to give up his pistols to me. He refused. I then promised to give them back to him again, should he insist on it, if he would only let me take them a little while. But entreaty was as vain as argument. He however paused some time; his father-in-law was let into the room, the conversation went on, and more arguments against suicide, and more entreaties to him to give up the pistols, were employed, but without effect. When suddenly presenting the pistols as before, one to his breast and the other to his forehead, he snapped the one at his head. It providentially missed fire, (though well loaded and primed,) probably in consequence of the flint's being new, and the first edge of it crushing as it struck the lock. I instantly stepped to him, reached over his shoulders, seized one of his wrists in each hand, and immediately gave a signal for assistance, (he being a very strong and athletic man,) when Messrs. G. and L. sprang to my aid, the door was burst open and others came into the room, and it was only by a severe and protracted struggle, in which my own hands were considerably torn, that we succeeded in wresting the weapons of death out of his hands—for he hugged them with the grasp of a lion-like desperation.

He was then bound and taken to the watch house for the night. Next morning he appeared sober and rational, and very thankful indeed that we had saved his life at the imminent risk of our own. I afterwards learned that he had drank about a pint of brandy that day, though there was no appearance of intoxication. This he stated himself, and said that he drank it for the purpose of nerving himself for the dreadful deed of self destruction. Nothing was said by him during the whole of the transaction, about Universalism, or any other doctrine, or the subject of religion in any way, except what is related above.—He was never a member of any Universalist society, and if he were a Universalist, it seems singular that I should never have seen him to my knowledge, till that day, and equally singular that he should have expressed a wish to see Rev. Mr. Aikin on the day of his contemplated suicide.

DOLPHUS SKINNER,

Pastor of the Universalist society in Utica.

(No. III.)

This is to certify that the statement of facts made by Rev. Dolphus Skinner, respecting the case of Cornelius H. Francisco, is substantially correct, so far as I then was acquainted with them, and can now remember them. Nor is it likely that such an event will soon be forgotten. One circumstance Mr. Skinner has omitted, worthy of notice. When we asked Francisco for the reasons which impelled him to his desperate resolution, he sternly and invariably refused to give them—saying, "that is not your business"—"I know, and that is enough"—"that is my business," etc. If Universalism was, in any wise, the cause, it is most singular that he should refuse to state it.

The morning after the attempt, I called at the watch house, where he was confined, to see him. Mr. Parmele, (Constable,) now at the South, was present. Several other individuals not remembered, and, I think, Mr. Ladd, were also present in the room. Whether they heard (or, hearing, remembered) the conversation, I can not tell.—Francisco seemed calmer, but still somewhat troubled in mind. He appeared much astonished at what he had said and done, and professed ignorance of nearly all that had passed, while Mr. Skinner and myself were present, the previous day. How came he to remember any of it, and particularly what had never occurred, at his conversion? If he possesses double consciousness, one must be false. Believing him partially insane, and that it was necessary to know the cause, if possible, that the effect might be removed, I directed my inquiries to that point. In reply, he stated that he had been subject to a depression of spirits ever since he had been among the Methodists—that it followed after trances, etc.—that it had led him frequently to meditate, and once to attempt suicide by laudanum—that the attempt failed, hence his resort to pistols in this case. I spoke of recreations, rich diet, tonics, etc., as a probable remedy. He said stimulants always made him more melancholy. He had been free from this depression of spirits for some time, but having had the ague lately, he had resorted to tonics, which had probably brought it on again. I then suggested blood letting, and good medical attendance. He also said that he had very lately received a letter from a brother, manifesting a design to cheat him out of his share of their father's estate—that if a brother could use him thus, the world was not worth living for, etc. In all this conversation, he never even intimated that Universalism was any inducement to his attempt at suicide.

After Francisco joined Dr. Lansing's church, I had several (certainly two) conversations with him on the subject of his reported conversion from Universalism; and the slanderous tales of what was said to have occurred at his attempt to commit suicide. He always indignantly denied their truth, or that he ever gave cause for their circulation. He said, "Universalism had many good things in it, but as a whole (or 'as a system') he never could or did believe in it." I told him Rev. Mr. Loss told me that he saw a declaration, embracing the substance of the reports in circulation, signed by him; (Francisco;) and that said declaration might one day be published. Francisco immediately said with much warmth; "You will never see such a declaration—I never gave such a statement." More might be added, and witnesses referred to, but the above may suffice for the present.

I can not close, however, without stating that I then believed, and do yet believe, that Francisco lied to both Presbyterians and Universalists—telling the first party the story as circulated by them, and denying to us that he had ever made any such statement. And it is matter of serious regret, that otherwise respectable men should attempt to support such a villain in his falsehoods, merely because they are aimed at Universalists and Universalism. Men of undeviating morality and unimpeachable veracity are disbelieved by them, and C. H. Francisco, stained with every dye of recent crime, is believed in preference—no; not believed—that can not be—but put forward that the public may believe him! They thus made it their seeming interest to support him—gave him a letter declaring he was in good standing in their church, and he went off, diseased in body and mind with iniquity, to show his letter—win the confidence of the unsuspecting, and thus securely ruin them—disgrace his recommenders, the church and the religion which he professed amid all his crime. He is yet abroad on his errand—the letter of recommendation has not yet been recalled! These men certainly owe it to Francisco—to the slandered and the injured—to themselves—to their church—to community—to God—immediately to atone for their error by withdrawing that letter publicly, and warning the world against him.

A. B. Grosh.

(No. IV.)

This may certify that Cornelius H. Francisco married a daughter of mine for his first wife, and was in my family much of the time for several years. I am well acquainted with him, and with all the circumstances related above by Mr. Skinner and Mr. Grosh. The statements of Messrs. S. and G. are correct as far as they go; but the one half is not told. Mr. F. was a cruel and unfeeling husband, and abused his wife beyond endurance, inasmuch that she was obliged to refuse living with him, and I to forbid him the liberty of my house. He was habitually guilty of drunkenness, adultery, visiting the filthiest brothels in this city, and almost every nameable vice; and that, too, after he became a member of Dr. Lan-ing's church. He was also guilty of bigamy, and I think of polygamy. He married a girl by the name of Riley, of Manlius, Onondaga county, some time before the death of my daughter; and also exultingly showed to one or two respectable gentlemen in this city, a certificate from a Justice of the Peace in Youngstown, Niagara county, certifying his marriage to another lady, belonging (I think) to Canada, some months before his marriage in Manlius. A short time before he united with the Presbyterian church in this city, he came to my house and urgently solicited my daughter to consent to live with him again. She reproved him for his vicious and debauched habits, and tenderly entreated him to abandon them, and strive to regain his lost character, promising, if he would, that she would live with him again. He laughed at the latter idea, and remarked, that as to his character, he cared nothing about that—for he could re-establish that in a few days' time, whenever he pleased, by attending a protracted meeting and joining the Presbyterian church—that he had once joined the Methodists, and could then pray, and talk, and exhort as well as any of them; and he could do it with the Presbyterians; and he rather thought he should take that method to re-establish his character. Some time after he became a member of Dr. Lansing's church, he again came to my house and urged his plea to live with his wife, on the ground that he had reformed and would live a virtuous life if she would consent to live with him. She much doubted both the genuineness of his reformation and the sincerity of his professions, and for some time utterly refused. But at last, overcome by entreaty, and the most solemn promises on his part, she reluctantly consented. And thus, with the heart of a demon, he completed her martyrdom by remaining with her one or two days, and imparting to her his own loathsome disease contracted at brothels, and then left her, exulting to his depraved companions that he had succeeded so well in his design. She buried her miseries and wretchedness deep in the recesses of her own heart, and remained silent, till medical aid was useless—her heart was broken, and the peaceful grave soon gave her a shelter and resting place, where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." I, last Summer, saw the lady he married in Manlius for his second or third wife, while his first was living. She deeply sympathized with me in my afflictions. She had long since learned his character and refused to live with him, saying, she never desired to see his face again. GEORGE W. LADD.

N. B. The above I am willing to make oath to, at any time, if necessary. G. W. L.

(No. V.)

This may certify, that I concur in the statement of Mr. Ladd, above expressed, and as I attended Mrs. Francisco professionally, during her sickness, believe that her death was occasioned by the abuse and vices of her husband. Soon after his union with the Bleeker-street church, he called at my office on his return from a tour to the West, and inquired after the health of his wife; and when answered that her health was not good, he replied, "If you will kill her off, I will pay you well for it;" and then exultingly showed a certificate of his recent marriage to a young lady (as he stated, from Canada) at Youngstown, Niagara county, N. Y., by a Justice of the Peace by the name of Ashbel G. Hinman. He, at the same time, made application for remedies to rid his constitution from the effects of his immoralities, or secret vices, as he had several times previously done. I. N. MEACHAM, M. D.

Utica, June 15, 1835.

(No. VI.)

This may certify that, in the Fall of 1832, I visited Buffalo, and was there informed by several respectable people, (citizens,) that Cornelius H. Francisco had recently spent some time in the place—that while there, he was frequently seen intoxicated; and when spoken to about the irregularity of his habits, he had taken from his pocket a certificate of his good standing in the Bleeker-street Presbyterian church in this city, signed by Dr. Lansing, and in a swaggering manner boasted, that his character was above impeachment while he carried such certificates in his pocket. A. S. POND.

Utica, June 15, 1835.

(No. VII.)

This is to certify that, in a conversation which I held with Francisco, shortly after he united with the 2d Presbyterian church in this city, concerning his attempt to commit suicide, he informed me that he was led to it in consequence of troubles of a private nature, and did not so much as even intimate that religious sentiments were in any way whatever connected with the transaction. I then informed him of the reports which the Rev. Mr. Loss and others were circulating, and asked him if he had ever told the Presbyterians that Mr. Skinner said to him, at the time he attempted to commit suicide, "There may be an eternal hell after all." He replied in positive terms, that he had not. DAVID OWENS.

Utica, June 15, 1835.

In conclusion, I will only add, that it is exceedingly disagreeable to me, to be compelled in self-defence to make the foregoing painful disclosures, and give the many proofs of the depravity and wickedness of one who now lies low in death. But my own character is too dear to me to allow the before named slander to pass current any where in this land, any longer, if the ample expose here given of its falsity, and the wide circulation of this paper, can prevent it. I trust the work is now done, and done forever. The miserable man, C. H. Francisco, paid the forfeit of his last heinous crime, the murder of his fourth wife, by being executed on the gallows at Erie, Pa., in the Spring of 1838. (See Magazine and Advocate, No. 17, Vol. 9, for April 27, 1838.) Let the name and the memory of his vices be buried with him in the earth, and remembered no more, except as an admonition to all evil doers, that "the way of transgressors is hard."

Will Dr. Lansing, or his friends, now give to the public "all the facts of the case?"

Reader, if Unitarians ever attempt to retail the above refuted slander again, show them this article, and ask them, on the supposition that all crimes are to be attributed to the faith entertained by the person committing them, which faith was the worst in the case of F.—Universalism, or Partialism? If Universalism, (allowing he believed it, though it appears he did not) led him to attempt suicide, what did Presbyterianism lead him, not merely to attempt, but actually to commit? And which crimes are the blackest? the attempt at suicide? or Bigamy, Polygamy, Drunkenness, Adultery and Murder?

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Br. Lewis is informed, (if the mails have not yet brought him his papers and letters, and will carry this,) that I wrote to him as he requested. All is right—his last letters came safe.

Br. A. C.'s letters to Rev. Mr. P. have hitherto been crowded out until we fear it is too late to give them a place effectively in that form.

Br. D. Tenny is informed that Elder S.'s stories are old matter new Knapped. Made at first "out of whole cloth," they have not become more true by frequent repetitions, though, I suppose, even their authors begin to think they are true, from having told them over so often!

We really do not like to inflict on the correct feelings of our numerous readers, the mess of Billingsgate blasphemy, profanity and abuse uttered by a certain Elder Kingsley, and sent us from Trenton—and why should we injure him by recording his disgraceful speeches? Poor man, we owe him no ill-will! A. B. G.

REGISTER AND COMPANION—1840.

Br. Hutchinson has yet on hand a very few copies of the Universalist Register and Companion, bound in one cover—those who wish them, therefore, should apply soon. He has also several hundred copies of the Universalist Register and Almanac, separate—all of which he is anxious to dispose of, and close the concern for 1840. The postage is trifling, as they are periodical pamphlets, so that individuals can procure them by the dozen, by mail, for themselves and neighbors, without having them cost the retail price. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR.

We are requested to say that the mail and subscription books of the Expositor were destroyed in the burning of the Trumpet Office, and the Proprietors were compelled to mail the November number from the best sources of information they possessed. If any persons have not received their copies for November and January, and will notify the Proprietors, they shall be supplied immediately. When most convenient, the notice may be given through our paper. A. B. G.

CORRECTION.

Week before last we published an obituary notice of Mr. Horne. It should be Leonard J. Howe, son of Elias and Visa Howe. Howe instead of Horne in both cases. Our apology is, that we could not make out the name, and were obliged, as we are frequently by consequence of the carelessness of those who write notices, to guess at it. It should be remembered that we can not make out names that are badly written or blotted, by the connection, as we can other matter. We have sometimes been tempted, in such cases, either not to publish the notice at all, or to leave the names blank. But being of an accommodating disposition, we would like to know which would give the most satisfaction. A. R. B.

DISCOUNT ON MONEY.—We have to pay 25 per cent discount on Illinois, 15 per cent on Michigan, Ohio and Indiana, and 10 per cent on Pennsylvania and most of the Southern money. Will our subscribers and agents be careful to send us the best money they can get?

Mr. J. Hadley, of Fountain Green, is informed that his name was transferred to us with the Herald list, but no credit given him for advance pay. We can not well afford to lose the two years' subscription, for we are already sufferers to the amount of at least $1,000 for having had any thing to do with the Herald.

Br. Bazin—Benton, is in Yates county, N. Y. In our orders, when the State is not named, it is because the place or post office is in the State where our paper is published. A. B. G.

Applicants for situations in the office, etc., are informed that every post is filled—that vacancies seldom occur, and never remain vacant any length of time—there are always those near at hand and well known, able and ready to occupy them. Should it ever be otherwise, notice will be given of our wants. A. B. G.

BURNING OF THE LEXINGTON.

The Sermon on the burning of the Lexington, delivered by Rev. T. D. Cook to a crowded audience at the Universalist Church in this city, last Sunday, is now in press and will be ready for sale the first of next week. A pamphlet better calculated to depict the horrid cruelties of the doctrine of endless misery and illustrate the superior merits of Universalism in the trying hour of affliction; could not well be placed in the hands of our opposers. Early orders solicited at 41 Genesee-street, Utica. O. HUTCHINSON.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

Interview of Zacharias with the angel—Conception of John.

LUKE I. 11 And there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord, standing on the right side of the altar of incense.

12 And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him.

13 But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John.

14 And thou shalt have joy and gladness, and many shall rejoice at his birth.

15 For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb.

16 And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God.

17 And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

18 And Zacharias said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years.

19 And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to shew thee these glad tidings.

20 And behold thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season.

21 And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple.

22 And when he came out, he could not speak unto them: and they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple; for he beckoned unto them, and remained speechless.

23 And it came to pass, that as soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house.

24 And after those days his wife Elisabeth conceived, and hid herself five months, saying, 25 Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.

Verse 13. "Thy prayer is heard."—What prayer of Zacharias was heard? The prayer that he might have a son; or the prayer that Israel might be blessed? Both. Israel was to be blessed, and the son of Zacharias was to be an agent in conferring that blessing. The principal desires of Zacharias were not that he might have a son; but that God would smile upon his people, and bless them. Otherwise it would have been unworthy the Divine Being to have answered his prayer in this extraordinary manner.

15. "Great in the sight of the Lord."—That is, he shall be very great. In the sight of the Lord, is used for the sake of emphasis. The Jews often used the name of the Lord for this purpose.

16. "The Lord their God."—This seems to denote the Saviour, from what follows. Lord and God are terms not unfrequently applied to him, though he disclaims all title to being considered the infinite and eternal Jehovah.

17. "He shall go before him."—John was sent to prepare the way of the Saviour, which was said in reference to eastern kings, who, in their travels, sent messengers before them to prepare their way, and to announce their approach to those whom they intended to visit.

"In the spirit and power of Elias."—The spirit of his doctrines and the power of his preaching, were to resemble those traits in the history of Elias or Elijah. The manner of life of John and Elijah were also alike.

21. "He tarried so long."—It is thought that the time allotted to the burning of incense was half an hour; but Zacharias stayed much longer than this. It is probable that the interview with the angel was much longer than what is recorded of it would lead us to suppose.

23. "The days of his ministration."—This was one week. See 2 Kings, ii: 17.

"He returned to his own house."—This was in Hebron. See Josh. xxi: 11.

24. "Hid herself five months."—That she might have the fullest demonstration that she was indeed to be blessed according to the divine promise; before she made known the fact to others.

25. "To take away my reproach."—It is plain from numerous passages of Scripture, that Jewish females regarded children as a great blessing, and barrenness a curse. For illustration, see Ex. xxiii: 26; Lev. xxvi: 9; Ps. cxxvii: 3; 1 Sam. i: 6.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. III.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"Thou sowest not that body that shall be."

It is current orthodoxy among most Christian sects, that when we come to be raised from the dead, we shall have the same bodies that we have here; that is, according to the explanations which are given of the doctrine; not that we shall not have new bodies, but that they will be formed out of the identical matter that forms our present bodies. It would seem that those who hold this dogma, believe it mainly on account of its marvellousness; since other evidences in its favor are almost entirely wanting. It is true, indeed, that the doctrine has been received and taught in the Christian church for a great while, and by some very great and good men; and it is also true that at least one infidel* writer, so called, confidently asserts that Paul in 1st Corinthians, 15th chapter, undertakes to prove the resurrection of the same body. But at the present time it has come to be a fact very generally, that this kind of evidence, namely, the assertions of uninspired men, is not openly acknowledged to be of sufficient authority to establish the correctness of any particular doctrine. And in the absence of scriptural proof, may not its truth be reasonably doubted? Besides, the doctrine in question is encumbered with very many weighty objections, a few of which we shall here introduce.

1. It is physically impossible that each one of our race shall have in the resurrection a body formed of the same particles of matter that form his present body. No physiological fact is better proved than that there is a perpetual transformation of matter going on, so that it is not at all improbable that the particles which form the body of the reader, at the present time, may have, some of them, helped to form the body of some other human being, and may yet form part of a human frame in some future generation. As an illustration, suppose A. B. to be devoured by a shark—the matter forming his body must then, according to the laws of the animal economy, go to help form the body of the shark. Suppose then this shark to be killed by C. D., who lives upon the same till all of it that is eatable is quite gone. The matter forming the body of the shark, a part of which once belonged to the body of A. B., now forms in a great measure the body of C. D. He then dies. In such a case, I ask how it could be possible for A. B. and C. D. each to have a whole body formed of the same matter which formed their bodies at death?

2. St. Paul in 2 Cor. v: 1, holds the following language: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." By house, tabernacle, and building, he here evidently means the body, considered as the habitation of the mind, soul, or spirit, or what he calls a few verses previous, "the inward man." "Our earthly house of this tabernacle," is obviously our earthly bodies, considered as a place of temporary abode for our minds; and the "building of God," etc., is as plainly our resurrection bodies. Now observe. He does not say, If our earthly house (or body) were dissolved, the materials of which it is composed shall be carefully laid up for the purpose of building another house for us; but he says, "If our earthly house . . . were dissolved, we have a building of [or from] God, a house not made with hands," etc. It does appear to me, that if the apostle had held the doctrine in question, here was the proper place to introduce it; and the fact that he did not, but used language which conveys a different impression, is evidence to my mind that he believed no such doctrine.

In 1 Cor. xv: 3, 35, the apostle introduces an objector as saying, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" In his answer to these interrogations, he refers to the sowing "of wheat or of some other grain;" and in replying to the question "with what body do the dead come?" he says, still using the grain as an illustration, "Thou sowest not that body that shall be . . . but God giveth it a body . . . . So also is the resurrection of the dead . . . . It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body." Here, as I understand the apostle, he would teach us that we are not to have in the resurrection the same bodies that we have here, any more than we gather in harvest the same grain that was scattered in seed time. Let the reader consult the passage, and read what I have omitted, taking care, however, not to lose the thread of the apostle's argument.

It will perhaps be objected that Jesus Christ was raised with the body he had before death, and the scripture says that "we shall be like him;" therefore, that we shall have the same bodies that we have here. In reply to this, I observe that this argument would prove too much, seeing it would prove that as his body "saw no corruption," so neither will ours. But as it is believed on all hands, that in this particular the circumstances attending his resurrection differ from those attendant on ours, and yet that this does not contravene the scripture which says that we shall be like him, why then may we not have other bodies than the ones we have here, and yet be like him, though he had the same body after his resurrection that he had before death?

There was a particular reason why our Lord should be thus raised. His resurrection was to furnish the strongest evidence of an after-death existence for man. And as the fact of his resurrection must be certainly known to be a fact, in order to be a suitable and sufficient foundation for so important a doctrine as that of future life for mankind, it hence became requisite, that ocular, audible, and tangible proof should be given that he had been raised. He was therefore made to inhabit the same body after as before, that he might be seen, heard, and handled, and his identity established beyond a doubt. He hath "become the first fruits" of mankind, that is to say, the pattern, sample or specimen; not in respect to all the circumstances of his death, or of his resurrection, but principally in respect to the fact that he was raised to incorruption and immortality. In these respects, certainly, we, when raised, shall be like him. More anon.

HAS MAN THE POWER?

BY EV. A. C. THOMAS.

I intend this question to introduce a consideration of man's control of immortal interests. The article shall be brief—but the subject must not be regarded of small moment on that account.

It is contended by many that every man's immortal condition is placed within his own power—that he may secure unfading bliss, or involve himself in undying pains. This is horrible enough in all conscience—but it is not so horrible as another supposition of the same gloomy theology—namely, that one man has at his disposal the immortal interests of another.

For example: Millions of heathen are going to hell annually, in consequence of the neglect of Christian professors: that is, Christians have the souls of the heathen at their disposal—they can save them, if they please; or, if they please, they can allow them to be damned!

* Thomas Paine.

Again: I have enmity towards my neighbor; and inasmuch as I can not render him sufficiently miserable in this world, I shoot him while he is engaged in some sin, and so seal his eternal ruin! In this way I may be the means of sending thousands to hell—and then repent, be saved, and look down from heaven on the thousands I have ruined!

I have an indistinct recollection of an incident to the point. A. and B. were both wicked men. They quarrelled. Each had a loaded musket. A. fired and killed B.; and was tried for the crime, and condemned to death. Between the sentence and its execution, he repented, was converted, and died joyfully. Subsequently, the case became a topic of conversation between a Partialist and a Universalist—as follows:

U. Where do you suppose B. went when A. killed him?

P. He went to hell without doubt—for he was cut off in his sins.

U. Where did A. go when HE was executed?

P. To heaven—for he repented and was converted.

U. Now suppose A.'s gun had missed fire and B. had shot him! In this case, A. would have been damned, according to your theory.

P. Certainly.

U. Then, of course, instead of being now saved, A. would have gone to hell for want of a good flint! It was therefore a lucky thing for him that he succeeded in killing his neighbor! instead of being killed! A good flint was the means of saving the one and damning the other!

THOUGHTS ON DYING—TRIUMPH OF RELIGION.

Extract of a letter to Dr. W. C. C., written after the death of a brother:

I have long purposed to redeem my promise and write you, but such has been my condition that I have found in me no ability to call up early associations and contemplate them calmly. The present is so unlike the past, the contrast overmasters my feelings. But the feelings incident to sudden, unexpected, severe affliction, having in a measure subsided into chastened grief, I feel a degree of pleasure in corresponding with one of my earliest and truest friends, my companion in sorrow.

What a melancholy satisfaction in retracing our steps by the light of faithful memory, quite back to our first setting-out in life—to those days of innocence and boyish calculation when we always met in the light of gladness, and the fondness and order of unchanged affections. All was then real, sincere, frank. There is no disguise in children. We had not learned then the deception, the treachery of a wicked world. Its sunshine and its storms were then agreeable to us. Each afforded occasion for amusement and pleasure; or, its disappointments only whetted our appetites for a keener relish of its blessings. Not that I have found this world as bad as has been represented, as I have merged out upon its broad waters; for to the skilful navigator there is more danger in shore than out upon the open sea. But I have not found the world what our boyish imaginations pictured it to be. The conclusion obtained from my experience is, that this world is best fitted for present use; that is, by a proper improvement of opportunities afforded us, we may make ourselves useful and happy; and by keeping pace with it, not lagging behind, nor yet advancing too far ahead, our days, and months, and years will roll quietly and happily away. The fault lies in storing the future with too much of good or ill, and consequently disregarding present duty, and the means of present happiness. Our Master was definite upon this point—"Take no thought for the morrow."

You have heard of the death of Leland. Yes, he is indeed no more! His race is run. His course is finished. His sun is set; is set to rise no more forever in this low world. But his course was finished in the middle. His sun set at midday. At thirty-seven it is not time to die. Man should live to be old—should live just as long as he can be useful in work or counsel. I desire to live no longer. But amid the frailties of earth, its ignorance, its wickedness and error, what correct principle exists without exception? What law of God is not broken? Jesus, the pure and perfect, the wise and good, died at thirty-three—was slain like a felon! Is it surprising then, that with our limited knowledge of what is best for health, life and happiness, and our own frequent, almost constant violations of the laws of our nature, we are unhappy, sickened and die? Is it cause of marvel that the strong man dies? Add to this the ignorance and mistakes of those mendicants of men whose trade it is to patch up and restore from the just consequences of our transgression of the physical and moral enactments, and we shall find little trouble to account for the fresh graves of children, youths, and middle-aged. Pardon me, Walcott; I would cast no reproaches upon the healing or reforming "art." I lament that the great but simple principles of health and moral soundness are no better understood and observed; that the people, old and young, wise and foolish, are lost in the labyrinths of speculation, or fallen in the quagmire of unreasonable habit—become the dupes of a vitiated taste, to the neglect of the few facts and sublime principles, easy to be understood and obeyed, which would divest death of half its triumph, doctors of half their fees, and preachers of half their toils.

But amid the wreck and ruin of ignorance and vice there is a temple erected, at whose altar every true worshipper may find mercy, and obtain a power divine to sustain him triumphantly through this vale of tears. On its vane is light, and a fire is kindled upon its altar. In the depths of vice and folly, in the darkness and despair of unbelief, while all around is desolation, Christianity appears, the New Jerusalem, attired in her beautiful garments, all light, all glory; holiness to the Lord. Hope spreads her broad pinions and settles down upon all who kneel at this shrine; faith unfolds her sure promises, and love draws the willing spirit to God.

In this temple Leland worshipped and was happy. Happy! he was never happier than in his death. Oh! what a peaceful, glorious, triumphant death was his! None could be more so: so calm, so submissive; not a murmur, not a groan, not the movement of a muscle. After his eyes were dim, and his last farewell spoken, with his own hand he smoothed his features, and composed his limbs in the form of death; and at the very moment the clear sun sunk quietly to rest on a beautiful November evening, he silently breathed back his spirit from the tabernacle of dust into the hand of Him that gave it.

One of the Faculty, Dr. N., who was with him the last day of his life, says, "Of the great moral grandeur of the scene—of the lofty sublimity which was thrown over it by the calm and holy composure of the dying man, I shall say nothing. The powers of language would be all unequal to such a task—

"For what can idle words avail Unless the heart itself could speak."

After having addressed each person in the room individually, and rested himself a little, he said, "Now I die happy, and without the slightest doubt that I shall be happy hereafter, and with the fullest confidence of the final holiness and happiness of all men. And I wish all other denominations were present, that I might tell them how fully I believe in universal salvation." I need not tell you more. Some of his friends who were present are preparing an account of his last moments, which will contain his words, and a description of his death, and will be published in a pamphlet soon.

I need not tell you of my loss, nor my feelings. You can know them all; for you have lately lost a brother. Our cares are not dissimilar, save my elder brother, settled near me in the same vocation, is gone. Yours was a younger brother at home. But we do not sorrow as those who have no hope. No, thanks to God, Hope, a blessed hope is ours—an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast. And I am thankful to God that I was permitted to be with Leland to the last, to close his eyes; the eyes of my natural, and spiritual, and ministerial brother, and see him go to his rest—to his home, to his Father in the skies. May all our bereavements be sanctified to our good. Very affectionately, your friend in affliction.

FANATICISM.

At a Baptist protracted meeting, a sort of a "tempest in a tea-pot," quite recently in progress in a remote part of the city, it has been declared by an individual whose fanaticism it is feared is fast hastening him to the tomb, that it is impossible for a sinner to take a place on an anxious seat without obtaining religion, and being born again; and he has accordingly requested it as a particular favor that young ladies and gentlemen would go forward and take a seat, and be convinced for themselves. What a prostitution of the name of religion is this! Let us hear no more from the Baptist Register about the superstition of the Roman Catholics—for there is not a well-informed Catholic in the Union but would blush at the thought of such superstition as this. Indeed so fanatical and disgraceful have been the proceedings at the church where the above mentioned meeting was held, under the direction of one Elder Blain, that the pastor of the church himself, the Rev. Mr. Lovell, has deemed it his imperative duty not only not to attend the meeting, but to tender his resignation as pastor of the church, which he accordingly did on Monday afternoon, the 27th ult. "O foolish Bethelites, who hath bewitched you?"

THE PRINCIPAL UNIVERSALIST BOOK.

A prominent ministerial opponent of Universalism went into a bookstore in Boston, and asked to see some of the principal Universalist books. The bookseller immediately handed down a Bible. "I wanted to see a Universalist book," said the clergyman. "Very well," said the bookseller, "that is the principal Universalist work in my store!"

THE NAZARENE

Is not only welcome to copy the excellent articles of Br. S. R. Smith on Episcopalianism, so far as we are concerned, but we shall be pleased if they will get his consent to issue an edition of it, (by overrunning the type,) in book or pamphlet form, as we should have done. I believe a small edition would find a ready sale, and do much good, especially in the South and West. Append to it the article of Dr. Clowes on "the proposed prayer book."

They are also welcome to copy Br. Manley's articles, so far as we are concerned. I notice this request separately, in order to apologize for the manner in which our printer has scattered them along. He requests me to say to Br. M., that the circumstances which led him to do so, are removed, and hereafter he will give them more regularly.

I may as well state here, that any entire series of articles in our paper not intended by us to be published in book form, is at the service of our Editorial brethren—they giving the usual credit therefor. But in cases where such a series is evidently the production of great labor and research, and might be republished in book form at some future period, by the author, (whose right it is to do so,) I think justice requires that his consent be also obtained. Excuse the remark, I mean it as a general one—for I believe the brethren here alluded to will be courteous enough, on one side, to make, and on the other, to grant, the request. A. B. G.

A FALSE ARGUMENT RETRACTED.

When I became a minister of the reconciliation, I resolved never to use an argument in defence of the Gospel, (except when declaredly arguing on the principles admitted by an opponent, for the sake of showing their erroneousness,) which I did not myself believe. I did this, because I believed truth needed not error to support it—would, indeed, be injured by being propped up by falsehood—and because I love the doctrine I hold only because I believe it true—if it is error, I do not want to defend it by any means. In accordance with this resolution, I have endeavored to act. I may have used arguments fallacious and sophistical—I know I have—but it was because, at the time of using them, I firmly believed them sound and correct. When I found out my error, however I might feel an inclination to deny that I had erred, I have acknowledged my error on all proper occasions.

The following letter was received, postmarked "Haverhill, Mass., Sept. 4," just before I started on my journey to the East, last Fall. As I had not time to answer it as requested, I marked a notice of my intended journey in the Magazine, and sent it as directed, and took the letter with me, in hopes that its writer would meet and converse with me in person. This expectation was not realized, and on my return the letter became mingled with some others, and was lost sight of, until too late to attend to it in the last volume. Such is my apology for delaying my retraction until now—satisfactory to me, as the argument retracted does not essentially change the main argument with which I have always connected it. Perhaps, also, I ought not to publish the high commendations of my Inquiry contained in this letter—but, as I candidly believe it to be (although not as good as he styles it) a valuable compendium of the strongest Scriptural arguments against the doctrine of endless sin and misery, and in favor of Universalism—I will even say, the best compilation of its size and price, that I know of in the market—I wish to call attention to it, and thus induce our friends to read and circulate it more extensively than they yet have done. And I do this, not to gain reputation as a compiler or author, but to advance the knowledge and practice of the Gospel—not to make money by the sale; for I have sold the large remnant of the large edition to Br. Hutchinson, who, only, will be peculiarly benefited by the sale thereof. These are my reasons for publishing the letter, and for now inviting the attention of Universalists to the Inquiry (two lectures) named in it.

REV. A. B. GROSH—Dear Sir, I have read your two lectures entitled, "An Inquiry into the teachings of the Holy Scriptures, in two lectures—I, Partialism not taught in the Bible—2, Scripture proofs of Universalism"—and must say that they are invaluable. They contain many, very many powerful and irrefutable arguments in favor of the blessed doctrine in which you are so ardently engaged. They are worthy a place in every library. Although they contain no new arguments—"to the well informed Universalist," yet he, as well as every uninformed Universalist, should have them in his own possession. I read them with the determination to prove you in an error, if it could be done fairly, but was constrained to say, after reading it, that the arguments could not, to my mind, be overthrown; and every candid person must, I sincerely think, say the same, who has read it. I would not flatter you, but I must, out of a sense of duty, say this, that you treat the subject with great candor—meet all objections, which would be likely to be urged, fairly—that your reasoning is powerful, irrefutable and conclusive—and that you fairly, to my mind, overthrow the doctrine of endless wrath and sin by your straight forward course of reasoning. I hope and trust you will be amply repaid for your labor in preparing it for the press, and that you may yet see the glorious doctrine of a world's Salvation spread under your influence, and that you may render to God all the praise. But I pass.

There is one argument which you advance on the 31st page, in reply to an objection which might be urged;—in this argument, and this only, I think you are wrong. These are your words, viz.—"Is it urged that Jesus said of the city of Jerusalem, 'How often would I have gathered thy children together,' etc., 'and ye would not'? I answer, that there is a manifest difference between saying, 'I would,' and 'I will'—the very form of expression denotes that the former is conditional, but the latter is positive—the first is a mere desire, the latter is a determination." Here I am constrained to differ from you—to think that you are mistaken—that your argument has no force. I will tell you why. And first, would is the imperfect tense of will. The same Greek verb, ethelo, is used in the two places. In the passage "How often would," etc., the imperfect tense of ethelo or thelo is used, because he could not use the present or any other tense but the imperfect in speaking of past time—of what he wished, or rather willed in past time; and in the other passage, "who will have all men," etc., the present must be, and is used. I am well aware of the fact, that when we use would as an auxiliary verb, it then implies a condition—the conjunction if is then implied. Not so here. Here a principal, not an auxiliary verb is used, and why does it not mean the same in one case as in the other—i. e., when there is no condition implied? But do you say, that there was a condition implied when Jesus said, "but ye would not"? I answer, that though this is a fact, yet Jesus says that he willed to gather them together, but they would (same verb) not. He says that he, himself, willed (no condition, for he does not say that he did not will to gather them, etc., all things considered) to gather them, etc. It is as positive in one of these passages as in the other.

Well; now, may not the believer in God's endless wrath, and the endless continuance of sin and misery—may not he, with propriety, say that Christ's will was not done in this case, all things considered—because they (the Jews) willed not; and as it was not done in this case, because of their wills, so it will be in regard to this other passage? May he not say, that as sinners continue to remain in unbelief, so God will not, because of their wills, choose to save them? I see no reason why they should not so argue. I wish you to examine this subject carefully, and send me the result by mail immediately. And if you are mistaken in this point, will you please favor me with what you consider the fact in regard to this matter?—Not that I believe in the hydra-headed sentiment of endless wrath and woe; but I wish to see your views on this important point—important, because the opposers of our glorious system say that God's will will not be done. I shall expect a letter from you next week, without fail. You may direct it to ———, ———, Mass. [Here follow some special requests, which I omit. A. B. G.] Yours truly, INQUIRER.

It is proper to mention here, before proceeding to the main and important subject of the letter, that even had I received the letter at a time of leisure, I would not have been inclined to answer it as requested—1st, Because the writer gives not his proper name. I feel no obligations to trust those in the dark, who will not trust me in broad daylight. The writer knew my name, and to be on equal terms, it was necessary that I should know his. 2d, He taxed me with the postage, and though I do consider his correction worth the cost, he could not know that—and, besides, he wrote mainly on his own account—for his own gratification—and to tax still further my time, and labors of brain and hand, for his instruction, or satisfaction. True, he apologizes for not paying his postage, by saying he was not certain I would get his letter. Every man who sends letters by mail has reasons for similar uncertainty, but still, I would not willingly tax another with postage on my business. [This may seem a small matter, but there are many days when we receive from 40 to 60 letters per day—all charged to us, at the same rate, would cost us only from $7.50 to $11.25 per day these hard times! Let those who write on their own business, or to gratify their own curiosity or pleasure, think a little of justice.]

Those and other reasons that might be named, would have prevented me from replying to him by letter; but as the argument is before the public, to the public belongs its correction. That correction will be made in another number, for this article is already long enough. I shall send a copy of my reply as directed in the letter above, and hope "Inquirer" will receive it, and accept my thanks for his correction; though sent at this late hour, they are no less warm and sincere. If he discovers any errors in the correction next week, our columns are open to him, or to any one else, to correct them. A. B. G.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

Among the bodies which perished in the ill-fated steamer Lexington, and were found and conveyed to New York, was that of a little boy about four years of age. When picked up he had a green veil wrapped around his face. When the fire began to scorch him, it is most probably the case that his mother put her veil over his face to protect him from the fire a little longer. She forgot her own liability to burn, or was willing to suffer, for the sake of preserving her child, the last act of a fond mother's love. This touching incident gives greater beauty and strength to the declaration of Jehovah, "can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, she may forget, yet will I not forget thee." Isa. 49: 15. The love of a mother is so strong, that it is only in rare and extraordinary circumstances that she can forget to love her children. Yet rare as such cases are, so far stronger, immutable and boundless is the love of God over earthly love, that though mothers forget their affection, yet God will not forget. And if the love of that earthly mother in the Lexington, urged her to protect her son from fire, will the love of God, so much stronger than hers, permit him to cast any of his children into endless fire. "The Lord will not cast off forever." G. W. M.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS.

When the Jews left Egypt and arrived in the wilderness, Deity gave them ten commandments as the basis of all the morality they were to observe. 1. They were to worship Jehovah. 2. They were not to bow down to images and idols. 3. They were imperiously exhorted not to take the name of God in vain. 4. They were to remember and keep holy the Sabbath day. 5. Children were to honor their fathers and mothers. 6. They were not to commit murder. 7. They were to refrain from committing adultery. 8. They were not to steal. 9. They were not to bear false witness against their neighbors. 10. They were not to covet the persons or property belonging to their neighbors. These commandments are all excellent. And notwithstanding they were given to the Jews 1500 years before Christ, and over 1800 years have elapsed since the birth of our Saviour, making about thirty-three hundred years, yet such is the condition of society in general, that it would be much more happy and virtuous than it is, if its members practised these ten commandments, which were given to the Jews amid the thunders and lightnings of Mount Sinai.

Many individuals seem to think that these commandments are not obligatory on us, because they are attached to the Jewish Covenant which the Saviour abrogated when he established Christianity among men. But a little reflection will prove to us, that we are as much bound to observe them as ever the Israelites were. I do not intend to say that the ten commandments are given in the New Testament with the same methodical arrangement as they are in the Mosaic Covenant. But I affirm that the Saviour has advanced principles which lead to a binding practice of every commandment of the Mosaic moral law.

A lawyer once inquired of Christ, "which is the greatest commandment of law?" Messiah answered, "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Mat. xxii: 37–40. It is very obvious that our Saviour compressed in this teaching the whole moral spirit of the Mosaic law and the teachings of the prophets. And it is also equally obvious that no individual can adopt and practice this instruction of Christ, without observing every one of the ten commandments.

If an individual loves God with his heart, soul, and mind, he will 1. Worship God. 2. He will avoid idolatry. 3. He will refrain from taking the name of God in vain. 4. He will keep the Lord's day holy, for worship, devotion and praise. And in practising these duties, he will observe the first four of the ten commandments. Or if an individual loves his neighbor as himself, he will 1. Honor his father and mother as the highest of all neighbors. 2. He will avoid murder. 3. He will refrain from adultery. 4. He will not steal. 5. He will not bear false witness against his neighbor. 6. He will not covet the persons or property belonging to his neighbor. These particulars embrace the last six of the ten commandments. Hence, it will be seen, that by the instruction of Christ, we are as much bound to observe the ten commandments under the Christian Dispensation as the Jews were under the Mosaic Dispensation. G. W. M.

UNBELIEF AND DAMNATION.

Br. W., of Brookfield, who, in November last, requested an explanation of Br. G. W. M., respecting his "Biblical Illustration" of Mark xvi: 16, is respectfully informed that Br. M. does not suppose that any one can be saved by the Gospel without a faith in, or knowledge of, the Gospel; for we are saved by faith, while faith endures; and by knowledge, when faith is swallowed up thereof. Br. M.'s argument was misunderstood.—He argued, that as the Gospel embraced the salvation of all, and was to be believed of all, therefore the Gospel must be true to all. To be true, it must ultimately be fulfilled, and to be fulfilled, all must be finally saved.—How are they to be saved? He that believeth shall be saved. It follows, then, that all must ultimately embrace the Gospel—and until they do, they remain in unbelief and its attendant, condemnation. I hope this brief explanation will be sufficient. The inquiry would have been answered more early, but for want of room first, and mislaying it in the second place. A. B. G.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Capt. Wm. Miller, miscalled the "prophet Miller," is becoming quite celebrated at the East. Nearly every paper we receive, whether secular or religious, fires off a squib, cracker, pistol, "rifle," musket, blunderbuss, culverin, or cannon at the fellow—with what effect we can not tell at this distance, on account of the smoke and report. Br. Austin's rifle, in the last Trumpet, is a masterly affair, and briefly, but clearly points out the mis-statements of Millerism. Should the "critter" ever travel into this, its native region, it is probable we may want to borrow the rifle from Br. Whittemore, just for a single shot.

Br. Otis A. Skinner has consented to publish his lectures on Millerism in book form. A writer who signs himself "Cosmopolite," (probably of "Cosmopoliteville"?) has furnished Br. Tompkins with another book, on the same subject. Both have been issued from the press, and demonstrate clearly (we suppose) that the world will not be destroyed in 1843.

Br. J. Shrigley, of Exeter, N. H., has resigned his letter of fellowship, and withdrawn from the ministry of reconciliation. Br. Shrigley's health has been feeble for a long time, but his faith in God as the Saviour of all men is strong as ever. We still hope he may be able to resume his labors again.

The Rev. Mr. Maffit has been getting up a revival of Methodism in Cincinnati, Ohio, and abusing Universalism and Universalists. At the close of a lecture on this latter subject, Br. Gurley gave notice that he would publicly reply to it, etc. Crowds on crowds went away from the Universalist house, at the appointed time, unable to find standing place at the doors and windows, to hear Br. Gurley. Much interest seems to be excited in the city, and many have come to a knowledge of the truth thereby—among others, a lady who was driven into convulsions by the terrific preaching, has since with her husband, embraced Universalism, and joined Br. Gurley's society.

A German society of Christians has been formed in Cincinnati, who believe and preach the doctrine of universal salvation. They will probably build a house soon.

Rev. B. F. Newhall, a local preacher of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Saugus, Mass., has embraced, and commenced preaching Universalism. The Trumpet says he "is a gentleman of the first respectability, and one of the first citizens of the town of Saugus."

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

BR. T. J. SAWYER—I am requested by a mutual friend and ministering brother, to suggest to you, and through you to our brethren in Massachusetts particularly, a plan which he thinks feasible, less expensive, more beneficial, and less liable to objection than any yet proposed by the advocates of a theological Seminary. For myself, if the denomination as such are not made responsible for it, I would have no objections to it, and deem it more useful, and by far less objectionable than the more expensive project. His plan is this:—

1. Let an arrangement be made with Harvard University, in Cambridge, Mass., by which a suitable man enjoying the confidence of our brethren in that vicinity or in that State, could reside near that Institution, with the privilege, for himself and those whom he might receive as students, of using the Library of the University for their instruction.
2. Those of his students who wished to study thoroughly the languages or other sciences, to have the privilege of doing so as students of the University, on the same terms that other students are received; or, if deemed necessary, with certain exceptions, the better to enable them to attend their theological studies.

It is believed that from the great expense which must attend a course of instruction in a theological seminary, not more than 20 or 30 young men could be got for a number of years to come. If so, the expense of a library (and then but a meagre one, compared with the splendid one at Harvard, which is the largest in the United States,) and the suitable buildings, would be a very great tax on our friends, for the number of persons educated—the Professorships, also, must be poorly paid, or the students pay dearly for tuition, or a large sum be vested in endowments, thus increasing the tax of our friends. This plan, then, equally beneficial to the students, will save nearly all this great expenditure, until, at least, the schools we have already started for the education of laity and clergy, are out of debt, and placed on the footing they should be on, before Universalists are asked to plunge deeper in debt to educate one class only.

Fraternally yours, A. B. GOSH.

Y CENHADWR AMERICANAIDD.

CYHOEDDIDIG GAN WEINDOGION YR EGLWYSI CYNNULLEIDFAOL.

Yn cynwys Bywgraffiadau, Duwinyddiaeth, Hanesyddiaeth eglwysig a gwladol, Anianyddiaeth, Amethyddiaeth, Barddoniaeth, Peroriaeth; yn nghyd a Lloffion o bothau ereill moesol a buddiol, detholedig yn benaf o'r amrywioel gyhoeddiadau yn nghymrn, yn nghyd a gohebiaethau yn y wlad hon. Rhoddir yr holl elw a dardda oddiwrth y cenhadwr At Achosion Crefyddol. Ammodau.—I. Rhoddir allan Y CENHADWR AMERICANAIDD yn rhannau misol, yn cynwys 32 o du dalenau wythplyg, o bapyr da ac argraph hardd. 2. Ei bris fydd Dolar a hanner y flwyddyn. Dolar i'w thalu ar dderbyniad y Rhifyn cyntaf, a'r banner Dolar arall pan y derbyniad y seithfed Rhifyn. 3. Bydd y degfed Rhifyn i'r Dosparthwyr am eu llafur. Uetica: argraffwyd gan R. W. Roberts, 58 heol Genesee, 1840.

Stop, Reader—don't rub your eyes, for you see clearly enough!—don't get alarmed, either, for no accident has happened to throw our type into pi—all is as we intended it should be—the above is merely the title of a Welch periodical, the "Cyf. 1, Rhif. 2," for "Chwefror, 1840," (the "Rhif. 1," having been exhausted,) of which has been handed us for notice by our neighbor R. W. Roberts, 58 Genesee street. And now having carefully examined it, what shall we say of it? It is a very neatly printed, double columned octavo, of 32 pages, neatly stitched in a printed cover, and is probably very interesting to those who—can understand it! It appears to be a monthly—and from finding the terms "Crist," "Cristion," "Abraham, Isaac a Jacob," "un Paul, un Luther, un Whitefield, un Wesley, un Brainard," &c., with references to Scripture texts and missionary stations, I suppose it to be a religious periodical—probably "orthodox," for the North Britons in this vicinity are not given to "heresy." And though to me the language is fuller of jaw breakers than the German, yet as some of our readers may have flexible bones in their heads, and tongues that can be twisted into half-a-dozen knots, they may exercise them on the above specimen.

Having thus perhaps aided Mr. Roberts in making known his work to those who may wish to peruse it, we bid it farewell, so far as it is calculated to enlighten, instruct and render better that portion of the human family among whom it circulates. As to its errors, if any it has, so far as we are concerned, they are irrefutable in that language! A. B. G.

LETTERS TO CLERGYMEN.

We feel averse to publishing (and know that many of our readers are to reading) letters addressed to clergymen of other denominations, taking them to task for what they preached, or said, or did—especially if their sayings or doings are in accordance with their faith, or convictions of duty. I am well aware that there are some cases when to write and send such letters become a duty—and when they are answered with increased indignity or contempt to the writers, that, in self-defence, the publication of such letters may also become a duty. But if any one will look at all such cases as they will look at them a year after they occur, they will acknowledge with us, that such publications are rarely necessary. In many cases a mere statement of facts, while it will occupy much less room, will be amply sufficient—and often even that may be dispensed with. I speak from my own experience in the matter.

In short, almost any form is better in which to refute error, repel attacks, or dispel misrepresentations, so as to secure being carefully read by our readers, than letters. A hint to the wise is sufficient; so I close by giving merely a hint. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst. by Br. BARTHOLOMEW in Vernon—Br. J. D. HICKS in Salisbury Centre, and in Nicholasville in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst. by Br. BARTHOLOMEW in Lebanon.

Br. J. D. HICKS will preach on the evenings of Monday February 17th, in the Galway schoolhouse near Mr. Sweets Inn—Tuesday in the schoolhouse one mile north of Kitchum's Corners, Saratoga county.—Also Monday evening, March 9th, in Mohawk Village.

POETRY.

[From Bentley's Miscellany.]

THE GRAVE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF ROSEGARTEN.

Fearful is the grave:

Cold winds round it knelling,
Misty showers swelling,
Grief and Terror make their dwelling
In the silent Grave.

Lonely is the Grave:

Soft doth that stillness call,
Cooler the shadows fall.
Deepest Peace is whispering all
In the quiet Grave

Dismal is the Grave:

Irksome is that narrow wall;
Its breadth, and length, and depth, and height,
Just seven paces bound them all.
Dismal is the Grave.

Lovely is the grave:

A sweet defence its narrowness,
From the ever-wearying press,
From the juggling pageant crowd,
From the fools in motley crowd,
Shields us well that narrow shroud.
Lovely is the Grave.

Dismal is the Grave:

Its darkness blacker than the night,
Through which no sunbeam glances bright.
Not a star may ever gleam,
Or the softer moonlight stream;
Dark and dreadful is the Grave.

Lovely is the Grave:

Its shadows flinging
O'er the weak wanderer, and refreshment bringing;
While its cool breast
Lulls the hot weary pilgrim to his rest.
Lovely is the Grave.

Fearful is the grave:

Rain is rushing, thunder growling,
Driving hail, and winds are howling,
Round the storm-lash'd Grave.

Lovely is the Grave:

O'er the turf'd hillock Spring winds blowing,
Sweet at its foot the violets growing,
And on it blooms Forget-me-not;
There falls the moon's pale beam,
Hesper's cold rays, and morning's rosy gleam,
White Echo's half-heard note
And plaintive wailings float
Around the grass-grown spot.
Lovely is the Grave.

Lonely is the Grave—

There all living sounds are mute,
There is heard no wanderer's foot.
Joyous greetings never come
To visit that eternal gloom—
Oh! how lonely is the Grave!

Ay! is the Grave so lonely?

True joy's wild revel only,
And Folly's laughing glance,
And Riot's noisy dance,
They life not the Grave;
But the life-wearied sage, and Sorrow's child,
The Son of Song, will wander mild
Beside the quiet grassy heap,
And muse upon its secrets deep.
Not lonely is the Grave.

Senseless is the Grave:

Deaf and speechless, numb'd and cold,
Clothed alone in darksome mould,
Hope's glance of light,
And Fancy's vision bright,
And Love's delight,
Lost are they all within the senseless Grave.
Fearful, fearful is the Grave!

Lovely is the Grave:

All the discord, all the strife,

All the ceaseless feuds of life,

Sleep in the quiet Grave.

Hush'd is the battle's roar,

The fire's rage is o'er,

The wild volcano smokes no more—

Deep peace is promised in the lasting Grave.

Lovely, lovely is the Grave!

WHO SEES ME?

"O wad some pow'r the giftie gie us
To see our sel' as others see us,
It wad frae mony a blunder free us

A respectable, worthy farmer lately stated that he never went any where but what he learned something useful.

He said that if he saw things wrong and in a bad condition, it was an admonition to him to avoid errors and blunders of a similar description; and if he observed anything that was an improvement on his own ways and plans, he adopted it; so that in either case he was instructed, and promoted his interests, either by the evil or good he noticed in others. He stated that on a particular occasion he was at a tavern, where there was an elderly man who was intoxicated, and a number of ill-bred, vulgar young men were engaged in deriding and scoffing at him; the inebriate after some time of silence, turning round observed to them—"young men, what you find wrong in me try to mend in yourselves." This remark, he said, made a lasting impression upon his mind, and had been serviceable to him in his journey through life; and he thought that if farmers generally would adopt the plan of mending in their own practice, what they see wrong in the doings of others, it would very soon effect a great and wholesome change in the agriculture of the country; greatly increase the number of blades of grass, and ears of corn, and make them longer too: and it would much promote the prosperity and independence of many families who now consider all times as bad times with them.—Farmers Cabinet.

ANECDOTE.

"But Peter rehearsed the matter from the beginning, and expounded it by order unto them."—Acts xi. 4.

"I don't know," said a gentleman to the late Rev. Andrew Fuller, "how it is that I can remember your sermons better than those of any other minister, but such is the fact." "I can not tell," replied Mr Fuller, "unless it be owing to simplicity of arrangement; I pay particular attention to this part of composition, always placing things together which are related to each other and that naturally follow each other in succession. For instance," added he, "suppose I were to say to my servant, Betty you must go and buy some butter, and starch, and cream, and soap, and tea, and blue, and sugar, and cakes; Betty would be apt to say, Master, I shall never be able to remember all these. But suppose I were to say, Betty, you know your mistress is going to have friends to tea to-morrow, and that you are going to wash the day following; and that for the tea party, you will want tea, and sugar, and cream, and cakes, and butter; and for the washing you will want soap, and starch, and blue; Betty would instantly reply, Yes, master, I can now remember them all very well."

"Call not that man wretched, who, whatever else he suffers as to pain inflicted, pleasure denied, has a child for whom he hopes and on whom he doats. Poverty may grind him to the dust, obscurity may cast its dark mantle over him, the song of the gay may be far from his own dwelling, his face may be unknown to his neighbors, and his voice may be inadverted by those among whom he dwells—even pain may rack his joints, and sleep may flee from his pillow; but he has a gem, which he would not part with for wealth defying computation, for fame filling a world's ear, for the luxury of the highest health, or for the sweetest sleep that ever sat upon a mortal's eye."

Shrink not from a woman of strong sense; for if she becomes attached to you, it is from seeing and viewing the different qualities in yourself. You may consult her, for she is able to advise, and does so at once, with the firmness of reason and consideration of affection; her love is lasting, and it will not have been lightly won; for weak minds are not capable of the loftiest grades of passion.

The only difference between one man and another is, whether he governs his passions or his passions him.

MARRIAGES.

In Independence, January 22d, by Ev. J. Lewis, Mr. SEWALL GOODRIDGE, to Miss ELIZABETH PERRY, both of that town.

In Aurelius, Cayuga county, January 8th, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. HALSEY W. TAYLOR, to Miss LOUISA LOMBARD. In Auburn, January 16th, by the same, Mr. HARMON MURPHY, JR., to Miss CORDELIA TREAT, both of Troopville. In Auburn, February 1st, by the same, Mr. MARK ROSECRANTS, to Miss HANNAH SMITH, both of Phelps.

In Homer, December 24th, 1839, by Rev. A. C. Barry, Mr. NATHANIEL M. TOBY, of Caroline, to Miss ESTHER M. HART, daughter of Josiah Hart, Esq. of Harford.

In Fort Plain, January 9th, by Rev. H. B. Soule, Mr. HERMAN B. BABCOCK, to Miss MARIA ADAMS, eldest daughter of Henry Adams, Esq., all of that place.

Also, in the same place, January 15th, by the same, Mr. ROBERT SIVER, to Miss AMI LATHROP, both of the town of Stark.

DEATHS.

In Concord, January 5th, Mrs. LOIS, wife of Mr. Phineas Peabody, aged 68 years. Sister P. was a Universalist in health and in sickness, in life and in death. Funeral attended on the 7th, by the writer. Present, also, Br. S. W. Remington, of Boston. J. L.

In Hamburg, January 9th, Mr. ASA GOULD, aged 59 years. The deceased is understood to have been a Universalist. Funeral on the 11th, and discourse by Br. S. W. Remington, of Boston, N. Y. J. L.

In Walton, Delaware county, January 23d, Miss LUCINDA BUTLER, daughter of John and Ruany Butler, aged 23 years.

In Auburn, January 17th, of sea let fever, MERTON, son of Col. S. Taylor, aged 14 months. "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." May the consolations of truth be with the mourners. G. W. M.

In Auburn, January 29th, of scarlet fever, Mr. CHATTERTON, aged 22 years. He died firm in the faith of a world's salvation; calm and composed, he fell asleep in reconciliation to God. May the consolations of the Gospel be with the bereaved mother and afflicted family. G. W. M.

In Fox Plain, January 23d, of consumption, Mr. GEORGE COOK, in the 39th year of his age. Mr. Cook bore his illness with almost unexampled patience. Not a murmur even escaped his lips. In his last hours he manifested great composure, and having no fears with respect to his future condition, he welcomed the hour that "shuffled off his mortal coil," and ushered him into a new state of being. His funeral was attended on the 25th, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the circle of mourning relatives, by the writer.

Also, in same place, January 26th, Mrs. PHALINDA HILLS, consort of Mr. Samuel Hills, in the 70th year of her age.—In the death of Mrs. Hills, her bereaved husband has lost an affectionate and dutiful wife, her children a tender and devoted mother, and the community an amiable and useful woman. But she has ceased from her labors, "peace to her ashes." Her funeral was attended on the 28th, and a discourse delivered by the writer to a large and attentive audience.

Also, in Minden, January 27th, ABNER, infant son of Cornelius and Catharine Maxfield. Funeral on the 29th, and sermon by the writer. H. B. SOULE.

In Victor, October 11th, 1839, E. C. WILMARTH, aged 30 years. The deceased was a man of good examples, esteemed and beloved by all who knew him. A discourse was delivered at his funeral to a numerous assembly of relatives and sympathizing friends, by the writer. T. J. W.

In Tarrytown, November 4th, 1839, of a cancer, Mrs. MARY, consort of Mr. Ralph Pollitt, aged 47 years. Mrs. P. P. labored to a protracted and painful illness with Christian fortitude and resignation, and died in full faith of a happy immortality. May the consolations of the Gospel be imparted abundantly to her afflicted husband, and his dear children. Funeral services by T. J. W.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. E. M. WOOLLEY.

"And Israel said, It is enough." GENESIS xlv: 28.

With the history of Joseph, I presume my hearers are perfectly acquainted—consequently, a repetition of his history, would be like a thrice told tale, void of interest or instruction. But the language of his Father is replete with meaning. The temperate and intemperate, the skeptic and the Christian, the moral and immoral, would all do well to give it a careful examination; and it would surely be wisdom in them all, to compare their daily walk, and religious opinions with the words of the text. And after they have made the comparison, let them lay their hands upon their hearts, and put a question home to their conscience, "Is it enough—have I done all that I should do—have I acted well my part?"

In this age of excitement and contention, judgment and reason are seldom allowed to speak.—Passion—loud, boisterous passion—is the propelling power by which the religious car of fanaticism and folly is pushed along. The sober morals, and wholesome precepts of Christ and the apostles, are, in a great degree, discarded, and a new order of things introduced. Paul was very careful to impress upon the minds of his hearers, the important fact, that, "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace." If Paul was right then, a great majority of the religious world are wrong now—or, God has ceased to be what he once was, and placed his seal of approbation upon turmoil and confusion.

In speaking from the words under consideration, I shall call your attention in the first place, to customs and habits that are decidedly wrong; and I shall endeavor to prove to the satisfaction of the candid hearer, that the man who has imbibed those habits, is not doing enough for himself—for community, or his God. In the second place, I shall call your attention to what I believe binding and obligatory upon men—and especially binding upon the Universalist. As I proceed in the discussion, I beg your undivided attention, and I pray God that a blessing may be pronounced from on high, upon both speaker and hearer; that, at the close of our meeting, we may say as did Israel, "Lord, it is enough."

In a government like ours, it is the duty of every individual, to give his undivided support to principles that are positively republican—whether in politics or religion. In the Declaration of Independence it is said, "We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Whenever these principles are attacked, by enemies without, or foes within—by the strong arm of the law, or the cunning craft of the externally religious—there should be no compromise with duty—no counting of cost or contingency—no fear respecting the result of a well directed effort; but having determined what is right, and what is duty—there should be a firm resolve to go forward—and trust the result with that Being who is "too wise to err, and too good to do wrong."

It is unfortunate for us, as a denomination, that our doctrine is not understood by the mass of community; and the reason why it is not better understood by our opponents, is, they will not "come and see"—for in every instance in which it is understood, it is cordially embraced. But the wilful ignorance of our opponents, is not all we have to contend with; for it is a lamentable fact, that many who have named the name of Universalism, know little or nothing about it.—They think they understand it—they believe they know all about it—when, in fact, they are but little better acquainted with the doctrine than its most bigoted enemies. Those who have a correct knowledge of Universalism, are positively convinced, past a shadow of doubt, that it embraces every thing that is excellent and good. It provides a recompense for the vicious, that no mortal arm can turn aside, or defeat. If it be true, "let the wicked forsake his way," or prepare to endure (as did David) "the pains of hell."—its language is; "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." God is not man that he should change, or tell a lie. He has said, "the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him." Therefore, he wise, oh, man! and believe not those who would have you suppose that the wickedness of the wicked shall, or may, be transferred to another. "It has no salvo for sin"—no escape from deserved punishment—no mystery to bewilder the simple and credulous—no angry God to frighten the heart of the timid, and no trick or manœuvre by which justice is defeated, and its claims disregarded. In the mean time, it sanctifies the punishment, "that it may yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby." It has grappled with the devil and his kingdom—and will destroy, in the fulness of times, "death, and him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil."

On the other hand, it provides, or points to a reward for every virtuous act, which is sure and certain even in this life. God has never said, "say unto the righteous, it may be well with him;" but his language is, "say unto the righteous it shall be well with him." The fact is, God, himself, united sin and misery—virtue and happiness upon the earth; and all the devils in the universe can not divorce them.

To spread abroad this principle of eternal truth, in which Justice and Mercy are combined for the good of the whole intelligent creation, many choice spirits have buckled on the helmet of salvation, and fought the good fight of faith.—There are those before me this morning,* who were rallying round the standard of truth, while the speaker who is now before you, was laboring in the ranks of the enemy, contending with zeal, if not ability, for the doctrine of unending sin and misery—a doctrine I honestly believed, and over which I shed many a bitter tear. Your labors have been abundantly blessed of "Him who giveth liberally and upbraideth not." The increase has been more than equal to your most sanguine expectation. You have grown old in the warfare, and your locks have whitened in the service of your Lord and Master—you have seen the "wilderness bud and blossom like the rose," "and the barren places of the earth, have become vocal with the praise of God." For tens, the Lord has given you hundreds, and for hundreds, thousands. And can you not this day, on taking a retrospective view of what the Lord has enabled you to do, "thank God and take courage," and like Israel of old, say, "It is enough," even more than we expected?

But let me ask my hearers, who have come to a knowledge of the truth more recently, if they can look back upon their past conduct, and compare it with the acknowledged claims of Universalism, and say, "Lord, it is enough"? It is not enough that an individual is willing to say, "I am a Universalist"—he may do all that, and still be an injury to the cause. Yea, he may discard the doctrine of unmerciful vengeance in all its ramifications, and, after all, know little or nothing about the doctrine for which he professes to contend. Ask such an one to explain a passage of Scripture, and "give a reason for the hope that is in him," and he is bewildered at once. The Bible, to him, is a sealed book. It has never been the man of his counsel—and its consoling truths are, to him, like diamonds hidden in the earth—invisible. Presently an excitement is got up in the neighborhood, and this man is seriously excited. The clergy, aware of his ignorance on theological subjects, adduce Scripture, Scripture, Scripture, to refute the doctrine preached "by all God's holy prophets since the world began"—Scripture, too, that has no more bearing on the subject, than the East has on the West. Every well informed believer in the Abrahamic faith, is well aware of the forced application, and perfectly familiar with the correct illustration of the testimony; but this man, being entirely destitute of correct information on the subject, is confused—frightened—and converted! And then, and there, upon the altar of a L-o-n-g meeting, he renounces Universalism. Strange renunciation! Like unto a man who squandered a fortune in a month, but who never was worth a dollar in his life!

Again—It is not enough, that an individual understands the theory, and is able to silence every opponent. He should possess a character for honesty and virtue, in every sense of these words. Such a character is in the reach of almost every one. And no man should presume to call himself a Universalist without it. It is this, that gives weight and dignity to a well digested and well applied argument. It is this that will enable a man to look an opponent in the face, and say to him, you see in me, and in my conduct, the salutary effect of the doctrine I love. It is this that carries conviction to the mind of the unbeliever, and converts him from the error of his way. It is this that stops the mouth of the gainsayer, and multiplies converts to the truth. It is this that causes the hearts of the righteous to rejoice, and strengthens the hands of the weak.

It is not enough, (although many seem to think it is,) that, so far as its morality is concerned, it is reduced to practice. You should exhibit the light—the lamp—and the oil; that both cause and effect may be seen by others—that they, too, "may glorify God in their bodies, which are his." Hundreds have committed a fatal mistake on this point. They seem to think it of little or no consequence, whether they say a word or lift a finger in the behalf of Universalism, if they only give good weight and measure—and live within the pale of the civil law. This (I repeat it) is a fatal mistake—fatal to the man himself; for, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, such men are left with nothing but the theory in the head, without the substance in the heart. Such an one will excuse himself by saying, "I am alone, and can do nothing for the cause." "Alone!" yes—and may God in mercy grant, that you may live alone—and die alone—and that the world may never contain another Universalist like unto you.

I am well acquainted with a worthy friend, who was "alone," as the saying is. But he was a live coal, and resolved to have company. His was the only Universalist paper that came to the postoffice in his vicinity. But it was not long so,

* At the Session of the Central Association, held in Mer-shall, in June, 1839.—ED.

He was not "ashamed of the Gospel of Christ," nor of the paper that manfully contended for it. He asked his neighbors to read his paper. They did so—and were surprised that they should find so much to approbate, and so little to condemn. Well—the result was, that in about two years, not far from twenty copies of the Magazine and Advocate came to that postoffice, and they had a minister in the desk to proclaim to the happy congregation, "the faith once delivered to the saints." He was no longer "alone"—and, if there is one before me at this time, who is in the habit of saying, "I am alone," let him "go and do likewise."

When the President of the United States delivers a message to his private Secretary, which is intended for the people of every State in the Union, it is the duty of the Secretary, if so directed, to present the message to the Senate. But, is it enough that the Senate understand the message? Certainly not. It must go from hand to hand—from State to State—from county to county, and from town to town, until it has been thrown within the reach of all who wish to read and understand. Consequently, it is the express or implied duty of every officer, to give the people all the information he can respecting the purport of the message. Nor is this all. It is certainly the duty of every citizen, who is acquainted with the substance of the message, to enlighten the minds of those, who, through ignorance, misconstrue the language. The man who is willing his countrymen should remain in ignorance, is no friend to his countryman, or country. That I am correct in this position, no one will deny—I shall be equally correct, when I apply the principle to the subject before us; for you must all confess that it will hold good, in either case.

Christians of every denomination believe that God in mercy commissioned Jesus Christ, to deliver his message of love to the children of men. We, as Universalists, believe that the message in its purity, as it came from the mouth of the great Law Giver, is embodied in the doctrine of the Restitution. We believe it was the intention and purpose of the Author, that it should teach the way of life and salvation to a "lost and ruined world." We know by happy experience, and universal consent, that it is good to live by—and the dying testimony of all our brethren who have gone down to the grave, prove to a demonstration that it "robs death of its sting," and is good to die by. Now let me ask you, brethren, Can an individual of this faith say in truth, "I am doing enough," unless he is doing all he consistently can to promote this doctrine in the world? I answer, No—you will answer, No—your enemies answer, NO, and rejoice when they can find a lazy, idle, good-for-nothing Universalist. I say, then, in this case, as in the other, the professed Universalist who is willing that the people should remain in ignorance, and know nothing of this man-consoling faith, is not a friend to the religion of Jesus, nor to the people among whom he resides.

Did Paul think it "enough" for him to know that Jesus Christ gave himself as a "propitiation for his sins, and also for the sins of the whole world?" By no means. For he positively declared in the presence of his enemies—"For this reason we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe." Did Peter think it "enough" when he learned that all the holy prophets preached Universalism?—Far from it. For he immediately preached it himself, and continued to do so, till the hour of his death. Will you hear him a moment? He was speaking of Christ, and of him crucified, and he summed up the whole testimony in the following sentence. "Whom the heavens must receive, until the times of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."—I ask no one to sacrifice as much as Paul and Peter did, but I beseech every one who professes to believe that God is the Saviour of all men, to do what his judgment and conscience will declare to be his duty.

There are many individuals in the circle of my acquaintance, who understand the theory; and are able to give a reason, the why, and the wherefore. They are theoretical Universalists. Their morals are good, their habits, in the main, are good—but, after all, I have "somewhat against them." Ask them, or one of them, what is being done in their vicinity in order to build up the cause of impartial grace; and they will answer with the indifference of one who "don't care a bit"—"Nothing." There is but a small number of believers in this neighborhood, and the time has not yet arrived when it is prudent to take a decided stand. At present, the Partialists are outrageously bitter against the doctrine, and the man who should presume to oppose them, by advocating Universalism, must expect that his character will be slandered, his motives impeached, and his good name taken from him." Ask such an one if he takes a paper that is devoted to the promulgation of the doctrine, and, ten to one if he will not answer, "No." But why not take a paper? Surely you ought to do as much as that. "Well, I did once take the Magazine and Advocate—and a good paper it was, too, and I should think it equally good at present—for I see, now and then, a number—and I am pleased that it continues to go on its way rejoicing. But my family, or a part of them, wished me to discontinue it, and to please them, I ordered the Editor to strike my name from his list of subscribers."

Now, if I have one such hearer to-day, (and it is not impossible that I may have,) let me appeal to his conscience—and may God print the question on his heart in letters never to be effaced—Is it "enough" to put your light under a bushel? Is it "enough" to "hide your talent in the earth" till the Master come? Is it "enough" to know the Master's will, and not do it? Is it "enough" to say of Universalism, "It is the truth of God," and yet give it little or no support? If it is the truth of God, and good tidings of great joy, is it not worthy of your best affection and zealous support? Is it "enough" to say, "the time has not come when it is prudent to take a decided stand in favor of God's eternal truth?" Good Heaven, what logic! Is it "enough" to say, "We are few in number, and can not do anything," when your conscience and Bible both declare, the power of truth and its certain triumph? Is it doing "enough" for your children, to give them every reason that indolence and indifference can produce, to believe that you care little or nothing about the doctrine, and thus encourage them to choose its opposite, and bow at the shrine of falsehood instead of truth? If this is doing "enough," for Heaven's truth, then heaven's God has done too much for you. Indeed, was he inclined to do no more for you, than you are for his precious religion, the Lord, only, knows where you would bring up in the end!

The prophet, when he had adduced the truth of God respecting the pleasure and purpose of the great Law Giver, addressed the people in the following emphatic language:—"Thou shalt teach them to thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house—and when thou walkest by the way—and when thou liest down—and when thou risest up."

If Andrew Jackson and his band of faithful patriots, had resolved not to give battle to Britain's proud "invincibles," (as they boastingly styled themselves,) because they were not as numerous, and as well provided with munitions of war, as they were, Pakenham would have divided the "booty" of New-Orleans with his ruffian soldiery—not one obstacle would have been thrown in the way of the haughty foe. If he had said, "We are few in number, compared to our enemy, and can not succeed"—virtue and innocence, without respect to sex or condition, would have fallen an easy prey to the unfeeling and inhuman wretch, whose motto was, "Beauty and Booty."

But instead of such dastardly conduct, he called his faithful companions in arms around him, and addressed them in substance as follows:—"I can not say to you, fellow soldiers, that we are as numerous, or as well prepared for battle, as our enemies: but God helping us, we will do the best we can. We have truth, justice and virtue to sustain us—our cause is Heaven's cause, and heaven's God will sustain us." The expression was prophetic, as the sequel proved to a demonstration, and those boasting Britons, who had humbled Napoleon, and given to France a king of their choosing, found to their cost and chagrin, that the "battle is not always to the strong."—Let me then say to you by way of encouragement, you are not weak; you have strength, if you will only use it—no man is weak who has almighty truth to sustain him—your "cause is Heaven's cause," and heaven's God will carry you to victory, and crown your efforts with abundant success. "Fear not; for I am with thee, saith the Lord—he not dismayed; for I am thy God. I will strengthen thee—yea, I will help thee—yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteous arm." With such a promise, can any man say, "I doubt the success of a well directed effort?" If he can, let him no longer call himself a believer in the promises of God.—If he has so little faith, he may answer with the utmost propriety, when charged with not doing "enough"—"I can not." For "a man thinketh in his heart, so he is." But, positively, this phrase has been in use so long, and repeated so often, that I am out of all manner of patience with it, and with those who use it. And I should rejoice in good earnest, if the word, and those who hide behind it, were held in universal contempt. Is that too strong a word? No; desperate diseases require desperate remedies. "I can not"—"I will not," is better. For when a man says to me, "I will not"—there is no room for guessing. He exhibits a fixed principle. But when he says, "I can not"—he confesses himself unequal to the task—he looks at a trifle which one ounce of resolution would overcome, and it seems a huge mountain—his heart fails him, and he cries out in despair, "I can not." Ask the intemperate man why he does not reform; and he will give you for answer, "I can not." This he believes "enough;" yea, "I can not" is "enough" with this class of men. Ask the man from whose mouth fierce oaths drop thick and fast, from morning till night, why he does not cease to blaspheme the name of the Lord, and he will tell you, that the foolish habit is so fastened upon him, that he can not. Ask the Arminian, why the Lord will not save all thanations, families and kindreds of the earth—and strange as it may seem to the thinking mind, he will answer, "Because he can not; he wills the salvation of all men, but he can not save them, consistently with his plan of salvation." Ask the consistent Calvinist, why God will not save even to the utmost, and deliver all who through fear of death, are, and have been, and will be, "subject to bondage," and he will answer, "Because he will not"—and that's better—far better.

Now I propose and recommend a substitute for this mischievous old saying. "I can not," has never been of the least service to the world. It has never produced one reformation. It has never made the ignorant wise, nor the vicious virtuous. And, besides all this, it limits both God and man, and has done a world of mischief. But "I WILL TRY," has worked wonders in the world.

Come, brethren—come, sisters—what say you? Will you try to wake up; will you make one Christian effort to sustain and push forward the good cause? Come, ye old men and women; come, ye young men and maidens; come, rich; come, poor; come, ye time serving Universalists; come, one, and come, all; you have sung the old song, "I can not," "I can not," long enough; up, then, from this death like slumber, and let us unitedly write upon our beautiful banner of salvation, "God helping us, we are resolved to try!" Then shall the work go bravely on, and the borders of our Zion shall be enlarged. Hundreds and thousands shall flock to the standard of eternal truth, and the glad song of salvation shall be sung by millions of new born souls; and angels, and archangels shall lend a listening ear, to catch the glad sound as it rises from earth to heaven! Transporting thought! Oh, happy period, when our trials shall all be over—the battle fought, the victory won, and the world saved from sin and misery—when God, himself, shall say, "Sin is ended, let it be no more; pain has passed away, let it never return; and the last enemy is dead, let him never have promise or prospect of a resurrection!" Then shall every heart be glad, and every tongue shall say, "LORD, IT IS ENOUGH." AMEN.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

Gabriel sent to Mary—Mary's visit to Elizabeth.

LUKE I. 26 And in the sixth month, the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee named Nazareth, 27 To a virgin, espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David, and the virgin's name was Mary.

28 And the angel came in unto her, and said, "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women."

29 And when she saw him she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be.

30 And the angel said unto her, "Fear not Mary, for thou hast found favor with God."

31 And behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus.

32 He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David.

33 And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

34 Then said Mary unto the angel, "How shall this be, seeing I know not man?"

35 And the angel answered and said unto her, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also, that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

36 And behold thy cousin Elizabeth, she hath also conceived a son in her old age; and this is the sixth month with her who was called barren:

37 For with God nothing shall be impossible."

38 And Mary said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word." And the angel departed from her.

39 And Mary arose in those days, and went into the hill country with haste, into a city of Judea, 40 And entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elizabeth.

41 And it came to pass that when Elizabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb: and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost.

42 And she spoke out with a loud voice and said, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb."

43 And from whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?

44 For lo, as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in mine ears the babe leaped in my womb for joy.

45 And blessed is she that believeth: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord.

46 And Mary said, "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

47 And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.

48 For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaid: for behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.

49 For he that is mighty hath done me great things; and holy is his name.

50 And his mercy is on them that fear him, from generation to generation.

51 He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts.

52 He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree.

53 He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away.

54 He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy;

55 As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed forever."

56 And Mary abode with her, about three months, and returned to her own house.

Verse 28. "The Lord is with thee." This is a common Scriptural expression to denote the prosperity of the person or persons concerning whom the remark is made.

31. "Jesus." This means Saviour; and surely to no one could the name Jesus be more appropriate than to Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world.

33. "The house of Jacob." This denotes merely the people of Israel. Though that people now reject the Saviour, yet they are ultimately to become his willing and obedient subjects.

"Of his kingdom there shall be no end." The Saviour was to reign over the house of Jacob forever; yet that reign was to come to an end, (1 Cor. xv. 24,) but of his kingdom there is to be no end; for it is to be delivered up to the Father, and be endlessly continued, the Saviour himself being a willing subject therein.

35. "That holy thing." More properly, that holy child. Agion, holy, is in the neuter gender; and for that reason the translators have supplied the word thing. But this was unnecessary, since the Greek paidion, child, is also neuter; and by supposing that word understood after agion, the sense is improved.

"Therefore that holy thing," etc. The reason why the child was to be called the Son of God, was that God was his Father directly and supernaturally, without the intervention of man.

39. "Hill country." Hebron, where Zacharias is supposed to have lived, is said to have been in the hill country of Judea, in Josh. xxi. 11, where it is named as one of the cities of the priests. And it is spoken of by travellers as situated in an elevated tract of country.

44. "The babe leaped in the womb." It is the custom of some interpreters to regard almost every event recorded in the Bible as miraculous. It may be that the event here spoken of is of this character; but we are disposed to refer it to a natural cause. The joy was that of Elizabeth.

45. "There shall be a performance of those things," etc. This verse was spoken by Elizabeth respecting Mary. It does not appear that those things promised by the angel to Mary had been performed, but were to be. It is not certain therefore that John the Baptist was only six months older than the Saviour, as has been generally inferred; since the angel only announced to Mary that she should be the mother of the Saviour, without specifying the time when.

SOFT HEADS.

At the recent protracted meeting held in Dr. Welch's church at Albany, the renowned and eccentric Elder Jacob Munchausen, declared in his usually humorous and interesting manner, that Universalists were possessed of soft heads. A few evenings after he announced from the pulpit that he had converted at that meeting seven Universalists, or in other words, he had converted seven soft heads.—Our worthy Br. S. Van Schaack, knowing that those who were weak enough to be converted by an individual of Mr. Munchausen's stamp, must be possessed of "soft heads," and not wishing that such an imputation should pass unnoticed, inquired into the matter, and ascertained the fact, and published it in the Evening Journal, that not a single individual in any way connected with the Universalist society or congregation had been proselyted at that meeting. It is said that that circumstance, in connection with the castigation he received from Br. S. R. Smith, hastened Mr. Munchausen's departure from the city. The fact is, people are beginning to look upon his anecdotes and stories in pretty much the same light they do those of his illustrious progenitor, Baron Munchausen, that is, they look upon them as "whoppers," and receive them as they do some "rag money," at a great discount! W. R. Utica, February, 1840.

PRACTICAL HINTS,

To believers in the Gospel of Universal Grace and Salvation.

BY JOHN G. ADAMS.

A work with the above title will be published as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained. It will contain nearly, if not quite, 300 pages; with printing and binding handsomely executed. Price 75 cents per copy.

It is confidently believed that no apology is necessary for the appearance of a work like this. It is well known to the Universalist public, that for years past we have been in a state of doctrinal controversy; that we are still there; and that the main energies of our devoted leaders in Zion are necessarily exerted in defence of "the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." Great revolutions are going on in the religious and moral world; and while mind meets mind in the great conflict of opinions, it should not be forgotten that there are thousands who need not so much to be strengthened in theoretical as in practical faith. To such, this work is offered;—and while it is not expected that the mere seeker after controversial logic, or the lover of solemn declamation, or the mere professor of religion, will be much entertained therewith; it is devoutly hoped that to many a humble spirit, seeking to know and to do the will of God, it may prove a cheerful, happy visitant—a profitable companion. The book will be divided into chapters, as follows:—

- I. The superiority of Practical Christianity considered.
- II. The duty of Self-Examination.
- III. Watchfulness and Prayer.
- IV. Government of the Tongue.
- V. Culture of the Mind.
- VI. Improvement of Time.
- VII. Reading of the Scriptures.
- VIII. Fruits of the Spirit, containing illustrations of the fruits of Christianity enumerated by the Apostle; viz., Love, Joy, Peace, Long Suffering, Gentleness, Goodness, Faith, Meekness, Temperance.
- IX. Christian Institutions; wherein the following subjects in connexion with others are considered—viz: The Christian Sabbath; The Christian Ministry; Attendance on Public worship; The Church Institution; The Lord's Supper; Baptism; Dedication of Children; Sabbath Schools.
- X. The Christian's gain. A brief view of the pre eminent advantages and blessings attendant on a practical faith of the Gospel.

Such is a brief outline of the proposed work. Those desirous of giving it encouragement, are requested to signify the same, by lending their name and aid in causing it to appear. Will the friends of Gospel truth give their attention to it?

Subscriptions received at the "Trumpet Office," Boston, Mass., and by all Editors, publishers and others who may feel interested. Returns desired as soon as the first of March—earlier if possible.

THE DISCUSSION.

The inquiry has been made, respecting the discussion between Alexander Campbell and myself, when published, how those living at a distance can obtain the work—whether those subscribing for it are to have it delivered to them at their residences by travelling agents, &c.

In answer, I would state that it will not be delivered by travelling agents, nor can it be sent by mail without the postage costing nearly the price of the book. Those ordering or wishing it will call or send for it to this office, and pay for it when delivered. There will doubtless be opportunities for most of those residing in the State, and many out of the State, who wish for it, thus to send to Utica during the summer, or when the work is out of press. It is probable also that there will be depositories for the work in this State at New York, Albany, Oxford, Watertown, Auburn, Rochester and Buffalo. Also in other States, at Boston, Hartford, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Richmond, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Louisville. We shall notify the public when and where the work may be had when published.

All communications to me, or to this office, respecting the work, must be post paid, or free.

D. SKINNER.

AGENTS having money in their hands for us, will please remit as soon as possible—we need all the aid we can get, or our friends can give us.

FORGOTTEN.—The promised continuation of my article on the false argument in my Inquiry—it will appear in our next. A. B. G.

SKELETON OF A SERMON.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

Text, 1st Pet. iii. 13.—“And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?” Much wholesome advice is given to the believers in this first Epistle of Peter the Apostle of Jesus Christ. It is profitable to meditate often and long upon it, to see how far our lives conform to its precepts—how far our hearts are strengthened by its hopes and encouraged by its promises.

Many subjects are left for the decision of persons addressed, by a clear and definite appeal to those principles of judgment which are not liable to be mistaken. It is not to be denied that the fundamental principles of human nature, are in all ages nearly the same; that what is actually good, actually conducive to human happiness at one period, is not likely to be evil at another—that what is good for me is good for my friends and neighbors and the whole world.

Goodness may be defined to be every thing which tends to promote human happiness. To this definition we adhere, let others equivocate and theorize as much as they choose. With reason unbiassed, every man is qualified to decide for himself what is good, by what makes him happy, truly, permanently happy.

On this ground the appeal in our text is made. “Who will harm you,” etc., or, there can no harm attend those who follow the path of goodness. “All things work together for good to them that love God,” or follow good.

The man who does good, lives to be useful in making himself and others happy, allowing no temptation to elude him from the path of rectitude, always cherishing the Gospel spirit, is protected of God, is secured under the folds of his peculiar favor. God, as the supreme and special Governor of the world, will so dispose the hearts of the children of men, and order the affairs of providence, that his adopted children, who love and obey him, and conform to the laws of his government, shall always find safety and protection in the discharge of duty. Or, if they fail in the eyes of the world, their failure is their surest triumph. So Jesus triumphed. When the wicked had succeeded in their malice and nailed him to the cross, he conquered and overcame. His death was the greatest victory men or angels ever saw.

Safety is to be found alone in the pursuit of goodness. Sin and error, folly and deception, never made a man happy. They never can. Until the North shall embrace the South, the East the West, the quadrature of the circle be joined, and opposites agree, sin and error will continue to produce misery and death. And whoever follow in their course will do it at their cost. Every person who follows evil—that is, has evil inclinations—is totally disqualified for all true enjoyment, for every thing which deserves the name of happiness. The blind man sees no beauty in colors. The deaf man hears no harmony in music.

The apostle asks, and his question is emphatic, “Who is he that will harm you?” But he asks it under certain conditions—“if ye be followers of that which is good.” Here the virtue lies, in the pursuit of goodness.

A safe and ready conclusion from our text is, that no harm can result from the pursuit of goodness. But the advantage is not merely negative. A positive enjoyment is afforded to all those who follow in the way of good. The reader may ask, what are some of the good objects to be pursued? The assertion is general, including every thing that is good. Nothing which tends to advance the happiness of men. The salvation of the world is beneath our concern. Still I may mention a few things—the duties of the Gospel—love of God—love to the brethren—to our enemies—a sacred regard to the golden rule of righteousness, “Whatsoever ye would,” etc.—attendance on public worship—observance of all the Christian institutions—habits of reading and study—a rational, enlightened, and liberal piety—good will—modesty; nay, all “the fruits of the spirit—joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.” Who ever thought less favorably of a man for possessing these qualities? Who ever sought to harm him for their possession? What young man or woman is thought to deserve less respect and confidence, or to be less certain of success in life for strictly observing the institutions of Christianity and pursuing that which is good? Nay, will not even the infidel and the profligate give preference to these qualities in others? Why not then possess them in ourselves?

Can as much be said of the opposite course of those who follow evil? Do they escape harm from others, or even themselves? The inference is plain. Our duty is clear, and path direct. God help us to pursue it.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES, No. VI.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

REPENTANCE.

The Bible attaches no slight importance to this duty. Its urgent enjoining is of frequent occurrence throughout the sacred pages. They connect its faithful observance with an increase of happiness, and properly set forth its claims upon the individual's timely and heedful attention.

It is safe to remark, however, that it has been much misunderstood. Repentance is not merely a “godly sorrow for sin”—it is not merely the conviction that we have done wrong—that our transgressions have made the heart like “crimson”—that we have wilfully and continually lived in open violation of the laws of God. Repentance has a broader significance than this. It extends over a wider territory. It implies something more than the spontaneous and momentary out-breakings of bewailment and lamentation for past evil deeds—something more than humiliating confessions and penitent acknowledgments. It goes deep into the heart, and the heart's purification is the mission to be accomplished. If it does not accomplish this, it was not the effective ministries of repentance that the heart felt. It might have been the waking up of a slumbering fear. It might have been the influence of a startled and evanescent moral feeling. It might have been the workings of a new and impulsive but soon-fleeting purpose. It was not repentance. Repentance is reformation. This is its other name. It not only touches the fountain of action, but it changes and corrects the character. The outward conduct comes within its influence. And it abides longer than through one brief and excited hour. To regret past sins to-day, and wilfully sin again to-morrow, is not genuine repentance, for it is not effectual reformation. Neither is the duty properly observed by leaving one error and going straight-way to another. There is a thorough and resolute forsaking of vice and an ardent cleaving unto righteousness, needful for reformation. This is what is meant by being “dead to sin” and alive to virtue and to God, and being “conformed to the image of his dear Son.” It is this resurrection to continued “newness of life,” which is signified by the repentance enjoined in the Gospel, and which is urged upon every man to whom the Gospel comes with all the earnestness and solemnity of a matter in which he is hourly concerned.

It is a question of no inconsiderable importance—What are the incentives which will the most effectually induce this change—this reformation? What are the principles of religious doctrine, which will operate the most favorably for the accomplishment of this result?

Different systems place various motives before the sinner to stimulate him to reform. He is quite generally taught that his future, endless happiness depends on his complying with certain terms of the Gospel, and that repentance is one of the fundamental articles in his treaty of compliance. Is this hope of future good the inducement? Not alone. Much more stress is laid upon the consequences of the neglect of the duty. Other motives are presented. His fears are plied with an urgency which might well beat down the obstinacy of the stoutest heart. Around him are the dispensations of a threatening and vindictive Providence—within him are the evidences of his unmingled depravity—above him frowns the omnipotent displeasure of God, and close before him lies the world of unutterable woe! He is a creature of probation; now is the time; the next hour may be too late! And then, in strange contrast with this, he is assured that even a death-bed repentance will secure him the desired good.

It must be seen that these motives are of the inferior kind. They have nothing to do with the nobler faculties of the soul. They all bear upon the lower powers and passions of man's nature. They do not raise him up, and make him a man. But they encourage the low and undignified selfishness, from which it is the office of the Gospel to redeem him. It makes the matter of his salvation a matter of sordid littleness, unworthy of his own interest, were it not for the infinite evils he is taught to believe would follow, in case of an inattention to it.

But the Abrahamic Faith is free from all these exceptionable inducements. It derives its authority from a different source; and its reforming influence bears less upon the animal, and more upon the moral and intellectual nature of man. It recognises in him something worthy—something susceptible of improvement and exaltation—something capable of appreciating truth, and virtue, and present happiness, and it addresses its instructions and applies its motives accordingly.

The doctrine, on this account, is thought to be altogether inefficient, and even demoralising and licentious; but it is a sentiment of the New Testament, plainly and positively expressed, that Divine goodness leads to, and induces repentance. Did the assertion stand there alone, and were it, furthermore, unconfirmed by experience and reason, its rejection might seem more excusable; but it is corroborated by all we know of the principles of human nature—by observation and history. Man can not always shut his heart against the persuasions of untiring Mercy. It will break open the door of that little sanctuary, when storms and wrath would fail. He may bare his bosom to the tempest, and the fiercer it beats, the more obdurate may he become, or, if “by reason of strength” he is overpowered at last, it will be long after his falling, ere the deep and fervent affections of his soul will arise to God, a tribute of free and unreserved thankfulness and of cheerful obedience. But he has not a heart to withstand the entreaties of Heaven's unyielding affection. Show him the fulness and let him feel the power of the Gospel of universal Love—and will he not reform, and be good and happy? What shall lead men to repentance—what shall purify the universe of moral being, and perfect it in holiness and bliss, if the goodness of God shall not do it? We have no other hope. Divine wrath—if it were possible to conceive of such a principle in the Divine nature—could not, would not do it. Punishment may be a means, but that emanates from goodness and ends in good to the punished. Why should the doctrine be thought licentious, teaching, as it does, these salutary and heavenly truths?

REV. P. PEPPER,

Pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church in Fort Plain.

The Rev. gentleman, whose name heads this article, just at the close of the past year, commenced “a protracted effort for the salvation of this place,” which continued until last Monday evening, Jan. 27th. As is usual, the Elder began the exhibition of his unchristian conduct with abusing his own congregation; those who have attended on his preaching and aided, liberally too, in supporting him, ever since he has been in the place. I said abusing; for the language he used to them would justly be called abusive, should it come from any man but a revivalist: and some of his congregation have so regarded it, and, if I am rightly informed, have wisely resolved to withdraw their support. They do not feel disposed to listen to a man, much less to aid in supporting him, who clothes them with garments made almost entirely of deeds of infamy; or to tolerate him in holding them up before the world for its execration. And who can blame them? I do not; for they are, for aught I can learn, respectable men and women, and good citizens.

But not satisfied with railing against those of "his own household," he very soon turned his attention towards his Methodist neighbors, whom he treated in a most shameful manner. After having publicly invited them to unite with him, to facilitate the operations of the meeting, and to secure to it, if possible, greater success—which invitation was so far accepted that the Rev. Mr. Ames preached a few sermons in the Elder's desk—he publicly denounced them, at the close of Mr. Ames's last, and very good sermon, as hypocrites and deluded wretches; and declared, in a voice not altogether unlike that of the storied Stentor, that they "would go to hell, shouting glory to God." His language on that occasion justly excited the indignation of the Methodists. His abuse they could not and would not brook; and from that time they dissolved all further connection with him.

He next directed the shafts of his malignity at the believers in God's impartial grace. Against them he vented his spleen (holy anger!) by a most reprehensible perversion of their sentiments, and scandalous misrepresentation of their moral character as a denomination. Nothing seemed too grossly absurd and abusive for him to vomit forth from the sacred desk against them. The term "infidel" was not significant enough; hence, prompted by the dictates of Calvinistic charity, he denominated them "devils incarnate," whose "hearts are as black as the awful darkness of the bottomless pit, &c." He expressly said, that when he used the term Universalist, he meant something worse than an infidel. And following in the footsteps of his great religious progenitor, he constituted himself judge of all the earth; and forestalling the fabled judgment scene, to transpire in heaven in the far distant ages of futurity; he damned in one sweeping sentence, to "the irresistible and intolerable wrath of God," all who do not believe in an endless hell. Particularly was this the case with the Universalists in this place; for in a special edict he declared that "the Universalist church in Fort Plain, minister, trustees, members and all, will go to an eternal hell, and there's nothing in the universe can save them."

The Elder regarded Universalism as such a strong barrier to the progress of his meeting, that he devoted the labor of two evenings entirely for its overthrow. The notice he gave of this great undertaking was as follows: "Next Sabbath evening I will expose the horrors, the damning folly and hypocrisy of Universalism." Br. F. J. Warner was present when he attempted the mighty task of exposing what did not exist, and took down his sermons entire, both of which are now in my possession. But such a tirade of scandal and abuse, and such an ill-woven tissue of misrepresentation, seldom disgrace a bar room even. And this is done by a professed minister of the peace-making Gospel! They may, perhaps, be called philippics; but certain it is, that they are destitute of every thing worthy the name of argument; and were they published, even himself, I think, would blush to own them.

It was in the first of these sermons—if I may dignify them with the name—that he made the assertion which called forth the following letter; to which, as yet, I have received no reply; nor has he, as I can learn, taken any notice of it in any manner whatever.

TO THE REV. J. P. PEPPER.

Dear Sir—I have now before me your sermon against Universalism, preached last Sabbath evening. I have perused it with much care, but must confess my astonishment that it contains so little of argument, and so much of personality, scurrility and abuse. But it is not my design, at this time, to offer remarks on your sermon; but to call your attention to the assertion you made respecting myself.

In the fore part of your discourse, you introduced Matt. 25: 46, as proof of the position that "many of our race will suffer eternal death;" and if possible to add force to "the positive declaration of Jehovah," you accompanied it with the following unqualified statement: "under a challenge to the unhappy Universalist [minister] of this place, he acknowledged to me that KOLASIN AIONION meant eternal punishment." Why you should make this statement, I am wholly unable to determine; unless, knowing I was absent from the place, and could not, of course, be present and answer for myself, and believing that the end justifies the means, you improved it as a favorable opportunity for prejudicing the minds of the people against the doctrine of God's impartial grace, by representing one of its humble advocates as a vile hypocrite. In my public labors, I deny the doctrine of endless sin and woe. But you, Sir, publicly declare, that in a conversation with you, I acknowledged it as true, and present that acknowledgment as presumptive evidence in its favor. You doubtless designed it, also, as an "exposure of the hypocrisy of Universalists." But how well you succeeded is yet to be seen.

Now, that by the phrase "eternal punishment," you meant "eternal death," or endless suffering, I think you will not presume to deny. For, the very purpose for which you made the assertion, was, to give weight and force to your evidence, by adding the concession of one whom the audience knew was, or at least professed to be a disbeliever in, and consequently opposed to the doctrine you, at that moment, were laboring to establish. But, Sir, that I ever did acknowledge to you, that Kolasin aionion means eternal punishment, as you understand and uniformly use that phrase, and as you designed to be, and were understood, when you said I had admitted it did so mean, I respectfully, but positively deny.

At the time to which you had reference in the above statement, I explicitly told you that aionion, as applied to the word translated punishment in Matt. 25: 46, did not there mean eternal, in the sense that word is now generally understood to mean, i. e. endless duration. Nor, did you, Sir, then contend it did. The only thing contended for by you was, that the statement you made in your discourse (namely, that aionion is in the original applied both to Kolasin and zoen), was correct. This I admitted. I also admitted that Kolasin aionion and zoen aionion are, in that passage, placed in contrast; but, Sir, I did not admit, that either of these phrases have any reference to the immortal state of existence. Indeed, I denied that they, either of them, belong to the incorruptible life; and it was on this ground that I accepted the challenge you had just previously given. These facts you will not deny.

I now ask, how came you, Sir, knowing as you did, that I denied the passage has any reference to the immortal state, to publicly declare that I had acknowledged to you that Kolasin aionion means eternal punishment? Did you not know, when you made the statement, that it had no foundation in truth? And did you not, regardless of the truth, make it solely for the effect you supposed it would produce? intend to misrepresent, falsify and deceive? And is this, my dear Sir, a specimen of the conduct I am to expect from a Christian minister, professing to be called and commissioned of God to preach the truth? I repeat, then, that I positively deny ever making any such admission or acknowledgment to you as the one above specified; and now call upon you, either to prove your statement, or correct the impression you have sent abroad, by recalling it as publicly as you made it. And I hope you will attend to this matter without delay, for I am anxious to have the facts, as they are, before the public.

I am, dear Sir, with all due respect, yours,
H. B. SOULE.

Fort Plain, Jan. 24th, 1840.

The challenge mentioned in Mr. Pepper's statement as having been given to "the unhappy Universalist," etc., demands a brief notice. He seems anxious to convey the impression, either, that he gave me a challenge which was not accepted, or which, if accepted, led to a private discussion only; neither of which is the fact. The facts in the case are simply these. On the evening of the 13th ult., I attended his meeting. In the course of his sermon he brought forward Matt. 25: 46, as proof of the doctrine of endless misery, made a few comments upon it, and concluded his remarks with exclaiming in an air of seeming triumph, "I challenge the universe to controvert my position, or what I have said." At the close of the services, though I by no means considered myself the universe, I accepted the challenge, allowing it to embrace, not that passage only, but any and every other one in the Bible; and proposed that the meeting for the discussion be held soon. But Mr. Pepper immediately equivocated; said he did not challenge me to a controversy with him on the passage as proof of endless punishment. I then asked him if he did not introduce it for the express purpose of proving by it that doctrine. He replied, that he would have nothing to say about the object he had in view in presenting it; and that it was on the assertion only that aionion is in that passage applied both to Kolasin and zoen, he gave the challenge. What a magnanimous mind it must be, that dare challenge the universe to controvert the position, that aionion in the original, occurs twice in Matt. 25: 46!! I would just add, that the Rev. gentleman made his way towards the door as fast as possible, leaving me urging the importance of a public discussion on the question of endless misery.

Such was "the challenge to the unhappy Universalist minister of this place," which the Rev. gentleman would fain have the people believe was quite different; and such the prevarication resorted to, to evade, (after having given a challenge which nobody at the time could or did misunderstand,) meeting in public that said Universalist minister! It may perhaps be well to remark, that the above conversation is the only one, on that subject, or any thing relating thereunto, that ever took place between Mr. Pepper and myself; and this took place in the presence of a number of individuals.

A few words respecting "the protracted effort for the salvation of this place." After the Rev. gentleman had vomited forth the wrath and bitterness that, for some time previous, had been rankling in his bosom against Universalists, he called to his aid a certain Mr. Davis, who, for Billingsgate, scandal, buffoonery, blackguardism, and outlandish expressions, can hardly find his equal. His scurrility and abuse were so despicably low and mean, that even a grog-shop buffoon would blush to use them; and yet, to his own shame, Mr. Pepper called his harangues "God's truth." O shame, where is thy blush! This man conducted the affair until last Monday evening, at which time he gave an appointment for the next evening. But when the next evening came, behold! he was among the missing, and no meeting was held, or has been held since. Four converts, I believe, are reported as the fruit of this long protracted effort of three weeks, all of whom have ever attended that church. I would simply add, that the Universalists have lost nothing by this religious farce.

Thus ended the Elder's mighty effort for the salvation of Fort Plain! Of the propriety of his conduct let the public judge.

I believe I have stated nothing but facts; if I have, I can easily be corrected.

MORAL NEUTRALITY.

The attempt to slide between vice and virtue by pretending to neither, will perhaps seldom be openly made, because man is not apt to refuse a good name, however unworthy he may be of it. But the attempt is sometimes made to adopt, indirectly, a species of non-committal policy with respect to the vices of one or the virtues of another, as though, between these two qualities, there was a medium course partaking of the qualities of neither. We may sometimes be unable to decide from the conduct of an individual, whether he is really honest or dishonest, and it is clear that, under such circumstances, it is our duty to suspend judgment until we have plain facts to guide us; but this suspension of our judgment does not prove that the law of God does not judge him, nor should our ignorance serve to hold him in an equilibrium between righteousness and iniquity. We can not properly conceive of such a state in the great field of morals. The consequences which are attached to the Divine law forbid it expressly. The consequences of sin are faithfully set forth, either by inference or direct precept, on almost every page of holy writ. The unequivocal declaration of the Bible is, "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong he hath done, and there is no respect of persons." As a contrast we are also as faithfully reminded of the life and peace consequent upon a life of righteousness. "Great peace have they which love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." To this unimpeachable testimony we need only add our individual experience, to be convinced of the correctness of the two following propositions. First, that man can not maintain a neutrality between sin and righteousness; and second, that he is as accountable for sins of omission as for those of commission.

In a political capacity, the United States, for instance, is said to maintain a neutrality with other nations when it declines all interference with the affairs and rights peculiar to them. The neutrality itself supposes that there are certain regulations between those nations with whom we are under a covenant of peace, which do not concern us, and with which we have no right to interfere. So that in maintaining a neutrality with France and England, we do not assume a neutrality between right and wrong, but only sustain amicable relations to them in a national capacity, and our conduct will be right or wrong according to its nature. If we reduce the attitude which we assume to a moral obligation, we shall still see that we can not take neutral ground between right and wrong, for if our neutrality be a duty, we are actually doing good in discharging that duty, and vice versa.

So with individuals. However much they may pretend to be free from the requirements of the Gospel on the one hand, and the debasing influences of vice on the other, they can not maintain a neutrality with reference to good and evil. Their characters will be stamped with one or the other. Virtue owes no allegiance to vice, neither is there any fellowship between them. All are bound to cultivate and practice one, and to repudiate and flee the other. And this they will do or be guilty of doing wrong, by neglecting their duty, by double dealing, and by strengthening the hands of the wicked. We might perhaps go further. We might say of those who are endeavoring to hold themselves aloof from the excellencies of Christianity, without becoming contaminated by the iniquities of the world, that they are like him who should attempt to walk a slack rope with his eyes at liberty to roam wherever they pleased. The entire probability is, that the first step would never be accomplished, for the merest effort would subject him to a fall. And yet men forget this. One man says he believes religion is good—nay, he thinks the Christian religion is really essential to human happiness, but then he has never become a Christian. He does not think himself good enough for one. That is, he will not become a Christian because he is a sinner, and therefore the more need of being a Christian. He will not apply the remedy, because, forsooth, he is already sick. Such a person is trying unconsciously to establish a neutrality between Christianity and practical unbelief, but he will fail.

Again. Sometimes when a person is convinced that he can not pass for a good man, he claims to himself the virtue of not being a bad man. He says, I am resolved to do so and so, for at least if I do not do any good I shall not do any hurt. That is, I mean to take the neutral ground, and be neither good nor bad, saint nor sinner. As well might the sun say that he would neither give light nor leave the world in darkness. True, a man may often fail of doing good, and not necessarily commit evil; but then the motive gives color to the act. If at the commencement he does not mean to do good and proceed according to the best of his knowledge, he certainly will commit evil.

Then there are those who have adopted a kind of double policy, in order to steer clear of the name of bad men, without really assuming the responsibilities of useful and honest ones. They have something of an aversion to the open vices of mankind, but they have a way of manifesting it, peculiar to themselves. All the virtues of Christian morality they would like to practice if they could consistent with the policy which they have adopted. But if they perform certain good actions, they must thereby become obnoxious to some of their neighbors whom they are anxious to please. Hence if they have a neighbor whose friendship is an important item to their success in the world, or out of whom they think they shall be able to flatter some extraordinary favor, but who is not very strict in his moral character, they will not venture to teach, encourage, or practice any principle which will have a tendency to reprove the moral looseness of their friend, lest they should offend him.

Still they dislike by countenancing vice to lose the smiles of the more virtuous. To this end policy, policy must be used. They must assume much sanctity and candor in the company of the good; but with the bad, laugh as heartily as they conveniently can at the cunning and dexterity of some vicious trick which has been practiced upon the unsuspecting. They would not wilfully cheat a man out of his honest dues, but really they can not help but praise their neighbor's way of doing it; it seems to them the most polite, and fashionable and unexceptionable way of cheating they have ever witnessed. For instance. One lends an honest but needy neighbor, one hundred dollars, for which he asks only lawful interest on the principal; but then, since he has been so willing to accommodate, he must have a little remuneration for his charity. The poor man must therefore suffer him to retain twenty five dollars of the sum lent, for an old horse not worth five. This however is not usury but purchase money. Thus the poor man is compelled through necessity to become obligated in the sum of one hundred dollars and seven per cent interest, for the use of only seventy-five dollars—over twenty-nine per cent.

Now there is so much cunning manifested in this method of cheating one's neighbor and the law at the same time, that our policy man can not help laughing at it. At the same time he would not have it understood that he would commit such an act himself, and therefore he will join his honest neighbor in censuring what he just before gave countenance to. But I ask, whether in keeping this kind of neutrality between his neighbors, he has avoided vice as effectually as he has his duty? No, he has not. He has avoided his duty by neglecting to reprove, censure and discountenance vice; and in avoiding active good, he has run into actual evil. By encouraging vice in others, he makes himself an accomplice. "No man can serve two masters." "Ye can not serve God and Mammon."

MINISTERS IN STATE PRISON.

A Methodist clergyman, named Eleazar Smith, of Montpelier, Vt., publishes in the Watchman, that the Universalist papers generally have circulated a story that there were some time since, upwards of twenty clergymen confined for crime in the Auburn states prison, and that one paper called them all Methodists. He says further that he wrote to Rev. Mr. Robie, of Auburn, who declares (and gets his declaration certified by H. Tift, clerk of the prison,) that no man who was ever an accredited preacher of the Gospel, is now confined there—that during five years past, but two were confined there, one a Presbyterian, the other a Reformed Methodist—and even the former had not been in good standing for fourteen years before his crime was committed. Mr. Smith requests these letters to be published in this and other papers—and as we never circulated the story related (and never saw it in any other Universalist paper, that I now remember) I give this abstract thereof as sufficient, and to save room.

In closing I would remark, that I think the number is greater, within five years past, than Mr. Robie states—though I confess it is but an impression of my mind, which I can not now prove, nor be certain of its correctness.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

REMOVALS.—Br. T. J. Whitcomb has removed from Victor to Cortlandville, Cortland county, and wishes all letters and papers designed for him directed to the latter place. [Christian Messenger please copy.] Br. Delong has removed from Oran, Onondaga Co., to Lebanon, Madison Co., to which place he wishes all letters and papers intended for him directed. Br. H. J. Bradbury to Hampden, Me. Br. J. A. Bartlett, from Hollis to Brighton, Me. Br. J. F. Dyar, from Scituate to Hingham, Mass. Br. H. Bacon, late of Haverhill, to Marblehead, Mass. Br. A. S. Dudley, from Norridgewock to Union, Me. Br. G. Hastings, from Hyannis to South Dennis, Mass.

An attempt made to put down Universalism in Danville, Vt., has resulted favorably. Br. J. Harris labors there all the time, after a long period in which little was done for the cause in that town.

A new society was formed in East Randolph, Vt., on the 6th inst., consisting of more than 20 male members. It is the second society in that town, and will support preaching half the time.

Another was formed in Branch, Branch Co., Mich., during a Conference held there on January 17th, 18th and 19th. Brs. Stacy, G. R. Brown, Lockwood, S. S. Curtis, and Billings were present. Seven sermons were delivered to large and deeply attentive audiences, and other devotional exercises were enjoyed. Br. Stacy (from whose letter we derive this information) says the prospects of the new society are quite favorable. [The other joyful news in the letter, we do not feel quite at liberty to publish, until we hear from the person himself, in reply to my last letter to him.]

There is a prospect of having Universalist meeting houses erected very soon in Newburyport and in Stoneham, Mass.

Br. W. M. Fernald, who is doing a good work in Newburyport, Mass., proposes publishing in book form the doctrinal lectures he delivered in that town. It will be a book of 250 to 300 12mo. pp., and afforded at 50 cents per copy. The work will be divided into six discourses. Br. Fernald is a good writer, a sound reasoner, and I doubt not has done justice to the subject.

We perceive by the Boston papers that our corresponding Editor, Br. E. H. Chapin, of Richmond, Va., is at present preaching, and delivering a course of lectures to young men, in Charlestown, Mass. It is so long since we heard from him, that it is really refreshing to see even a religious notice in another paper with his name to it.

We have mentioned the efforts of Mr. Maffit and others, to put down Universalism in Cincinnati, Ohio. The last Star in the West says that the interest in the subject continues—the Universalist Church is thronged with hearers, and hundreds are compelled to go away every Sunday, unable to get entrance. In about one week, ending on February 3d, upwards of 150 names had been handed in to be propounded for membership in the Universalist society, many of whom had been, until this revival, members of the Methodist Church. Good! We hope Messrs. Maffit and Co. will go on putting down Universalism, until the entire city has been induced to hear, read, examine and judge both sides of the question for themselves. We fear not their decision.

NEGLECT OF DUTY.

We are always more ready to discover and censure severely, neglect of duty in others than in ourselves. When they neglect us, we suffer—but when we neglect them we feel not their sufferings. And it is generally the case, that the more we neglect our duty to others, the more apt are we to censure a single neglect in others. For instance, suppose we neglected to furnish our subscribers with the Magazine and Advocate for a single week, do you not suppose we would receive as many complaints from them, as we have made of their neglect to pay us our due? And is it not probable, that the loudest and angriest complaints would come in letters taxing us with postage, and signed by the very persons who are most careless and dilatory in paying their subscriptions? From past experience, I verily believe this would be the case nine times out of ten. The prompt paying subscriber, is a good natured, pleasant fellow—he loves to read his paper, and is highly pleased in general with its contents, its appearance and workmanship. His charity is great for the failings of others. He is ready to imagine how the Editor's temper may have been disturbed while penning that article, or why partiality or good nature may have admitted such a wrong expression from a correspondent. If the printer does not his work as it should be, or the mail fails in laying before him his weekly mental feast, he still supposes there is some satisfactory reason for it, though he can not imagine what it is, and therefore puts up with the deprivation as well as he can. Now, you will not persuade me that such a man will dun you for a supposed neglect of duty, or with an inquiry for his own satisfaction, without paying the postage on his letter. Nor is it probable that he would make the inquiry, why his paper did not arrive in proper time, in an insolent or angry tone. No—no—"my uncle Toby" might as well have been expected to crush his buzzing tormentor, as such a subscriber be supposed likely to get angry with editors or printers on a first offence. Ah, would that there were more uncle Tobies and prompt paying subscribers to newspapers, in this world of ours!

ENDLESS MISERY.

It is a truth, that all must die. Let us suppose that all are dead. For what purpose will Deity raise those who are termed the "finally impenitent"? Being dead they can do no harm—they can not sin—they can not, as dead persons, endure suffering themselves, nor cause others to endure suffering. Why not let them sleep in the grave?—admitting endless misery to be true: Why not permit them to rest in unconsciousness? According to modern notions, they will be raised to become endless sinners as well as endless sufferers. Is this benevolent, or does it consult a good end. They were finite sinners on earth—in another world they become infinite sinners! Does this change mend the difficulty? does it not make the evil endlessly worse? To whom will such a change work a good? To Deity? He delights not in suffering. To the saints? No! For as they are equal to the angels of God, they can not derive a good from the sufferings of others. To the sufferers themselves? No! To them it will be endless ruin! Why not, if people will have it that they can not be saved, let them sleep on, in the oblivion of the grave? It is the more benevolent plan than ceaseless pain. But even this is not necessary, for God says, "I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth; for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." Isa. lvii: 16.

SWEET'S PRACTICAL ELOCUTION.

Not having taken time from other pursuits to read the above work, I can offer no opinion of its merits based on a personal examination. The following extracts, which we copy from the Methodist Advocate and Journal, will however probably do better justice to the work, than any remarks of mine. Professor Sweet is well known, also, as an Elocutionist, and his system based on Rush's Philosophy of the human voice, must be admitted to be on a correct foundation. It is therefore only necessary to call public attention to the book itself, and leave it to the judgment of each teacher and professor of the science and art. It is for sale by Br. Hutchinson.

A. B. G.

Part first contains what is important to the theory of elocution without the encumbrance of multitudinous rules which are too obvious to common sense to require to be written. The author has brought to his assistance in this part of his work, an extensive and familiar acquaintance with the best writers on elocution of our age, and a personal knowledge of the principal orators of our country. Besides this, he has brought the fruits of his own practice and observation, which have been extended for several years, through many of the states. Prof. Sweet has shown himself to be no mere theorist. His work is highly practical. His very theory is practice.

His "select pieces," which make the second part of his book, are selected with great ability and good taste from the vast fields of ancient and modern lore, and are, of themselves, well worth the price of the book. To these pieces he has appended notes, historical and critical, which greatly enhance the value of the work, especially in the hands of the tyro in elocution, whose opportunities for reading are limited. The author does not abandon his pupil after the prescription of a few abstract rules but generously offers to conduct him through all those varied and difficult exercises by which he acquires the mastery of the science. This assistance he has greatly rendered in his notes.

But my time will not admit of extended remarks on this subject. I can only say, that I know of no work which I could more cheerfully recommend as a plain, practical, and able guide to a knowledge of this interesting science and art, than Prof. Sweet's work on Practical Elocution. And I am happy to learn that the rapid sale of the first edition furnishes a prospect of placing a copy of this work in the hands of thousands of the youth of our republic.

"A DISCOURSE

On the burning of the Steamboat Lexington," Etc., by Rev. T. D. Cook, Pastor of the First Universalist society in Utica, N. Y.—24pp. 12mo.

The above discourse has just been published, and is for sale at the bookstore of Br. O. Hutchinson. From the commendations of those among the crowded auditory that heard it, with whom we have conversed respecting, rather than a perusal of it, (for we have not had an opportunity of reading it before our paper went to press,) we recommend it to general perusal. I have no doubt it will be interesting as well as useful—the circumstances of the subject, as well as the talents of the author warrant such a belief. Buy and read it. Price, single, only 12 cents.

A. B. G.

Within a short period our hearts have been refreshed by the reception of the following among other communications for the paper. Several articles from "Sigma"—do. from Br. A. Fletcher—a brief series from Br. M. Ballou—Letters to her pupils, by Miss L. M. Barker—"Teachings and tendencies," by Br. Abell—7th sheet from Br. Austin—an article from Miss Edgerton—"Fragrant" by F. H. P.—an article from Br. Rayner—do. from Br. Clowes, with promises of more—several articles from Br. J. Gregory—do. from Mrs. Broughton.

Besides these, we have yet on hand sermons by Brs. Townsend and Barry—and articles from Br. Barry, J. A. McN., W. E. Manley, Rural Evangelist, and some others.

For all these articles we feel very grateful—they are such as can be read, and when published, will add to the reputation of our paper and the interest and profit of its readers. We hope that others will take example by these friends, and aid us in like manner; and that these correspondents will not weary in well doing. We want a great many such favors to keep us supplied with good articles.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. Wm. Sias, in Muskalunge, and in Dexter, in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in March, by Br. N. Brown, who will repeat his lectures on the evidences of the truth of Prophecy, in Mottville—Br. Sias at Perch River, and in Depau in the evening—Br. D. Biddlecom in Leyden—Br. Grosh in Taberg, and near Br. Eames', in Lee, in the evening (was left by the cars, was the cause of failure in my last appointment. A. B. G.)

Br. E. E. Guild will preach on the evenings of Friday, February 21st, in Laurens Village—22d, in the school house near Hartwick Seminary—23d, in Colliersville—24th, where Br. W. H. Coon may appoint—26th, at the Academy in Worcester—28th, in the Cade school house, in Davenport.

Br. BULLARD will preach at Newfield, on Thursday evening, February 20th—at Fairport, Friday evening, 21st—at South Creek, Saturday evening 22d—(instead of Monday evening, 24th)—on Sunday 23d, at Southport, 11 o'clock A. M., and lecture the same evening at the court house in Elmira.

THE HEAVENS.*

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

"How much tranquility has been reflected to man from the azure sky, over whose unspotted deeps the winds forever move drive flocks of stormy clouds, and leave no wrinkle or stain." R. W. EMERSON.

I saw the Day-king pass
Through the far-off sky,
But yet I saw no print
Of his passing by;—
The ether vault above
Was trackless as ever,
The wheels of his swift car
No path-mark could sever.

I've seen the lightning leap
'Mong the clouds of heaven,
And yet there was no trace
To my vision given,
The sky was clear again,
The lightnings were banished,
And with the lurid flame
Their foot prints had vanished.

I've seen the storm-cloud's plumes
Fill with gloom the air—
But who could trace a stain
Of their wavings there?
The heavens were as pure,
When they had passed over,
And aught of fury there
Could no eye discover.

How tranquilly you deep
Smiles upon us here,
Symboling Him, to whom
All of us are dear!
The darkly threatening clouds
By winds fiercely driven,
Mar not the peace-lit face
Of th' azure domed heaven.

Nor Day god's golden car—
Lightning's fiercer glare—
Nor sweeping clouds, e'er leave
Stain or wrinkle there.
Where storms have had their birth,
'Mid thunder's commotion—
E'en there is imaged forth
Divine Love's devotion.

KEEP OUT OF DEBT.

The great error which too many young men commit on their entrance into life, is that of going into debt. The difference of their income after the age of twenty-one, to what it was during minority, creates in their minds an idea that such resources must be almost inexhaustible. They are, from this cause, induced to anticipate this income from day to day, to satisfy imaginary wants, and before they are aware of what they are doing, find themselves one or two hundred dollars in debt, without being able to tell what has become of their money. By this time a habit of spending is acquired, and they have a double effort to make to recover themselves from debt, and break a bad habit. But too frequently, such victims of their own indiscretion find themselves inadequate to the task, and struggle a few years, harassed with duns, and the haunting ghosts of broken resolutions. Finally the chains are broken, and humbled in spirit, they commence the world anew, perhaps at the age of thirty, with the painful consciousness that every day they meet some one who can say by looks, "pay me that thou owest." Our advice to all young men, no matter how promising may be their prospects, is to KEEP OUT OF DEBT. Never buy a dollar's worth without the money to pay for it. The following advice from a father to a son is admirably appropriate:

"Believe, me, my son, that of all the kinds of tyranny by which the spirit of man is bowed down and crushed, and all his energies, moral and physical, are paralyzed and withered, there is none so active in its oppression, so bitter in its torture, as that which a creditor exercises over his debtor. It is a tyranny which can even quell the springing elasticity of youth's sanguine ambition. Observe, too, that its existence does not merely depend upon the disposition or acts of the master. The latter may be the mildest and most long-suffering man upon earth, and so far from endeavoring roughly to enforce his claims, may even refrain from asserting them. Still by the very nature of the relation which subsists between the parties, is the debtor reduced to the condition of his bondsman or serf, for the real intensity of the tyranny consists in this—that the creditor has ever in his service an officious and indefatigable agent, who acts not only without his orders, but often in spite of his expressed wishes, and that agent is the memory of the indebted party. The master may be willing to give time to his slave,—he may even desire him not to be disquieted by the apprehension of violence; but can the latter forget the existence of an obligation which may be forged upon his memory by the slightest circumstance of the passing moment? Can he forget, too, that however humane his present lord may be, his rights and claims, may, after death, pass to another of imperious and violent temper? Such are some of the considerations which make the mere existence of a debt, without any other aggravating circumstance, in itself, a tyranny of the most loathsome description. The parish pauper, despicable as his lot may appear, enjoys a higher degree of liberty and independence than the man who has put in the power of another to come up to him and say, 'pay me what thou owest.' Think not that my description is overcharged. The fool and the prodigal would laugh at the picture which I have displayed to you—the one owing to his mental infirmity, not being able to understand true liberty—the other from the baseness of his nature, being dead to the degradation of servitude. But the man of ingenuous and sensitive disposition, will readily allow that there are fetters for the mind as well as the body, and that in order to be apprised of a subjection to bondage, it is not necessary that one should hear the clank of the iron chain.

"Another circumstance which tends to make the debtor's chain still more intolerable, is, that in most cases the infliction of it is either occasioned or expedited by his own weakness and folly. A weak submission to the imperious yet trifling mandates of fashion, a vain competition in the race of extravagance with more wealthy competitors, and a shameful compliance with the unhealthy and artificial appetites,—these are some of the principal causes which, sometimes separately, but more frequently in close league together, entangle the young man in the toils of debt."

A PRESENTMENT.—In Henry the Fifth's time, the clergy, in their convocation, ordered that three in every parish should make presentment upon oath, of such persons as are defamed for heretics; in obedience, whereunto, there was a presentment made by some of the parish of St. Mary Overies, in these words, viz: "Item, wee saine that John Stevens is a man, we cannot tell what to make of him, and that he hath books, we do not know what they are." W. J. Thom's Anecdotes.

"I have been troubled with weak eyes for more than ten years, doctor, and am not able to tell the cause." "Can't you," said Mrs. F., "I can." "What is it?" "Because they are set in a weak place," said Mrs. F. We should call this coming to the head directly.

"Mike, and is it yourself that can be asfter telling me how they make ice cranes?"

"In troth I can, do they not bake them in cowld ovens, to be shure?"

DEATHS.

In Lancaster, Pa., on the 30th ult., JOHN ROHRER, Esq., late Clerk of the Orphans Court, aged sixty one year, ten months, and sixteen days. The deceased possessed an extraordinary intellect which not only grasped but fully investigated whatever of difficult or doubtful was presented to it. Upright and sincere in his intercourse with men, the same spirit was carried into all the private relations of life. As a husband, father, and friend, his virtues will long be remembered. Under other circumstances, John Rohrer would have been a great man in the eyes of the world, he was great a man among the circle of his acquaintances; great in the attributes which constitute the dignity of human nature. It is the lot of few individuals to have a greater number of real friends, or to go down to the grave more universally beloved and respected. It will be a satisfaction to his friends to know, that his mind was clear, collected and calm, to the last moment of existence, although suffering under a disease, which generally paralyzes mind and body.—Lancaster Union.

[But a few days ago, I received a letter from this estimable friend, in which, at my request he promised to place in my father's care, Petersen's Apoktas tasis, Pantion (Restitution of all things), a German pamphlet, (containing a discussion of the doctrine of universal restoration between a Lutheran clergyman and some mechanics, in Hanover, Pa. prefaced by some questions in English), and Siegvolk's Everlasting Gospel, to be forwarded to me as a donation. The two former were intended by me for the library of the Universalist Historical Society, and were solicited for that purpose. And when I state, that he was the friend of my earliest manhood—that 18 years ago I received from his hand almost the first Universalist book I ever read—and that, while living under his hospitable roof I first embraced that faith, I trust this tribute of sorrow for his departure will be excused. Whoever was his faith, he is the instrument to whom God has made me indebted for mine—and whatever his errors, I always found his heart beating warm in wishes for human happiness and virtue. We shall meet again. A. B. G.]

In Hannibal, August 10th, 1839 SYLVESTER BAYNTON son of Jason and Almira Pierce, aged 11 months and 23 days. The Congregational society kindly opened their house on the occasion, and a discourse was delivered by their pastor, the Rev. Mr. Dady, from 1 Samuel iii; latter part of 18th verse.

In Rushford, Allegany county, on the 31st ult., Mrs. EMILY SESSIONS, wife of David Sessions, formerly of this city.

In Columbia, Pa., on the 6th ult., PRESTON B. ELDER, Esq., Editor of the "Columbia Spy," and formerly Cashier of the Columbia Bridge Company's Bank, in the 30th year of his age. Mr. Elder possessed a well stored and active mind, and early in life gave promise of a bright literary career. Some of his articles over the signatures of "Alp" and "Peveril," may be found in the early volumes of the Magazine and Advocate. The general feelings manifested in neighboring journals at his early decease, show that he was much admired and greatly beloved by those who knew him. Soft be thy slumbers, my friend, and may no envious hand disturb thy earthly frame! A. B. G.

At Mottsville, on the 3d inst., an infant child of Br. A. and Sister C. L. Thumb, aged 3 weeks. Funeral attended on the 4th, and a sermon preached on the occasion by the writer. May the mourners not mourn as those who mourn without hope. The beauteous bud was too fair for earth; it has been transplanted to bloom in immortal beauty in the "spirit land" of incorruptibility and unalloyed bliss. N. BROWN.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. IV.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"And have hope toward God, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust."

It is a commonly received doctrine in the Christian church, that there are two resurrections of the dead, differing in time and quality; the first, of the righteous, to a state of happiness; the second, of the wicked, to a state of misery. Popular as this doctrine is, I conceive it to be erroneous, for many reasons, among which are the following:

1. The apostle Paul said, in the passage standing at the head of this article, that he had hope "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." Acts xxiv: 15. Here observe, that he says nothing respecting two resurrections, the one of the just, and the other of the unjust, but he says, "a resurrection," using the singular number, and prefixing the singular article; then tells us that this resurrection is "both of the just and unjust;" that is, that it includes the two classes. This passage I consider to be proof positive and unequivocal, that the common doctrine of two resurrections is untrue.

2. Our Lord, in his conversation with the Sadducees respecting the resurrection, makes no mention of there being any more resurrections than one, and this he denominates "the resurrection of the dead," saying nothing respecting the righteous dead, the wicked dead, nor any other class of dead whatever, but "the dead." And he affirms that "when they," that is, the dead, "shall rise from the dead, they are as the angels which are in heaven," which language, it is scarcely necessary to observe, gives no countenance to the common doctrine of two resurrections. But can the same be said, with truth, in respect to the doctrine that there is but one resurrection?

It may be objected that according to Luke, the Saviour made his affirmation respecting those "which shall be accounted worthy," which language may be thought to imply that some shall not be thus accounted, and hence that for these there will be another resurrection. In answer to this, I observe, in the first place, that the language indeed implies a want of worthiness in some, that is, it implies that for a time they are not accounted worthy; but it by no means necessarily implies that such shall be the fact always. And that this last is not, and can not be implied, will be evident by considering, in the second place, that the worthiness spoken of has respect to the resurrection. The words of Christ are, "The children of this world" that is, mankind in this world, "marry," etc., "but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Now if some of our race shall never be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, then they must for aught I can see, never be inhabitants of any other world than this, and must remain eternally unraised from the dead. And not "being the children of the resurrection," they can not be the children of God, can not be equal to [or like as] the angels; and it may not be true of them that they do not form matrimonial connections after death. Indeed the affirmation, "Neither can they die any more," is made only of those "who shall be accounted worthy;" hence, for aught that is here said to the contrary, if any remain eternally unworthy, they will marry, and die, and be born, and live, and marry, and die, like as the Pharisees believed, ad infinitum.

But here comes an important question. Are there any of our race who shall never be raised from the dead? This, Jesus decides before he leaves the subject. His words are, "All live unto Him," that is, unto God. All, then, will "be accounted worthy" in due time. More on this passage in a future number.

3. In 1 Cor. 15th chapter, which is a professed dissertation on the subject of the resurrection, by an inspired apostle, there is no intimation given of there being but one sort of resurrection. On the contrary, he treats throughout of "the resurrection of the dead" indiscriminately, and in one instance specifies all, affirming that "in Christ shall all be made alive." Now if it is a fact that there are two resurrections for the literally dead, differing so widely as the common opinion represents, how happens it that such fact is not once mentioned in this chapter, which contains about as much upon the subject of the resurrection as is found in all the rest of the New Testament?

4. The Epistles of Paul make up not far from two-fifths of the whole New Testament; yet in none of these is any thing said of any more resurrections than one. But if he had believed in two resurrections, would not the fact have appeared in his writings?

I know it may be said that in 1 Thess. iv: 16, two resurrections are implied, since it is said that "the dead in Christ shall rise first." We think, however, that a little candid attention to the passage will convince any intelligent person that no allusion to any additional resurrection is therein contained. The text indeed speaks of a certain event as to happen first, which supposes, of course, that some other event is to follow it, or happen next; and if Paul had not specified that next event, there might possibly be some ground for thinking that he had reference to a second resurrection. But happily, he did not leave that event to be guessed at; and his words are, "The dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them" etc.; the meaning of which to my mind, is just this, that in the first place the dead shall be raised in Christ, then those who shall be alive on the earth at a certain time, shall be caught up, etc. But as it is commonly supposed that the Scriptures certainly teach two resurrections, it has hence happened that but one member of the sentence is usually quoted; and the emphasis, instead of being placed on "the dead," as the contrast demands, is placed on the phrase "in Christ," thereby making it sound as if the apostle had it in his mind to say, what it must be acknowledged he did not say, that the dead out of Christ shall rise next. Thus it will be seen that it is only by omitting one side of the contrast, and then placing the emphasis wrong, that the language of Paul can, in even one instance, be made to sound like teaching the doctrine of two resurrections; and then the most that can be contended for, is, that the additional resurrection is implied.

5. Though the common doctrine of two resurrections may be thought to be implied in a considerable number of passages, there are only three texts of Scripture, one in the Old Testament and two in the New, in which that doctrine is supposed by intelligent persons to be taught in direct terms. In our next number we shall attempt a brief illustration of these passages; and I flatter myself that I shall be able to show satisfactorily that they do not mean what it is commonly supposed they do. In the mean time, let the reader consider the arguments advanced in this number, and especially bear in mind the passage from Acts xxiv: 15.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES.....No. VII.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

RESIGNATION.

There are numerous sources whence comes human misery. Some of these are the inscrutable arrangements of Supreme Wisdom. In carrying forward the purposes of His government, God may so beset our path with obstacles to our present happiness, as that there may seem no friendliness in his dealings.

There is an error, in reference to this subject, which has an unfavorable influence on the minds of many persons. It lies in the fact, that they do not sufficiently discriminate between evils of their own seeking and forming, and which they might have avoided, and those over which their agency does not extend—such as the adverse and afflictive occurrences of Providence. They often mingle the whole together, and the mass looks dark in proportion to its apparent magnitude. They do not think how much of their unhappiness springs from things esteemed trifling and unimportant, and how much it is in their power to give a different and brighter coloring to their condition. But, aside from this disregard of the individual ability and responsibility, there are evils far beyond human control, which occasion no insignificant amount of suffering and woe in the world.

It is true, that one's fortune, and health, and life are all, in a measure, in his own hands; yet it is also true, that adversity may overshadow the former, and wasting sickness interrupt the second, and death terminate the last, in direct obedience to "an order from" God's throne. A man may, by heedlessness and prodigality, soon empty his coffers of their thousands and find himself destitute and in want. And he may, by an inattention to the laws of physical life, soon destroy the vigorousness of his constitution, and break up the healthful operation of his functions, and bring upon himself the acutest bodily suffering; and he may, also, and by the same means, urge on premature death in the footsteps of his premature decay. But then, on the other hand, the same things in the result might have happened, and the man only have been a passive instrument in the course of their happening. One gust of wind, or one spark of fire, might send a sweeping desolation over all his possessions. Some destructive and unavoidable disease might overtake him in the days of his strength and manhood, and cause him months and years of lingering pain, and at last, by severing the thread of life, loosen his spirit's hold on earth, and give his body to the keeping of the grave.

Such instances of change and death are of continual occurrence, and there is "much weeping" in consequence; and who does not see the necessity of seeking aid somewhere? You can hardly look to the things around you, for, in this hour of darkness, their instability is most bitterly felt. Confidence in them has already been broken off, and they are no longer the "all in all" to the stricken heart.

I can not here resist the temptation to notice a very common and short-hand manner of tendering consolation and encouragement to the unfortunate. After the transpiring of some misfortune, however diminutive or calamitous, nothing is more frequent than for a friend to suggest, that "it might have been a great deal worse." It is well to appreciate the friendship which prompts the reflection; but, if others' hearts are like my own, it is no superior consolation to be assured, that it is in the power of Providence to double and multiply my sufferings to any increased amount. It were more satisfactory to know, that God can and does "deal gently" with his children, and that the present affliction is thus severe, not because God was able to make it thus severe, but because it was in just consistence with his wisdom and will. And yet, if this is the true statement of the case—if every Providential infliction comports precisely with the Divine attributes and purposes, then the friendly assertion is not true, after all; as it would imply either inconsistency or injustice on the part of God. It is therefore improperly used; besides, we believe it never affords the intended comfort.

Religion is the great antidote—usually recommended in the day of misfortune,—but will not this fail also, unless the mind entertains certain and established views to chasten and control the feelings, and offer suitable subjects for thought and meditation? It is indisputable, that the religious opinion of an individual, (if he has any), will have a great influence upon the heart in the season of its depression; and if he has them not, he has certainly volunteered the addition of another serious misfortune to his personal calamities.

Now, what are the sentiments most promotive of resignation? for it is hardly possible to conceive of religion with principles of faith—without the surrender of the mental assent to propositions, supposed or understood as definite and distinct. You can give to morality as high a degree of moral influence as is wished, and it may still claim nothing properly coming under the denomination of religious belief. Religion is the embodying and development of faith in God and His Son; and the character of this faith is the character of the religion, and is also an index to the condition of the heart and the measure of its happiness.

The whole matter then, is seen to rest upon the views entertained of God. It thence becomes proper to ask, In what light the Infinite Creator should be presented to the mind of the believer, in order to secure his resignation and comparative happiness in his time of affliction?

There is one view we esteem decidedly preferable to all others. Give God the character of a Father—supremely great, and wise, and good—let him be looked upon and loved as such, and the heart has something by which it can be invigorated, sustained and cheered, and from which it can derive the required encouragement. There can be no doubt in his mind as to the wisdom, justice, and benevolence of whatever afflictive allotments may befall him. He remembers that the infinite love of his Father would never subject him to any evils which were not designed for his, or common benefit. He has no misgivings here. He confides in that Parent. He looks to him in cheerful hope and trust in every period of his changeful history. He feels that God governs wisely and well. But he can go further. He can see the same Parental affection extending to all the great race of man. He can see the Divine retributions directly aiding the work of redemption; and,—what his opposers can not enjoy,—he can behold the ultimate efficacy of redeeming grace, and the prospective blessedness and glory of a whole world of immortalised intelligences! Herein does his soul find its joy and gladness. And his heart can harbor no faith more promotive of its resignation through his varying career of toil and trial. And this is Universalism.

THOUSAND DOLLAR RELIGION.

At a recent fanatical meeting held in the city of Baltimore, one of the converts, it is said, made a donation of a thousand dollars to the foreign and home missionary societies. At this circumstance our Br. Beebee, of the Baptist Register, is in extacies. Says he, "The thousand dollar donation presented by the young convert in Baltimore for foreign and home missions was certainly a noble gift, and illustrates the influence of religion (!) in its power and purity (!) on the new born soul."*

Now, with all due deference to Br. Beebee's judgment, we must beg leave to differ with him concerning this transaction. So far from considering it as illustrating the "influence of religion," we look upon it in quite a different light—we look upon it as illustrating the influence of anything but religion. The blessed Redeemer of mankind was, without controversy, the most perfect practical religionist the world ever saw. He, while upon our earth, went about, to use the emphatic language of Holy Writ, doing good—went about alleviating the wants and the distresses of the afflicted sons and daughters of humanity. And when the young man came to him, (see Matt. xix :) and inquired what he should do to have eternal life, what he should do in order to participate in the joys of the Gospel, the Saviour did not direct him to go and give his property to the foreign and home missionaries of his day, to those who compassed sea and land to make proselytes; no, his language was, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and give to the poor!" Now had this young convert in Baltimore gone and visited the fatherless and the widows in their afflictions, had he gone and searched out the poor and the afflicted children of poverty and ministered to their wants and necessities, had he furnished them with fuel and clothing to warm their shivering limbs, had he provided them with provisions to nourish their famishing bodies, then would he have been following the example, and practising the precepts of the blessed Jesus—then would he have been exercising pure and undefiled religion before God. But as it is, O how different from, how unlike the religion of Jesus. I know not how others may look upon this transaction, but to me it appears to have been performed more for the purpose of gaining the applause of spiritual money changers, of those who make merchandise of the Gospel of Christ, than the approbation of God. It may be that I am mistaken—I hope that I am. I hope that the young man, although deluded, was sincere. But still I have my doubts. "Every thing that shines is not gold." It may be that this individual has acquired his wealth by any but commendable means. It may be that he has been a speculator, and amassed his thousands by "raising the wind," and "throwing dust" in the eyes of his fellow-creatures, and taking advantage of their credulity. It may be that he has acquired his wealth by grinding the faces of the poor, and devouring the houses of the widows and the orphans; one whose heart has been shut to the cries of the poor and the needy, in their distresses, and now as a sort of salvo to a guilty conscience, and in order to stifle the upbraidings of the monitor within, disposes in this manner of a tithe, a mere fraction of his ill gotten wealth, thinking, probably, that in so doing, he can pass the remainder of his days as a saint of God! "O most lame and impotent conclusion!" I think I can point out scores of individuals who were converted at the great protracted meeting held here, and who were previous to that meeting never suspected of being great admirers of the old adage, "Honesty is the best policy," or of being what some would term the "noblest work of God," who are still to all intents and purposes, notwithstanding their conversion, the same "old sixpences." God grant that the happy period may soon arrive when false and spurious religion shall be made to give place to that which is pure and undefiled before God, and which is full of mercy and good fruits.

BENEVOLENCE OF PARTIALISM.

It has long been the custom of our Partialist brethren, to persuade their hearers if possible, that Deity is their unreconciled and implacable enemy; that he is full of wrath and anger, and hates the children of his creation with a malicious and infinite hatred. Hence it may be said, that it was the malignant and unholy feelings which God was supposed to possess, that induced him to build a dismal hell, in which he might feast his vindictive wrath, and satiate his infinite and unmerciful cruelty, by making them the obedient subjects of demons and damned spirits, world without end.

But at the same time, they would fain make their hearers believe that there is no friend whose love, benevolence, and good will, is so great for their future and eternal welfare, as the very humble servant who is addressing them. Indeed so much greater is their love and disinterested benevolence for the future and eternal salvation of the wayward and wandering prodigal sons and daughters of Adam's race, than the infinite love and unchanging benevolence of the Father of mercies and God of all goodness, that if they only had the power to appease the wrath of God and stay the hand of Omnipotence, not a single soul would be lost.

Now the reader can not fail to see, that the position betrays either a wilful perversion of the character of Deity, or the grossest ignorance and blind stupidity of its advocates. For a moment's reflection will teach every one who is possessed with the powers of reason and a logical understanding, that if Deity is infinite in one, he must of necessity be infinite in all his perfections, consequently his power must be commensurate and co-extensive with his benevolence and love. And vice versa, if Deity fails of being infinite in any thing that is requisite to constitute infinite and universal perfection, then it follows as the legitimate and unavoidable conclusion, that he must be limited in all his attributes; and upon this hypothesis there is no warrantable assurance for the truth of even a partial and limited salvation.

But I apprehend there is nothing to fear from the idea that God is in any way wanting in love and benevolence toward his offspring, or that he will fail to bring about universal holiness and happiness, for want of power sufficient to execute his plans. It is evident therefore, that the great difficulty in the matter, arises from the false and erroneous views which are entertained of the character of God. For instead of viewing God as He is—the benevolent and universal Parent and friend of man—they have been led by the crafty inventions of men to regard him as their implacable and incensed enemy. Hence to remove this difficulty, that the benevolent desires of our Partialist brethren may be granted, and that they may be converted into genuine Universalists, it only remains for us to adduce evidence sufficient to convince them that Deity is possessed of as much love and benevolence for the good and happiness of mankind, as they have themselves, and the work is done.

We deem it unnecessary to eulogise upon the goodness and benevolence of God as displayed in the works of nature, to prove that Deity is infinite in wisdom and goodness, unchanging in benevolence and love, and endlessly Almighty in power. We therefore present the following testimony, which we think is sufficient to satisfy the impartial and unprejudiced reader that God is, and will continue to be as kind and benevolent toward the creatures of his paternal care, as some of his finite and erring children.

We read in Ps. 145: 9 "The Lord is good to all: and his tender mercies are over all his works." In 1 John, iv: 16, we are informed by the Apostle that "God is Love." We leave the reader to judge whether or not our Partialist brethren are practical worshippers of the doctrine of Universalism, especially when left to act entirely from the inherent benevolence of their natural hearts, and whether they would not be theoretically so, were it not for the slavish and contaminating influence of a mercenary creed, which hangs like a blighting incubus upon their moral independence. ## EDITORIAL ITEMS.

AN EARNEST CALL.

All persons indebted to us for more than one year's subscription, (1839,) are requested to pay the amount due us on or before the first day of May next, and so save us the painful and disagreeable necessity of collecting by law, and themselves the costs and vexation of such collections. It was painful to come to this determination, but we can not avoid it—it is our only course—and we therefore earnestly entreat our debtors, by every sentiment of honor, honesty, and generosity, to save us from it, by timely payments. Where circumstances positively forbid payment in full, let a part payment be made with a statement of the facts by the agent, and we will wait a month or two longer for the remainder.

Of the many thousands owing to us, few persons owe more than five dollars each—a very few owe us ten dollars each—small sums to each person individually, but to us, in the aggregate, how large—how important and necessary to defray long standing claims that can not longer be delayed, and which we have no other means of paying! Will not all see, therefore, how easily they may deal justly by us—and how absolutely necessary it is for us to take this course, that we may obtain means to deal justly by others? We hope they will, and seeing it, that they will use their means to save us much pain and trouble, and themselves, disgrace, vexation and costs.

N. B. Agents of this paper will see the necessity of making full returns of collections, and statements of subscriber's circumstances, on or before May 1st, next. May we hope that, by their efforts, the accounts will be so far collected, that there will be no necessity of suing but very few, if any? We wish we could hope so.

UNIVERSALIST COMPANION AND REGISTER FOR 1841.

As the period is near at hand when statistics and other materials must be collected, and orders solicited, for this annual publication, it is proper to notice some changes in its plan rendered necessary by the times, and the alterations that have taken place in this office.

1. The Editor will not attempt to give full and detailed statistics for 1841, except for such regions as were abridged last year, and then only, where they are furnished him without express solicitations. Many friends recommend that attempts to give such full and complete details should be made only at intervals—say, every fifth year. But be this as it may, I wish to give a full list of Conventions and Associations, dates of organization, times of meeting, and Standing Clerks' names and addresses—Periodicals, their locations, terms, &c.—Preachers and Post Office addresses—Schools—and such other most necessary information as should be given in full annually. This, with the lists of new societies, churches, meeting-houses, &c. will render the Register as complete, as my increased duties this season will allow me to make it. Will our brethren whom I addressed last year, please to collect and furnish me with the above, and such other information as they deem necessary, before the first day of May next?

2. I shall be unable to procure the promised tables (exhibiting the passages of Scripture where oleu, aiou, and their derivatives occur in the originals,) for 1841; but am promised a valuable and interesting essay on the usage of aiou by the Scripture and various profane Greek writers, in their stead, and the tables above named, for the year 1842. Will the brethren whom I addressed last year, and such others as will so favor me, please forward me communications for the work, on or before the first of April next? I will allow fifty cents for every page accepted and published in the work. The writers will please designate what disposal to make of their articles, if not wanted for the U. C. and R.—as, in case they do not, I may use them for the Magazine and Advocate.

3. The Universalist Companion and Register will be edited as heretofore, and published for O. Hutchinson, Bookseller, Utica. It will contain 1st, an Almanac for 1841, calculated for Portland, Boston and New York, (or New York, Utica and Cincinnati, according to the section where ordered)—2d, choice doctrinal and practical articles in proof and illustration of Universalism—and 3d, statistics of the denomination in the United States and British Provinces. The entire work will make a pamphlet of 72 pages, neatly stitched and pasted in a printed cover. Prices, 12 cts. single—$1.00 per dozen, and $7.00 per hundred.

4. As many desire that a work should still be printed lower in price, the Almanac and Statistics of the foregoing will be published by themselves, in a separate pamphlet of 36 pages, (filled out with as many articles of the former as can be got into it,) to be entitled "The Universalist Almanac for 1841," and will be afforded at 6 cts. single—50 cts. per dozen, and $3.50 per hundred. But the Companion will not be printed separate from the Register.

** Orders for either or both the above works, should be sent in before the first of May next. The Publisher can not afford to print many more than are ordered, and run the risk of selling them, as times now are; it is therefore hoped, that all who want, will ascertain the number probably needed in their section, and order the full number before the above date.

A. B. G.

P. S. Our Editorial brethren will confer a favor on us by briefly noticing the alterations from our last year's plan, and the call for statistics and orders for the works.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

REMOVALS.—Br. O. H. Quinby, to Bowdoinham, Me. Br. J. F. Dyer of Scituate, to Haverhill, Mass. Br. J. O. Skinner to Framingham, and Br. J. V. Wilson, to Brewster, Mass.

A union house, owned principally by Universalists and freewill Baptists, was dedicated in Wilmot, N. H., on the 6th inst.

Br. E. H. Chapin's Lectures to young men, delivered in Charlestown, Mass., are to be published in book form by Br. Abel Tompkins, in Boston. The work will undoubtedly be interesting and useful—the talents of the author and the importance of his subjects, warrant us in saying this much—it will make a book of 200 pages, which will undoubtedly be well got up, as Br.

Tompkins is "to the fore" in that business—and will be afforded at 50 cts. per copy. We will give the prospectus in our next.

A very large Temperance Convention was lately held in Boston—1,479 delegates present—and resolutions passed favorable to a legislative prohibition of traffic in ardent spirits as a beverage.

Br. Cobb in his paper advocates calling a Universalist Anti-Slavery Convention in Massachusetts. His discussion on the abolition of slavery, with Br. Everett of the Conn. Universalist, (Middletown, Conn.,) seems to get along as slowly as a crab creeps forward!

TO OUR FRIENDS IN AUBURN AND ITS VICINITY,

Who wish to purchase Universalist Books, and to do business with the Advocate. Br. Wm. H. Gibbs, Sexton of the Universalist Church in Auburn, keeps an assortment of Universalist Books for sale. And, as a faithful Agent, will promptly attend to any business for the Advocate, which the subscribers in this place and vicinity may desire. He may be found at the shoe shop next east of General Warden's flouring mill.

Br. G. W. Montgomery is informed that the remittance for B. Winchell has been received.

THE UNIVERSALIST & LADIES' REPOSITORY.

The 9th No. of vol. 8 has been received. It sustains well its high character under the editorial care of Br. Bacon and Miss Edgarton. A. Tompkins, Boston, publisher and proprietor. It is issued monthly, each number handsomely printed, covered, and containing 40 large pages, at $2 per annum, payable in advance. We act as agents for the work. Br. Tompkins would do well to revise his list of agents.

A. B. G.

Br. T. J. S. is requested to exercise his own judgment in relation to the accounts which he mentions in his letter.

Br. Price—Please send T. D. Cook, Utica, Nos. 27 and 35, of the 4th (octavo) vol. of Universalist Union.

INFORMATION WANTED.

My grandson, Velorus Alonzo Osborn Thorp, left the Rev. S. Knapp's, Royalton, Niagara Co., N. Y., on the 16th of November, at sundown—was seen on the towpath east of Reynold's Basin the same night, but has not been heard of since. We appeal to the humanity of all who may see this notice, to aid us in finding him if in their power. He is ten years old, thick set, brown hair, black eyes, pleasant countenance, reads well and is fond of books. Direct information to his widowed mother, Sophronia Thorp, (or to me,) Rochester, N. Y.

NEW BOOKS.

Just received, ROMANCE OF TRAVEL, by N. P. Willis. The Phrenological Almanac for 1840. Also a new supply of Combe's Lectures on Phrenology, by

O. HUTCHINSON.

Br. Whittemore—We have given your prospectus once, and called attention to it two or three times beside. Our room is but small, and we do not wish to fill it with advertisements, as we must do, if we give each prospectus several insertions, and the East keeps sending out so many books! There are Chapin's and Fernald's Lectures, and yours and Br. Adams' books, beside your papers, and our own notions, would fill our last page full. However, we will try and give it one more insertion, though we believe it useless, as all our subscribers have seen it once.

Have you not a neighbor who can and should take a Universalist paper? and who, as well as his family, would be benefited by it far more than the money it would cost him? If so, go to him, and do him, (as well as the cause and some publisher) good, by inducing him to take one.

AN ADDRESS TO THOSE WHO ARE, OR HAVE BEEN, DYSEPTICS.

BY A DYSEPTIC.

In the pages of an author with whom my brethren are, doubtless, intimately acquainted, I find it thus written: "Why should a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sin, (or wrong doing)?" I suspect that this interrogatory mode of expression was adopted as a shrewd way of hinting that men make but a sorry exhibition of themselves, who bring upon themselves any of the punishments which are connected with the infraction of established laws, and then expose their fault by railing at the punishment. This is a foible, which we brethren of the dyspeptic order are very apt to fall into. If we would but scrutinizingly observe the reception which our tales of woe obtain from those kind, sympathizing friends into whose ears we pour them, we would, generally, be persuaded that we are regarded with even less pity than the sufferers from toothache. Behind our backs our kindest friends talk of us, as "spleeny," "notional," etc. Before our faces they can barely refrain from banter and railery. Now is not this intolerable? And had we not better come to the dogged and determined resolution that we shall not whisper one word of our bad feelings, even to our dearest friends? Shall we not all of us, as one man, come to the conclusion of the above quoted author, that we might all of us, be in some better business than complaining?

Before submitting to my brethren a few of the thoughts which have occurred to me relative to a better mode of employing ourselves—a better employment for us dyspeptics than complaining—always complaining, I mean—I may first specify whom I consider my brethren. In the mode of dressing out our thoughts, as in that of adorning our persons, there are fashions. Accordingly about every ten or twenty years the world gives us a new name. At one time and in one part of the world we are called dyspeptics; at another we are nervous. At one time, or in one place we are said to have the hypo; and at another time and in another place we are said to have the spleen. At one time we are said to have the indigestion; at another the liver complaint. Some say we are hypocondriac; others that we are bilious. Some think we are only melancholy; others are more severe and maintain that we have the vapors or the fidgets.

All these are brethren. The different names which have been given us have taken their origin, partly, from the particular symptoms to which we have given a prominent place in our complaints, and partly, from fashion. We are all children, or more properly our complaints, however varied, have all their origin in what may be called a disordered or too easily excited state of the nervous system, or more properly of the ganglionic or organic system of nerves. This is the way in which we have heard physicians talk of the subject; and the reason, they say, why the disease shows itself in so great a variety of forms is, that the feelings and the functions of every part of the body are under the influence of the nervous system, and that the morbid excitability sometimes is more prominent in one part, and sometimes in another. They say it is essentially the same disease which in one or two out of ten, is accompanied with, or shows itself chiefly in irritation, pain, or disordered condition of the digestive organs, and in eight or nine out of ten, shows itself chiefly in mental irritability, in irascibility, in gloominess, in melancholy, in timidity, in irresolution, in despondency, in strange antipathies, disgusts, and eccentricities, etc., etc.

I have inquired of physicians what seemed the causes of such complaints. They seemed to answer evasively, as if afraid that I should take offence at their laying the blame upon such practices as I might foolishly be indulgent to myself in. But this I gathered; that, perhaps, the two principal causes were improprieties or errors in diet; and disordered states of the mental emotions. Under this last head I found they included want of activity of mind, affections directed to low or not sufficiently noble objects, grief, and other depressing passions, vacuity, ennui, etc. Of the influence of the latter they say an attentive observer may, if somewhat scrutinizing and earnest in his observations, very readily satisfy himself. Of the influence of the former, even on the mental manifestations of the disease, almost every man may satisfy himself by observation, or still more readily, by very easily made experiments in his manner of living. For instance, by one physician we were told that if any one who labored under any of the thousand and one symptoms included under the terms, dyspepsia, spleen, etc., were to take food and drink in rather large quantity or of a highly stimulating quality, and continue so doing for a few days, his symptoms would be aggravated, or become changed into some worse form. Again, let the same person make an opposite experiment, reduce the quantity of his food, masticate it more thoroughly, abstain from wine or other stimulating drinks, and from vegetables in any considerable quantity, or of difficult digestion, and continue so to do for some days, the medical profession would generally prophecy to such an experimenter, a mitigation of all his symptoms, whether corporeal or mental.

Well, then, my co-sufferers, if this be the case, it is obvious that we may be better employed than in complaining and getting laughed at for our pains; for we may be usefully engaged in observing what causes make our feelings, symptoms or complaints worse, and what produce mitigation or alleviation. Proceeding earnestly and perseveringly in this course, we may rid ourselves more or less completely of our troubles and our infelicities, and may even be the means of leading some of our brethren into the proper track of useful research and discovery, or of helping them to some of the results of our researches, which may enable them to throw off an immense load of wretchedness, or restore to health, usefulness and happiness, some honorable or useful member of society.

I have been a sufferer in almost every form from a general disturbance of the nervous system, which seemed to be the consequence of an ordinary stomach complaint, which had not long continued until uneasy feelings in the nerves of the stomach and bowels were almost constant companions. After a few years I was less troubled with uneasiness in the digestion of my food or uneasy feelings in the region of my stomach; but instead of this I had great debility or rather sense of weakness, for occasionally I was able to make very considerable exertions, and besides this, I became more irritable or peevish, and the dark side of every thing was always the most readily observed. Now when I can look back on these days of despondency, and compare the unhappiness I then suffered with the buoyancy of spirits I now enjoy, I can feelingly join with Hume, the historian of England, in saying, that I should rather be born to look at the bright side of every subject and occurrence, than to £10,000 a year. Well, at first, I used to tell my complaints to almost every one, and in return, I generally was told of some certain (?) remedy of which I usually made a trial. I also consulted some few doctors, always urging them to prescribe for me a cure; whereas, fool that I was, I should have engaged their skill in enabling me to trace my complaints to their causes, by the removal of which I might have escaped from the consequences. But I had forgotten what I had learned at school—"remove the cause and the consequences cease." At last I got upon the right track, and I found that when my mind was actively engaged and in pursuit of an object which my judgment or my conscience told me was a worthy one—when I restricted myself to plain food and few vegetables, and chewed or masticated all my food well, I escaped much suffering. Persevering in my observations and experiments, I found other little helps to getting better, and some little causes that tended to make my feelings worse, all of which I pressed into the service, and now, I enjoy the fruits of my exertions upon the right plan, in health, cheerfulness, and happiness. The only doctor's book I ever derived any benefit from, was Dr. Smith's on "Divine Government;" and were George Combe a physician, I should add his "Constitution of Man."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XX.

Daniel, 8th chap.—In this chapter we have an account of Daniel's vision of the ram and he-goat. In the interpretation the ram is said to be the king or kingdom of the Medes and Persians. Rams' heads and horns were the ensigns of the Persians. The two horns represent the two kingdoms which were afterwards united, that of the Medes being the most powerful at first, and that of the Persians afterwards. See verse 3. Media and Persia were to the east of Palestine, and they made no conquest in that direction, but in every other. See verse 4.

This he-goat from the West, is said in the interpretation, verse 21, to be the king or kingdom of Greece. An he goat was at this time an emblem of Macedonia. The great horn between its eyes is said to be the first king, or the kingdom in its first state, under Alexander and his immediate successors. His not touching the ground in his motion, denotes the extraordinary rapidity of the Macedonian conquests. See verses 5 and 21.

Alexander after conquering Persia died suddenly in the height of his power, and not long after his generals divided his empire among them. Cassander taking Macedonia and Greece; Lysimachus, Thrace and Asia-Minor; Seleucus, Syria and the east, and Ptolemy, Egypt. See verse 8.

The little horn spoken of verse 9, which waxed exceeding great, was probably the Roman empire. The hosts of heaven, or the stars spoken of, verse 10, represent earthly princes, many of whom fell before the Romans. The prince of the host signifies the Roman power with Titus at its head. See verse 11. In verse 14, a time is fixed for the fulfilment of this prophecy, and it is said to be "Unto two thousand three hundred days," or 2,300 evenings or mornings, or days, so many years; but it is not said from what time they are to be reckoned, so that we can not determine the time, but it was no doubt fulfilled at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and reckoning back from this time it would bring it about to the deluge, as the time from which to reckon the 2,300 days or years.

"LA MARGUERITE."

[To excite a generous emulation among the young ladies under her charge, and to extend to others than the teacher and her pupils, the entertainment of hearing the best compositions of the school, Miss L. M. Barker has instituted a monthly manuscript journal, under the above title (that is, The Daisy,) composed of select articles written by the female students of the Clinton Liberal Institute, which is read to a select circle of their parents, friends, and other invited auditors. It has succeeded well, given much pleasure to the auditors, and led to considerable improvement in compositions. Miss Barker has become a contributor to La Marguerite herself, at the solicitations of her pupils, and in compliance with the request of some friends has been induced to consent to the publication of her contributions, in the belief that they will be useful to many others beside those for whom they were first penned. Their publication will also show to friends abroad, the principles by which she is guided in her intercourse with, and government of her department of the Institute. Right flattered do we feel in having our columns selected as the medium in making this portion of La Marguerite known to our readers; for if the succeeding numbers are equal in merit to the first and second numbers, they will be read with pleasure and profit by our numerous young lady readers. So, not to detain them from the articles any longer, we will close this explanatory preface to the introductory number.

A. B. G.]

DEAR YOUNG LADIES.—When I proposed the plan of this paper, it was my intention to become a regular contributor to its pages. More essential duties have hitherto prevented it. Yet I might perhaps have accomplished this purpose, if in the few hours of leisure I have found to devote to it, I could have decided what subjects, and what style of writing would be most pleasant, as well as most useful; and of course but calculated to increase your interest in "LA MARGUERITE."

There are splendid themes connected with your studies, but beyond the limited range of your text books; themes full of wonder and full of beauty, and I might take advantage of an occasion like the present, to excite in your hearts a deeper love, and a more enthusiastic worship of nature.

Scarcely a day passes, in which I do not wish to communicate oftener and more freely than I do, the emotions and reflections that are called up by the little incidents of our intercourse. It makes me almost sad, at times, that the attention which it is so necessary for us to bestow upon the principles of natural science, should leave us so little opportunity to feel the beauties of sentiment, or study truths in the philosophy of human life. Here, then, I might arrest some of these passing thoughts, and present them to you, embodied in the fascinating form of fiction; or perhaps illustrated by passages in my own life, or in those with whose histories I have been most familiar.

Yet I have not concluded to adopt either course that I have mentioned; and you will wonder, perhaps, that when my professed object is to amuse you, I should adopt the dull and cold preceptive as the medium of my communications. That I am only to give you advice—to write down for you a few general maxims of behavior, in reference to school days and school duties, when those days are passing away with a rapidity which is every week, with some of you, a subject of remark; and those duties must soon give place to others, the more trying nature of which, will require all your energies to prepare for and to perform. Yet, I have not come to my present resolution without the influence of reason; nor, as I beg of you to believe, without a sincere affection for you, and an anxious wish to do you good.

You would think, perhaps, that it was but a common remark, and dictated but by common feeling, were I to wish that you might be happy. Yet into that wish may be thrown all the anxieties of the purest benevolence, and the most intense affection—for the possession of happiness is the highest attainment of which human nature is capable. I do not mean those fleeting pleasures which circumstances may sometimes place within our grasp; but that sunshine of the soul, a single ray of which, not even the obscuring storm, though it may hide its brightness for a time, has power to destroy. I wish, then, young ladies that you may be happy. If I were to give you an object worthy your highest ambition, it would be to make yourselves happy. And if ever in after years, a kind thought should return to me, as to one who had some share in the formation of your characters, let my voice come to you then, as it does now, with the injunction to preserve the simplicity of childhood in your willingness to be taught—to listen even to the united exhortations of nature, philosophy and religion, and learn to be happy.

I write confidently upon this subject; for I believe that the attainment of as much felicity as is permitted us on earth, is in our power; though

I am well aware that few persons realize that amount of enjoyment, which they are both so anxious to possess and so capable of possessing. This great waste of human happiness, is owing more than to any other cause whatever, to the want of settled principles of conduct. There is such diversity of opinion in this world—such conflicts of passion in the heart—so many cross-purposes in the interests of life, and so many misgivings in relation to the way and the ability to act, that our virtues will frequently fail of their accustomed effect; and our happiness will always want a feeling of security, unless the mind be well instructed in duty, and the will firmly resolved to follow its requirements.

That it is our highest honor to have been created for a purpose—that we have consequently something to do—and that happiness as well as usefulness depends on the performance of our duties, are truths which should be taught to the mind in its first periods of thought. But the reverse of this, is too generally true. Children are treated like children in the most imbecile sense of the word. The loveliness and vivacity of young girls subject them to the evils of favoritism. No cares, or very light ones, are laid upon them; moral obligations are kept entirely out of sight; and to be modest, and gentle, and obedient, without ever knowing the reason why, is all that is necessary to be good. Flatteries and false impressions of life meet them upon their first entrance into society; their noblest faculties remain undeveloped, and dreams, and fears, and misapprehensions respecting the true glory of existence, rule in their place. I scarcely wonder at the remark that "most women have no character at all." I do not wonder that there should be even among the most cultivated, so many instances of habitual peevishness or settled melancholy. The native impulses of the heart, generosity, love, kindness, charity, have their exercise, and others are blessed; while the spirit is sinking for the want of that sustaining power, which an early and proper appreciation of the objects of life would have given it.

I have a pledge, young ladies in your good sense and usually correct deportment, that my object will be appreciated. I wish to impress upon you the duties of school girls. I have selected five of those duties, and shall give you my thoughts upon them, separately, in the five succeeding numbers of your paper. I will make them as attractive as my humble powers and limited leisure will allow; and the only thing that I ask of you in relation to them, is, to receive them from me as I give them to you—in love.

MISGUIDED POLICY.

It occurs to me that in presenting to the sinner inducements to abandon his iniquities, he is too often treated as an individual who is totally destitute of every feeling of humanity, and wholly incapable of appreciating the noble, the beautiful, and the pure. He is represented as so abandoned, so depraved, and so pre-doomed, that it is almost arrogance in any one to stoop so far as to attempt to snatch him from the burning gulf over which he is suspended. And if such a thing is attempted it must be by a fellow being whose heart yearns over his deplorable situation. The Omnipotent arm has done all it can for him. God has done all that he can; angels have lifted their last intercession, and the truth exerted its utmost power to subdue the rebel, and all are now steeled against him; but man, benevolent man! will deign to make one more effort—he will dare to roll the thunders of Sinai in his ears, if peradventure he may be aroused from his abandoned situation. To effect this, the most incongruous and unnatural sentiments are thrown together, and the most horrid scenes of the imagination are portrayed, with an expression upon the countenance of the speaker, which is, independent of the sentiment advanced, enough to chill every current of spiritual devotion in the soul. This is a solemn and lamentable truth. The writer has twice gazed upon popular speakers, and listened to their horrid descriptions of hell and damnation, when the principles which they taught, and the scenes which they described, seemed to have so identified themselves with every feeling, and entered into every gesture, and tortured into unnatural haggardness, every feature of the countenance, that he was seriously in doubt whether he beheld in the speaker before him a fiend, or a distorted and repulsive thing in human shape. And in view of such scenes, it is not to be wondered at that young people will indulge in levity at the expense of religion. It is perfectly natural that they should. Take a young and sensitive mind, and introduce it into such scenes, and it will be subjected to such a stupifying and debasing influence that, unless it flees from the enchantment, compels it to resort to levity as its only means of self-defence. This is the reason why so much levity and rudeness is manifested in defiance of the most burning denunciations. And if any thing can sour the mind against a religion of threatnings, it is being obliged to indulge in a levity of which it would afterwards be ashamed, in order to save itself from the curse of madness which it feels drawing around its powers.

But this is not all; such things present an inconsistency which no sound mind can admire; and I never could envy the man who imagines himself to "be born again" under such influences. Look at it.

The preacher goes into the desk. Sinners are before him. They are in a lost and ruined condition. They have become alienated from God and strangers to peace. Perhaps they hate God, Christianity, and the Christian duties. They must be raised from this deplorable condition. To this end they are told of the great God who holdeth the destinies of the immortal mind in his hand; and of the vials of wrath which he will pour out upon the heads of his disobedient children; of the Saviour who has given himself a ransom for them; and of their increased and aggravated damnation if they reject him—increased unspeakably beyond what it would have been if they had never been blessed with a Saviour—of the love of God in creating them, and of the joy of devils in defeating God and securing their allegiance; of the crown of life, and of the smoking torments of the damned ascending up before the throne of God and the Lamb forever and ever!

Suppose now the preacher should appeal to the sinner for his reasons for not yielding to the exhortations he had heard; what would be his defence? Methinks his most natural vindication of himself would be in the inconsistency of the inducement held out to him. He would say "You wish to prevail upon me to adopt your system of religion. You tell me of God, but you mar the perfectness of his character by representing him as pouring his unrestrained wrath upon the heads of those poor helpless children who are dependant upon him for their very existence. I could not do this, bad as I am. You tell me of the Saviour, but you represent him as bringing a curse upon me which I never should have suffered if it had not been for him. You tell me of the love of God, but you drown the voice of mercy with the deafening thunders of the infernal regions—you invite me to drink of the water of salvation, but you have tainted it and poisoned it with the bitter dregs of eternal damnation—you tell me of the crown of life, but you present it to me tarnished by the breath of blasphemy, and corroded and blackened by the smoking torments of immortal souls!" And his defence would be just. Such inducements never made a Christian, however much they might minister to the madness of the brain.

A FALSE ARGUMENT CORRECTED.

"God our Saviour will have all men to be saved, and to come to a knowledge of the truth." Is it urged that Jesus said of the city of Jerusalem, "How often would I have gathered thy children together," etc., "and ye would not"? I answer, that there is a manifest difference between saying, "I would," and "I will"—the very form of expression denotesthat the former is conditional, but the latter is positive—the first is a mere desire, the latter is a determination.—An Inquiry, etc.

The above argument having been proved false and inconclusive by the letter of Inquirer, published week before last, I now proceed, according to promise, to correct it. Both it and the objection to which it replies, are based on false grounds, and are entitled to no weight whatever. The point of argument is the will of God. The objector substitutes Jesus, and shows a text wherein the will of Jesus was defeated. The argument follows the error, and attempts erroneously to prove that the will of Jesus was not defeated, by trying to show that there is a difference in meaning (as well as in time) between would and will. Inquirer having showed conclusively that would is merely the imperfect tense of will, and is therefore the same word in meaning, with difference of time, we are thrown back to the original proposition—the will of God.

Is it argued, then, that Jesus said of the city of Jerusalem, "How often would I have gathered thy children together," etc., "but ye would not"? I answer, that there is a manifest difference made by the Saviour himself, between the will of Jesus and the will of God.—Jesus says, "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me"—and although the Hebraism here used, implies, "not my will only, but also the will of him that sent me"—still it shows that each had a will of his own in the case. Again, Jesus says, in reference to his approaching crucifixion, "nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt"—exhibiting two distinct wills, one of which, after opposition to the other, resigns itself to it. The objection, therefore, is not logical, inasmuch as it substitutes the will of Jesus, for the will of God, and argues that because the former was defeated in a particular case, the latter may be, also, in a general case.

As the subject is interesting, let us pursue it further. In the lecture referred to, I proved, not only that God willed the salvation of all, (1 Tim. ii: 3, 4,) and accordingly gave Jesus all power in heaven and earth—power over all flesh that he might and should save all, (John xvii: 1-3,) but I showed also that this will was not a mere desire, but that it was the good pleasure and purpose of God, (1 Ph. i: 8-10,) solemnly promised by God to be performed, and that that promise was confirmed by the most solemn oath—Gen. xii: 1-3; xviii: 18; xxii: 18; xxiv: 4; xxviii: 14, and Acts iii: 25. See, also, Gal. iii: 8, 16; Isa. xlv: 23-25 and Phil. ii: 9-11. Consequently, there is no room left for the objector to plant an argument on—to suppose that God does not determine to perform his will in this case, or that he will not accomplish what he purposes. It is in vain that the objector quotes passages (if he can find any), in which God declares his will in any given case, where that will is necessarily not performed; for before those passages can be admitted as objections, it must be shown that God, in that given case, also declared it to be his will, according to his good pleasure, purposed in himself—that he has solemnly promised to perform that will, and sworn by himself to the veracity of that promise. Until this can be done, all such passages fail to meet the case—all fall far short of strength to overturn the evidence I have adduced to show, that the will of God to save all men, will positively take place. In short, an array of passages similar to those I adduced, and as full and as strong, must be quoted, in which God's will has been defeated, his good pleasure disappointed, his purpose frustrated, his promise broken, and his most solemn and oft repeated OATH VIOLATED, before the testimony in favor of universal salvation can be (not disproved, but merely) balanced—held in equilibrium—like a pair of well regulated scales with a pound weight in each scale! It does appear to me, therefore, that the chain of argument laid down in that lecture, can not be met fairly, and set aside, by any testimony which the ingenuity of man can bring from the Bible. "To the law and the testimony," then—"if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

But the Partialist may say, "that as sinners continue to remain in unbelief, so God will not, because of their wills, choose to save them." The objection is weightless. In all the passages quoted to prove God's will, pleasure, purpose and promise, not only is no reference made to human wills as supreme, but no reference whatever is made to them even as opposing God's purpose. All God's promises in relation to the grand result of his plan of salvation, make no reference to man's will, as an impediment or preventive. He promised to send Jesus as a Saviour. The people to whom he came did not will his coming—did not will his mission as he presented and performed it—did not will his dying in the sense in, and for the purpose for, which he did die—did not will his resurrection, his ascension, his sending forth his apostles to preach, and his present reign in the moral dominion of God, and yet Jesus came, lived, taught, died, rose, ascended, sent out his messengers, and now rules on the throne of judgment in the earth, for them, notwithstanding their wills to the contrary—and yet his very murderers were saved in consequence of the very acts taking place, which they willed should not take place! See Acts iii: 12-26.

The truth is, the successful opposition of the human will to the divine will is only apparent—but the triumph of the divine over the human will, is real. And so the Scriptures represent it. They speak of man's disobeying God, as if that obedience frustrated the design of God for the time being—but they speak of God as reigning supreme and triumphant over all opposition, in the end. And so it is. God has a great will which embraces all things—the end from the beginning. As a means to effect and accomplish that will, he issues commands, making known his pleasure. Man often resists, opposes and violates these commands; but does not annul them. They return again, and again, and yet again, and though violated by some, each time, yet each time they effect a portion of the great purpose they were promulgated to effect. Even their violation by one man, often operates to bring another to obedience. Yes, frequently the violation of them, by an individual, at one period, is the very thing that brings him to yield the more hearty, willing, and steadfast obedience to them at a subsequent time. And all this is effected, "not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit," saith the Lord of Hosts—all is effected without a forcing of human freedom—without violating the laws of mind—without destroying the freedom of man's will, but in perfect accordance with those laws of mind and that freedom of will. We may say God's commands are broken—we may even say that, humanly speaking, God's will is temporarily resisted, so far as his great will is embodied in that command; but as that command is a mere index to what God wills as the final state of things, we can not philosophically, and in the highest sense, say that God's will has been frustrated; for it will, in due time, be fulfilled and accomplished, as he has promised on oath. The command is a present index of his final purpose, and a means to accomplish it—but his will is his final, endless purpose itself. And, as plainly as Scripture, compared with and explained by Scripture, can point out this great will—this final and endless purpose of God—it is declared to be the universal holiness and happiness of mankind. And with this purpose, the means for its accomplishment beautifully harmonize; for the commands of God are, Be holy—love God supremely and mankind universally. And the penalties of these commands, to agree with them, and with the end they were designed to accomplish, must tend to lead men to obey (and not to violate) these commandments or laws of God. If so, (and so reason and revelation teach,) then truly did Jesus declare, "Heaven and earth may pass away, but not one jot or tittle shall pass from the law until it is fulfilled." It will be fulfilled when obeyed by all to whom it is given, and then God's will will be done—all men will be saved from sin and misery.

EFFECT OF SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

Phrenology, by demonstrating that the mind, with all its affections and sentiments, acts by material organs has shown us how any overstrong propensity may be weakened, or any overweak one, strengthened—even by withdrawing the one from activity and exercise, and by exercising the other. This fact should be immediately applied to the treatment of criminals in our penitentiaries, by a judicious alteration of our criminal code, and the appointment of men as keepers and teachers, who will govern and instruct the convicts according to Christian and phrenological principles. The folly of punishing all men alike, as if all possessed the same character and disposition; and for an arbitrary period, as if all required the same duration to effect a cure of their vicious propensities; and then dismissing the uncured criminal, knowing that he only goes forth to renew his crimes, and to be again sent back for a prescribed period—all this, it appears to me, must be evident folly to every person who has studied the human mind with reference to the causes and cure of crime.—And the adoption of the solitary system without labor—the solitary system with labor—the congregating but silent system with labor—and of the old social systems, by the States respectively, and each State attempting to reform all its criminals by the self same operation of one of these systems, must ever fail in being as efficient as the employment of either, or all of them united, according to the character and moral necessities of the criminal. The employment of one only system by each State, to which every criminal must alike be subjected, (as if all criminals were blocks of wood, of the same size and shape, and cut out of the same tree, to be turned into posts of the same pattern,) is equalled in absurdity only by the "mill horse round" of studies prescribed in our colleges and universities—where each student, whatever his mental character, physical ability, or destination in life, is required to read the same authors and study the same sciences for the same prescribed period of time! Thank God, that the Clinton Liberal Institute prescribes no such absurdities, and ardently do we pray for the time when Phrenology, coming to the aid of common sense, shall put it to flight in all our seminaries of learning—when the human mind shall be treated no longer as a white sheet of paper, but as possessing characteristic and determinate inclinations and tendencies. But I digress—to return to the subject of this article.

The following article I cut out of the Philadelphia United States Gazette, some time ago, and laid it by till room could be found for it in our columns. A later number of the same paper contained a denial of its statements, so far as the health of the criminals is concerned; but as that denial does not affect the portions most valuable for my present purpose, I give Dr. Coleman's statement in full, with this notice of the denial—premising, that said denial confirms Dr. C.'s statement of the childlike amusements of the prisoners.

The use I would make of Dr. Coleman's Report, is this. Solitary confinement withdraws from exercise, those organs of the mind which, from a too great excitement or development in society, led him into crime.—Indeed, nearly the whole of the organs are thus forced into a state of quietude, if not of desuetude. But by a judicious course of instruction during an after stage of the confinement, the organs which always needed development, might be brought into activity and so be strengthened. I would therefore resort to entire solitary confinement without labor, (for labor excites combativeness and destructiveness in most cases,) as the punishment of ferocious, hardened criminals. It should be continued until their minds became softened and more child-like. Then mental and moral training should commence with careful reference to the peculiar character of the criminal, and a careful and frequent notice of its effects upon him. As he yields to these influences, labor might be furnished to him—books—writing materials—and, at last, society. For a man deprived of intercourse with society, for years, and then suddenly thrown into the world, would be as intoxicated by it, and as susceptible to its temptations, snares and trials, as a child! I would, therefore, gradually restore the criminal to an increasingly free intercourse with society, to develop and regulate his social feelings, and prepare him for a re-entrance on to the busy stage of life from which the strong arm of the law had wisely withdrawn him. And never would I have him restored to the world, until a sufficient course of trial had proved him cured of his moral perversities and maladies.

The less hardened or less violent criminal, might, of course, have labor furnished him at his first entrance—and the more venial or youthful offender, might be entered at once on a proper course of instruction. A great portion of this course of instruction, in all cases, should treat of the obligations of man to society, and to the State—the reasons for laws and their requirements—the causes, nature, operations, and objects of punishments, (including moral, physical, social and legal penalties, and demonstrating that they all had their origin in benevolence, and are designed to benefit the punished)—and of the nature of rewards, to the same extent, showing that, in no case, is right doing injurious, or ill doing beneficial to the actor, all things considered.

These are very brief and desultory hints—too brief, perhaps, to explain fully my views, but ample as my room will now permit. In no case would I make punishment vindictive, or an end—but benevolent, and a means. Nor would I have it arbitrary, but would vary it as the necessities of the case required, and continue it as long as, and no longer than, it is needed. Now read Dr. Coleman's Report. A. B. G.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

A late number of the Trenton State Gazette contains a very interesting report from Dr. James B. Coleman, Physician of the New-Jersey State Prison, upon the effect of solitary confinement on prisoners during the last year.

After the opening paragraph, Dr. C. says:

In the last report, it was stated that there is a tendency among the convicts to glandular obstructions; that sunlight and air are indispensable to their health; that post mortem examinations had revealed a condition of the organs corroborative of the effect that might have been anticipated; and further, that every year of a prisoner's confinement in the cell, will show a decline of his physical powers. The experience of the year now ended has confirmed what was then reported, as well as what was anticipated. In this region, the past year has been one of almost unprecedented health, and no disease has prevailed within the prison that may not be expected during the most favored seasons. It has been the best opportunity to observe the sole influence of solitary confinement upon the health of the prisoners. The enervating influence that has been felt during the time, is what will ever be experienced; it is a part of the punishment that attaches to it, and ought to be considered in the term of sentence.

There are some among the convicts who came from the old prison. While there, they were in strong health, and for the first two years in this penitentiary complained but little; now they have become debilitated, are languid, and exhibit decided symptoms of a decline of their physical powers. Some pains have been taken to inquire into these changes, and from the information of the prisoners themselves, as well as from their visible condition, it is conclusive that confinement in cells is not as conducive to health as that imprisonment which admits more air and sun-light to the convict.

Another subject for observation, and which has not usually been assigned to the physician, is the intellectual state of the prisoners. This properly falls within his province. When the mind becomes sensibly disordered, he is called upon to restore the wandering faculties, and in every stage of obvious mental aberration, from the vacant stare of the idiot to the phrensy of the maniac, his science is looked to for aid. It is not to these extreme cases—points conspicuous by their deformity—that medical observation ought to be confined. It is the forming stage, the first weakening of those powers which hold the mind in a state of sanity, that he must detect. He must, from the derangement of the bodily organs, notice the encroachments of mental disease, and gather from appearances that are unnoticed by others, his prognostics. In the prison he will see minds that, subject to the common perceptions of out-of-door life, would be as astute as others, indulge in the amusements of the child, wasting their time after their daily task is over, upon toys; from all that can be perceived, engaged in no thought that is not immediately associated with the things around them; incapable of abstract reflection, or, if showing any evidences of this higher operation of the faculties, it is more the wandering of the visionary than the operation of a well-balanced mind. Thus situated with respect to the prisoners, it would be but an imperfect report of the medical attendant if he did not make known to you this, the most important part of his observations.

[The doctor then refers to the cases of insanity, some of which had evidently commenced when the prisoner was brought to the place. Nearly every case occurring in the prison is, by Dr. C., referred to the same cause which is mentioned by Dr. Darragh, as promoting insanity in the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania.—The report then continues.]

Among the prisoners there are many who exhibit a child-like simplicity, which shows them to be less acute than when they entered. In all who have been more than a year in the prison, some of these effects have been observed. Continue the confinement for a longer time, and give them no other exercise of the mental faculties than this kind of imprisonment affords, and the most accomplished rogue will lose his capacity for pre-dating with success upon the community. The same influence that injures the other organs will soften the brain. Withhold its proper exercise, and as surely as the bandaged limb loses its power, will the prisoner's faculties be weakened by solitary confinement. And here it may not be improper to hint at the treatment that ought to be extended to the prisoners. Now they are managed under the most favorable circumstances the nature of their confinement admits. Every privilege the law allows is given them. Kind usage, religious and moral instruction, every thing that is calculated to exercise their minds in the way of reformation and improvement is practiced or imparted to them. If their minds be weakened by confinement, the sentiments most exercised under the present discipline, and which will be most likely to remain with them when they depart from the prison, are of a better character, that will tend to make them better citizens. Were another course pursued in this institution, and the superintendent possessed of no sympathy for the convict, nor desire for his reformation, feeling satisfied that if he tasked him to the full amount of his ability to labor, and gave him food at the appointed times, in less than a year the New-Jersey Penitentiary would be a bedlam.

[Dr. Coleman then refers to the cases of sickness from want of early fires.

The following paragraph is worthy of notice:—]

The opinion expressed in the last report, that the cells on the north exposure of the ranges were the least healthy, has been strengthened by this year's observation. So plain is the difference, that it has become the practice to remove sick persons to the south side for the benefit of the greater degree of sun-light that is received into them.

[Persons disposed to consumption seem almost certain to die in the prison. The report continues:—]

The greater number of cases on the list are those forms of debility that depend on glandular obstructions, and seem peculiar to prisons. They do not threaten immediate death, but rather a gradual destruction of health. In a word, the convicts generally are as healthy as under the most favorable circumstances we might expect to find persons in their situation.

These observations, gentlemen, have been made with no predilection for any kind of prison discipline. If there be more disease in solitary confinement, it is of a peculiar character, slow in its work upon the system, and important in its effects upon the mind. It is for others to determine whether the old discipline, hardening the vicious in their crimes, while it preserves the body in its full vigor, so that, at the expiration of the sentence, the convict may go forth a more accomplished rogue than he entered the prison, is to be preferred to another which, while it subdues the evil passions, almost paralyzing them for want of exercise, leaves the individual, if still a rogue, one who may be easily detected.

Your obedient servant, JAMES B. COLEMAN.

BE CAREFUL

To give the name of the post office, as well as that of the subscriber, in business letters and notices. Postmasters and others sometimes send back papers, ordering them discontinued; but no post office is named, and having several subscribers of the same name on our books, we can not tell which one is meant. Indeed, in some cases we are ordered to discontinue a paper which contains neither the name of the subscriber or the post office. What can such Postmasters mean? Are they so unacquainted with their duty? Do they not know, that the law requires a full notice, written or printed, with reasons if known; and that if they do not give such notice, they (the Postmasters) are liable for the pay of the papers? It is even so, as they may see by looking at the law. A. B. G.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

I intended noticing the following in due time, but Br. Everett, of the Connecticut Universalist, has been before hand in the matter. Mrs. Miner was, for several years, a resident of Marietta, Pa., during my residence there, and after I had left. She is eminently qualified to be the guardian of young ladies, for whom her boarding house is intended—and as such I can cordially recommend her to those friends who wish to place their daughters or female wards in the Clinton Liberal Institute. A. B. G.

A WORD COMMENDATORY.

We learn by a letter just received from Hon. Noyes Darling, of New Haven, that our sister in the Abrahamic Faith, Mrs. Harriet S. Miner, of that city, contemplates removing to Clinton, Oneida Co., N. Y., with the view of opening a boarding-house for the accommodation of the pupils at the Liberal Institute. In addition to her two interesting children, a son and daughter, she will take on with her, the two daughters of Judge Darling, and would take charge of any others entrusted to her care. Her terms, we are authorized to say, will be moderate, and her attention to their wants, we are sure, would well supply the place of a parent's watchfulness. Mrs. Miner is highly deserving of the respect and confidence of a liberal public; and we trust that she will be favored with the kind attentions of our friends at Clinton. Mrs. Darling will accompany her there in May next; and this will afford an excellent opportunity for our friends in this region to send their children to that truly liberal and very popular Institution.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SABBATH MORNING.

"How calm and serene are all things around me. Worshipping mortals are bending before the altar, and the men of God are calling down from on high the blessings of Omnipotence. 'Nations are hymning his praise.' Princes are lifting up their voices, and kings are bending the knee on a level with the subject. 'On the solitary ocean, the mariner's prayer is heard amidst the dashing of the wave,' and yet thousands of sinners remain silent—even when the Saviour of the world is waiting to hear their confessions of penitence and their songs of deliverance."

From the slumbers of night all nature is waking,
And calm and serene now are all things around,
From hill, vale and forest, sweet music is breaking—
'Tis nature's devotion, how thrilling the sound.

Round love's flaming altar, now mortals are bending,
And worshipping millions their offerings bring;
The incense of praise and thanksgiving, ascending
From the shrine of the heart, up to Heaven's high King.

'Mid the surges and waves of the dark rolling ocean,
Where deep unto deep lifts its voice even there,
From the sailor's lone bark the song of devotion
Glides soft o'er the wave—'tis the mariner's prayer.

The high and the low are together uniting—
Their voices in concert, in harmony blend;
The heralds of Jesus are gently inviting
The wanderer home to his Father and Friend.

Still thousands are groping in darkness and error,
Far, far from the Saviour all silent remain,
Enthralld in the bondage of sin and of terror,
Of anguish, and doubting, and sorrow, and pain.

Yet to such are the arms of the Saviour extended,
His powerful love must all conquering prove;
'Till sin and transgression forever are ended,
And all shall rejoice in his ransoming love.

Roll on, happy era, when God shall deliver
All kindred and nations from bondage and thrall,
And wash their robes white in "Salvation's broad river,"
And infinite Goodness be crowned "all in all."

SKETCHES FROM THE LOG OF OLD IRON-SIDES.

Your glorious standard launch again,
To meet another foe!—Camp.

BEARDING THE BEY.

In May, 1805, Commodore Barron returned to the United States in ill health, leaving Commodore Rogers in the Mediterranean, in command of the largest American squadron ever known.

Commodore Rogers immediately hoisted his flag on board of the Constitution, and shortly afterwards, as the echo of the evening gun at Valetta died along the shores of Malta, the fleet got under weigh, and stood over towards the African coast. It was on the eighth day after their departure when the squadron made Cape Carthage, and the ninth, at sunrise, anchored in the roads of Goletta. Before the gallant frigates lay the city of Tunis, the abode of happiness, and the fountain spring of jackasses and orange water. The signal for the consul to come on board was immediately made, and on the following day he repaired on board the Constitution, and gave the Commodore a detailed account of his fruitless conferences with Hamouda Bey. A council of war was then called, at which Col. Lear, the consul general, assisted, which resulted in the determination to bombard the town in the course of thirty-six hours, if a favorable answer was not returned to Com. Rogers' letter demanding satisfaction.

Previous to the arrival of the squadron, the Bey had called the American consul to his presence, and, before the assembled divan, demanded the release of a Tunisian Xebec and her two prizes, which had been captured by the Constitution for attempting to violate the blockade of Tripoli. The consul assured him that they would not be released, and the Bey, with a frown, threatened a declaration of war. He accordingly wrote a letter to Commodore Rogers, and, in answer, received a visit from his fleet before stated. The Bey, up to the very day of the appearance of the squadron, had assumed a lofty tone of menace, and while his guards surrounded the consul with their drawn scimitars and slackened bowstrings, addressed him as follows:

"Ask any of the Christian consuls in this regency, if Hamouda Bashaw has ever received such an insult from their government? The President of the United States must know that my father and grandfather have sat on the throne and ruled a kingdom. He shall learn from me that Hamouda is not yet dead; and every crowned head in Europe shall approve the eternal continuance of that war which you seem resolved to force me into—for I solemnly pledge myself, that if war is the result, never, while I have a soldier to fire a gun, will I accord peace. You may form some idea of my character from the difficulty you had to negotiate a peace, because you weakly permitted the Dey of Algiers to interfere. You may also learn my conduct to the Venetians, who rashly forced me into a war; and if I am doomed to engage in another, it shall be continued to the last hour of my existence. I frankly tell you that the famine in my country has prevented my declaring war against you, in order that I might convince my subjects that their miseries should not be increased, unless I was forced thereto. Without such a motive, you certainly never would have been asked the reason why you captured my vessels; but that just motive to a protection of our difficulties must be sacrificed to those considerations which I owe myself and all Europe. You are the first power which has ever captured a Tunisian cruiser in full peace, on any pretext whatever. You are the first that has ever offered unprovoked insults to Hamouda Bashaw, who has ruled a kingdom for twenty-seven years, and been respected by all the world as a sovereign. If I were tamely to submit to such acts of outrage, what should I expect from nations far more powerful than yourselves? You have seen what has been accorded me by Spain, Sweden, and Denmark, whose local situation and maritime force render them more formidable enemies than the United States. Abstracted from this, the measures pursued are such as do not permit me to enter into any negotiation. Your admirals have done me great and repeated injuries, for the last of which my political existence forces me to insist on a proper reparation."

At this moment a heavy cannon awoke the echoes of the palace, and, breathless with running, a Janizary entered the presence chamber.

"Ha, Selim," said the Bey, his curiosity getting the better of his dignity, "comes there a war ship from Samboul?"

"Nay, most illustrious and magnificent prince, the Christian dogs have entered the abode of happiness."

"By my grandfather's beard," said the Bey—for he could swear like a Christian—"come they with a single frigate to beard Hamouda? let them retreat in time.—Consul! go to your admiral, and bid him not let the morning sun shine upon him by the 'garden of the world,' or his head shall answer for his temerity."

At this moment, another Janizary came with the astounding news that the largest fleet ever before Tunis had anchored in the harbor, and that the signal for the "consul Americana" fluttered at the fore of the admiral. Hamouda Bey lost his tone of defiance in a moment:—"Consul," said he, "remember me kindly to your admiral;" and clapping his hands broke up the divan.

The next morning, Captain Decatur was directed by the Commodore to proceed to Tunis and co-operate with the consul in obtaining from the Bey an unequivocal, satisfactory guarantee for the faithful observance of peace. The Bey still excited, refused to receive the captain, who, in his usual spirited manner, "refused visiting him on any other terms," and left Tunis to return to the squadron, and report the result of his mission. As soon as the Bey heard of his departure, he manifested great concern. His royal breast appeared to be panic struck, and he despatched a messenger with a conciliatory letter with such expedition that it "was received on board the Constitution before Captain Decatur came alongside."

The next day a treaty was concluded between the Most Magnificent Prince and the United States; and the Congress having received on board a Tunisian ambassador, the Constitution, followed by the squadron, got under weigh, and stood out of the harbor.

As they passed the island of Goletta, the old frigate caught a glimpse of the American flag floating proudly in the breeze, and hoisted an ensign at the fore—then, as if by one simultaneous impulse, the starspangled banner ascended to the fore of every vessel in the squadron, and upwards of two hundred cannon woke their thunder notes, while two thousand five hundred men raised the loud huzza.

A faint echo came back upon the dying land breeze, and the "abode of happiness" was lost from view.

LESSON IN GRAMMAR.—Where the seats in a school-house are so high, that the children can not reach the floor with their feet, and so narrow that they have to hold on with both hands, then the verb "to sit," must be an active verb.

CONVERSATION WITH STRANGERS.—The late Mr. Roberts, of Llanbrynnair, was remarkably useful by his religious conversation with individuals. He was led to the formation of so important a habit by a little incident which occurred in the early part of his ministry. Asking a little child the direction to a person he was to visit, he was informed it was her mother, and was led by her to the spot. He was afterwards told that the mother said to the child, 'You had the honor of walking with a minister of Jesus Christ.' 'No mother,' said the child, 'I am sure it was not a minister, for he never spake to me a word about Jesus Christ.'

MARRIAGES.

In Oxford, January 1st, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. ORRIN WHEELER, of Greene, to Miss MARY ANN HOLLENBECK, of Oxford. In Bainbridge, January 8th, by the same, Mr. THOMAS A. HUMPHREY, to Miss MARY ANN NEWELL, both of Bainbridge. In Bainbridge, January 9th, by the same, Mr. ROBERT CORBIN, to Miss ELIZA C. HUMPHREY, daughter of James Humphrey, Esq., all of that place. In Smithville, January 22d, by the same, Mr. THURSTON WILCOX, Jr., to Miss LYDIA KNICKERBOCKER, both of that place. In same place, February 13th, by the same, Mr. JOHN ADAMS, of Oxford, to Mrs. ELIZABETH BARTLE, of Smithville.

In Middlefield center, January 8th, by Rev. Job Potter, Mr. DELOS M. WOOD, of Cooperstown, to Miss REXA VILLE TODD, of the former place. In Burlington, January 29th, by the same, Mr. GEORGE H. THOMAS, of Exeter, to Miss PHEBE L. BURCH, of Burlington. In Otsego, February 2d, by the same, Mr. WM. GATES, of Unadilla, to Miss JANE BAILEY, of Otsego. In Sharon, February 9th, by the same, Mr. L. I. SWIFT, to Miss ——— LA GRANGE, both of Sharon. Also, in Cooperstown, February 13th, by the same, Mr. IRA BURK, of Middlefield, to Miss LUCY ANN PRATT, of Milford.

In Wethersfield, Genesee county, February 12th, by Rev. W. E. Manley, Mr. JACOB S. HERRICK, to Miss S. S. CHARLES, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In the town of Oxford, October 2d, Mr. PHILIP WILCOX, aged 26 years. Some months previous to his decease, while laboring in a barn, he fell from the upper part to the floor, which so injured him as to make him nearly helpless. He slowly and gradually declined, surviving an almost incredible period. Some years since he embraced the doctrine of the Resurrection, which he adorned by a well ordered life. Br. Doolittle was the first person he ever heard publicly promulgate this glorious system, and to him he was much attached. During his last illness he sent for him and requested him to attend his funeral, but unexpectedly he died, and Br. D. had removed to Ohio.

By his request, I several times visited and prayed with him, and he invariably testified to the sustaining power of his faith and his glorious hope of immortality, declaring that he had not a doubt of his own salvation, nor of the happiness of the whole vast family of man beyond the grave, and that could he believe it possible that even one of his fellow-beings was journeying to an eternity of woe, it would rob him of all his comfort in his painful and protracted illness, and render truly awful the hour of death.

He was surrounded by kind parents, brothers and sisters, and her who had agreed for life to share his joys and sorrows, and all had been bright and beautiful before him in the pathway of being. Still he was not only willing, but anxious to depart and be with Christ, where pleasures immortal reign. His words and deeds were well calculated to cheer him to his relatives and friends, and all with whom he had intercourse—and his holy calmness and resignation often led me involuntarily to exclaim, "Let me be like him, and die the death of the righteous, that my last day may be like his." In youth he uniformly abstained from those amusements in which the young so generally indulge, and he was sober and reflecting, correct in his habits and pure in his actions. And those with whom he was best acquainted and nearest connected, though some of them are of a different faith, testify to his deep and fervent piety.

And yet Elder I. S. Swan, of Connecticut-story-telling notoriety, with a destitution of truth and veracity, and of the common feelings of humanity, which with him is by no means uncommon, stated before his death, in a sermon delivered four miles from this place, in the presence of at least one of his relatives, that he was perfectly insensible to any thing of a religious nature, and that his soul was then in hell with devils. True, he did not mention his name, but his allusion to the awful and fatal error of Universalism, which this young man had embraced, and to a conversation he once held with him, and other circumstances which were applicable to no other individual, made it certain that he was the person so wantonly and wickedly assailed by this malignant persecutor and common slanderer.

Opposers who visited Mr. W. on his death bed, made every exertion in their power to force him to renounce his faith, and it was boastfully said that if they could succeed they would ruin the Universalist society in Oxford. But it was all in vain—and this accounts for the frantic ravings of Elder S. towards all who will not in full subscribe to his pernicious doctrines and proscriptive measures.

The funeral of Br. W. was attended at the Universalist meeting-house in this village, October 3d, and a discourse was delivered by the writer, to one of the largest congregations ever convened in this place. J. T. G.

WHY DO THOSE WHO CALL THEMSELVES CHRISTIANS LOVE EACH OTHER SO LITTLE?

Let us make the supposition that our world was visited by some inhabitant of a distant planet, or of another sphere. Having taken a general survey of our globe, we will suppose that he has become peculiarly interested in making himself acquainted with man—the chief of God's creation here.* We will suppose him to be tracing down the history of our race, from the earliest periods to the Christian era. Here we will suppose him to pause, and without any acquaintance with the after records of ecclesiastical history, or with the present state and sentiments of those who assume or receive the name of Christ's disciples and adherents, we will suppose him to be indulging joyous conjectures of the very momentous ameliorations of man's condition to which this interposition of Heaven is to give origin.—In his review of man's history, this stranger must have been astonished at the all-pervading selfishness, the want of affection, the malice, the envy, which have been so frequently presented to his view. Such mournful exhibitions, he trusts, he will no longer be disgusted with, at least, among those who have heard the glad tidings of great joy. Among these he will expect to find, in some measure, not only an expansive good will to all their brethren of the human family, but especially a kindly affection, a brotherly love towards each other. They have received the knowledge of a common Father, in the adoration of whose excellence, and in gratitude for whose loving kindness they all unite; they have a common Saviour and Pattern, who, by the strength of principles which they are endeavoring to imbibe, has overcome the world and its corrupt practices, and whose example they are essaying to imitate; and they are engaged in a common cause, under a common Master, and their Supreme devotion of themselves to the promotion of this cause must unite them, as a band of brothers, in the closest ties of sympathy, affection and esteem. By loving one another, our visitor would expect that Christ's disciples would be known unto all men, easily recognized by their mutual and cordial affection.

With such anticipations would our visitor turn to consult the history of the Christian church.—With joyous heart would he find, on the first page of that history, confirmation of his conjectures. He would there read that the whole multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and of one soul, and had all things common.—But from that page down to the one on which the events and spirit of the present age of the church are to be ascribed, how seldom would any similar record be found! How much more frequently would he find divisions, contentions, disputations, hostilities, malign aspersions, and even persecutions unto death, among those who ought to have been the kindest, the most affectionate, the most united of brethren. Upon our visitor, as upon ourselves, the question would often intrude itself in view of the past and present condition of the Christian church—Why and whence is all this discord, this jealousy, this enmity, this uncharitableness, and above all, this deadly hatred, among brethren? This, too, is an inquiry personally interesting to every individual who is, or would be called, a Christian; for unless he is well assured that no diminution of Christian affection is caused in him, in any case, by a difference of opinion between himself and another whom he has no cause to consider not a Christian—unless conscious of entire freedom from this "root of bitterness"—he is suffering from, and must lament, his deficiency in the most distinguishing characteristic of genuine, or at least, of advanced Christians. As a body are we free from a sectarian, intolerant spirit? As individuals are we free?—If not, let us trace our imperfection to its source.

As this is intended for a short article—a quality in great esteem with Br. Grosh—the result of our investigations must be briefly and concisely stated, else we shall fall into disrepute with said Br., as a tedious or perhaps interminable proser.

There are certain truths, propositions, and articles of belief which all the sects professing adherence to the Christian faith agree in recognizing. These articles in which all agree are generally admitted, too, to be of much higher importance, than those in relation to which there is a difference of opinion. The points in which they differ are generally or universally admitted to be of minor importance. Yet in seeming contradiction of this admitted distinction between the points in which there is union, and those in which there is difference of opinion, it is from this difference in minor matters that there has sprung, and that there yet springs, all the alienation which separates the friends of Christianity. The repulsive power of a few minute differences of opinion are more powerful than the attractive and uniting forces of many and important sentiments held in common!

Is it possible that the trivial nature—comparatively—of the subjects of these "doubtful disputations" can be really felt by those who allow difference of opinion upon them to kindle up in their hearts flames of animosity and discord?—In words they allow the far superior importance of those matters in relation to which all Christians are agreed; but in deeds this admission seems to be denied. Perhaps this is one frequent cause of disaffection among the professed friends of Christianity—that peculiarities of opinion, or rather those subjects upon which peculiarities exist, are felt, for the time, at least, to be of more importance than righteousness, purity, and all the weightier passages of the law—they are allowed to engross the whole attention, while the characteristic features of Christianity are neglected, or deprived of their due share of attention and affection. The cure for the alienation which we are deploring and investigating, so far as it depends on this cause, is obviously to give more of our affections and exertions to the promotion of the best interests of our common faith; for example, of the love of God—deep-felt and enlightened; of virtuous principle conquering temptations and propensities to evil. Many other such interests might be named, but perhaps we can not do better than to give the following extract from a sermon delivered in Madison, Ia., by Rev. Andrew Wylie, D. D., President of Indiana College.

"It would greatly tend to promote the purity as well as the peace of the church, if her public teachers in all the different denominations should, as with one consent, avoid the points of sectarian peculiarity, and, both in their public ministrations, and private intercourse among their people, insist more than any of them do, on the great matters of personal piety, and social duty. The religion of Christ is eminently practical. Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say? Nothing is revealed to us in the Bible to be believed: Every thing is in order to practice. And it is worthy of observation, that wherever the spirit and power of true piety prevail, there is no disposition to indulge in sectarian disputes, or to magnify sectarian differences, or to cherish sectarian feelings. The convinced sinner, whose mind is absorbed in the question, 'what shall I do to be saved?' and the experienced Christian fighting the good fight of faith, or dying in the triumph of hope, turn away in disgust from these speculations, which inflame the passions of the sectarian zealot. The active philanthropist regards them not. It is the idle mind that seeks to amuse itself in vain speculation, and empty theory."

Again; many subjects of angry dispute have been adhered to with tenacity, because it was felt as a wound and an insult to the disputant's self-importance to question his orthodoxy, or rather his supposed infallibility of opinion. Much difference of opinion has existed, not on account of the influence which might be exerted on character and conduct, but solely because fancied infallibility, and stilted pride would not admit the possibility of their being wrong. All charitableness of feeling, all kindness of disposition, have been sacrificed on the altar of pride of understanding. A candid survey of the errors of otherwise great minds, and a retrospect of the now perceived errors and follies which we once held as truth and as wisdom, might do much to eradicate this source of religious as well as political intolerance, and party-spirit.

Lastly: the chief power and strength of differences of opinion in originating divisions and disaffection among the friends of Christianity, consists in the predominance of the malign over the benign emotions of our nature. How much more prone are we all, or at least, have we all been, to slander than to candor, to believe an evil than a good report. Our malign affections are like weeds of spontaneous growth and difficult to be eradicated; while the benign are like tender plants, needing incessant care and much labor from man, and in addition the influences of light and heat from Heaven. Every exercise of benevolence, and every repression of an unkindly spirit, is something, therefore, towards the extirpation of this source of Christian disunion.—Every time we abstain from withholding from one who differs from us in opinion, some act of justice, some defence in his absence, some kindness or some sympathy, we are checking the growth of the malign, and adding vigor to the benevolent portions of our nature. Contemplation, love, and imitation of the impartial kindness of our heavenly Father, is the best aid we have in the cultivation of Christian benevolence or charity, without which, in some degree, our faith is vain, and we are yet in our sins.

It is our fervent desire that these remarks, and the thoughts they may give rise to, may aid and stimulate us, individually and collectively, to strive after the distinction of the early Christians; "See how they love one another."

ELOQUENCE OF NATURE.

To an observing and reflecting mind, the language of nature is eloquent, and when listened to, produces emotions of bliss, the most ecstatic. The mind loves harmony, and who can cast an eye over earth's majestic scenery, behold the changes of the seasons, the regular return of day and night, of morning, noon, and evening, and not see order, harmony and beauty? It is through these that nature declares her constancy. Even in her changes, she exhibits her stability. We have seen the sun, from early childhood, walking the same mysterious, untiring round, shedding its cheering rays impartially upon all created things. The same moon, that so smilingly watched over the faithful shepherds on Judea's lovely plains, and led the way for the devoted lover, over the dusky valley to woo his long loved mistress, still announces in the spirit of love, and in the language of attachment, that her "mellow light," though borrowed, shall never fade.

In what symphonious, yet powerful, strains of eloquence, do those glittering orbs that pensively wander in the infinite heavens, through ether's immensity, invite man's attention, and elicit his wonder and admiration? How steadily they trace their accustomed way, how cheerfully they smile, how brightly their eyes do shine! What volumes do they speak!—how true are the words they utter! "Our Maker is Love—Love immortal, Love unfading," are the accents which fall from their golden lips. But while nature makes the concave sky echo with lessons of wisdom—her notes, driving old silence from his lifeless slumbers, to listen to her "deep toned voice"—she is not silent in the world below. The many colored clouds, rolling upon the surface of the sky, wafted by the potent but invisible winds, and speaking in the harshness of terrific thunder, slowly and mutely climb above the horizon, and shed their genial rain-drops or whiten the earth with "downy snow." The ceaseless winds, with rising and falling inflection rave around the world, uttering words of vengeance; or, calm as angelic innocence, gently whisper through the sylph-like groves, or look wisely silent in the evening shades.

Go with me, ye admirers of eloquent nature—ye, who are nature's most eloquent—to the flowery borders of a limpid fountain; sit beneath some sylvan bower, and muse upon the cerulean waters, as they cheerfully leap from rock to rock, or murmur slowly down their accustomed channel; hear the harmonious carol of the woodland feathered orators, as they intermingle their enrapturing voices, with all of nature's coadjutors, and tell me if in nature there is not eloquence. When we gaze upon her resplendent beauties, her multiform appearances, and her checkered scenery, and reflect that such are all the lands of earth, smiling upon the distant sea, and old ocean reflecting back the smile, laughing even in the eye of yonder dazzling sun, do they not speak in all the powers of eloquence—in the language of Omnipotence himself—that

"God is love, God is Almighty,
Almighty love can all things do,
Conquer death—destroy the devil,
Kill sin and conquer sinners too." ANGELO.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

LUKE I. 57 Now Elizabeth's full time came that she should be delivered, and she brought forth a son.

58 And her neighbors and her consins heard how the Lord had showed great mercy upon her, and they rejoiced with her.

59 And it came to pass that on the eighth day they came to circumcise the child; and they called him Zacharias after the name of his father.

60 And his mother answered and said, "Not so, but he shall be called John."

61 And they said unto her, "There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name."

62 And they made signs unto his father how he would have him called.

63 And he asked for a writing table, and wrote saying, "His name is John." And they marvelled all.

64 And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue loosed, and he spoke and praised God.

66 And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all these sayings were noised about through all the hill country of Judea.

66 And all they that heard them, laid them up in their hearts, saying, "What manner of child shall this be?" and the hand of the Lord was with him.

67 And his father, Zacharias, was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied saying, 68 "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people, 69 And hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David;

70 As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began.

71 That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us,

72 To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant,

73 The oath which he sware to our father Abraham,

74 That he would grant unto us, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, 75 In holiness, and righteousness, before him, all the days of our life.

76 And thou child, shall be called the prophet of the Highest, for thou shalt go before the Lord to prepare his ways,

77 To give knowledge of salvation unto his people, by the remission of their sins,

78 Through the tender mercy of our God, whereby the day spring from on high hath visited us,

79 To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."

80 And the child grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel.

Verse 59. "On the eighth day they came," etc. It was a requirement of the law that circumcision should be performed when the child was eight days old. See Gen. xvii: 12.

61. "There is none of thy kindred," etc. It seems that then as well as now the practice of naming children after some of their kindred was prevalent.

62. "They made signs." It would seem from this verse that Zacharias was deaf as well as dumb, else they might have spoken to him, instead of making signs. Or they might have used that mode of address for other reasons that do not now appear.

63. "Writing table." This is not to be understood as we now understand the phrase writing table; but it was a tablet composed probably of a thin piece of board, overspread with wax or some similar substance, on which the words "His name is John," were impressed. It was with them a substitute for paper and ink.

68. "Hath redeemed." This language in form is in the past tense, but in sense it must be future. Many of the prophecies of Scripture are spoken in that way.

69. "He hath raised up a horn of salvation." This probably alludes to "the custom of ancient warriors, who had a horn of steel on the top of their helmets, which ordinarily lay flat, till the person came victorious from battle, and then it was erected as emblematical of the victory gained." Clarke in loco. The victory over sin and death had as it were been achieved; and hence the horn of salvation attached to the helmet of salvation (Eph. vi: 17.) was "raised up," or erected, as indication of this victory.

78. "Day spring." Had it been rendered dawn instead of day spring, the sense to most readers, would have been more obvious. John was to the Saviour as the early dawn to the rising sun, 1st, as to precedence of time, and 2d, as to comparative glory.

80. "Deserts." The word here rendered desert, does not always denote an uninhabited or barren country; but a country thinly inhabited and perhaps, comparatively unproductive. See John xv: 61, 62.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.—It is the intention to close each section of these comments with such remarks as may be required by the subjects embraced in the text, and that may be too protracted to be inserted with the comments. But though the foregoing section embraces subjects on which additional remarks might be made, yet as we wish, as far as possible, to observe brevity, and to treat of no subjects but such as it would be manifestly improper to omit, we shall dispense with the usual remarks in closing the present section.

THE DOCTRINE OF IMPUTATION.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

It has generally been believed by a great part of professing Christians, that Christ became our righteousness, by fulfilling the divine law in our stead, and our salvation by bearing its penalty in our room—that he is our proxy, and that our sins are imputed to him, and his righteousness to us, so that he suffers our just deserts, and we are eternally happy as a reward for his obedience. Now it appears to us that nothing can be more absurd and unscriptural than this doctrine.

1. It is denied by all those scriptures which declare that God will render to every one according to his works, for it teaches that Christ was punished for our bad deeds, and we rewarded for his good ones.

2. It involves a natural impossibility; for neither righteousness nor sin is transferable; they both respect practice and character; and it is impossible for the actions of one person to justify those of another. It is just as impossible for two men to transfer their actions to each other, as to transfer their persons to each other.

3. It is positively false in itself, to assert that the righteousness of Christ is imputed to us or our sins to him. To impute is to ascribe, to charge or to account; and if any act should be charged to me which I did not perform, it would be a false charge. "The righteousness of Christ consisted of his righteous disposition and righteous acts. He was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, etc. Now if God should impute that character to any sinner in the world it would be a false imputation. It would be the same as to say that a very wicked, mischievous person, is a very holy, harmless one. To impute the temper of the most ferocious tiger in the world to the gentlest lamb, would not be more false."

4. The doctrine of imputed righteousness is utterly useless. What good could it do the sinner to call him holy, or the sick man to account him well? It is the thing itself, and not the credit of it which is wanted. Our great Physician came not to be a well man in our stead, but to apply his means and make us well. He came to give eyes to the blind, not to see for them; and ears to the deaf, not to hear for them; he came to cause the lame man to leap as an hart and the tongue of the dumb to sing, not to leap for the lame man, nor sing for the dumb.

ANECDOTE.

BY REV. N. BROWN.

BR. GROSH.—The following anecdote is, I think, "to good to keep." I therefore give it to the public for the especial edification of the readers of the Magazine and Advocate. It is illustrative of the many shifts, and turns, and quibbles, which our opposing brethren sometimes make, to avoid the force of arguments in support of the final restitution, when hard pressed upon this subject.

Not long since, the following conversation, in substance, took place in the village of C*****, between a Universalist and a Methodist preacher. After conversing at some length upon the subject of a personal devil—the destruction of his works, etc., the "counsel for the defendant" exclaimed with much apparent warmth—"Well, I know you have proved that the works of the devil will be destroyed; but, Sir, I pointedly deny, that his royal highness himself will be destroyed! You can't prove that, Sir!"

U. "We will see, my dear Sir. I suppose you will be willing to admit direct Scripture testimony in proof?"

M. "O yes, Sir, that's what we want, if any."

U. "Will you pledge yourself to admit such testimony, and give up your position, if it can be proved by the express language of Scripture that the devil shall be destroyed?"

M. "Certainly, certainly, but you can't produce any thing of the kind."

U. "Listen, Sir, to the language of Paul, 'Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil,' or his 'royal highness,' as you have been pleased to dignify him."

M. "Hem—We'll, does the Bible read like that? [Looks very grave and sad for a moment.] Ah, it was the power of the devil, that was to be destroyed."

U. "Not that merely—him that had the power of death," says Paul."

M. "The Bible says too, that the devil was cast down to hell, and is there to be reserved in everlasting chains of darkness 'unto the judgment of the great day.'"

U. "What do you think of this passage, when it speaks of the devil going to and fro, up and down the earth like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour?"

M. "Why, that it is the truth Sir. The devil tempts all to sin; he is always near to prompt to all kinds of wickedness."

U. "The Bible says that 'every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lusts and enticed.' You say that the devil is literally confined in chains in hell, and is there to be confined until he is liberated at the day of a literal judgment, at the end of time; and yet you admit that this same devil is literally in all parts of the world at one and the same time—tempting and deceiving the whole human race. How much does his 'royal highness' lack of being an Omnipresent, and an Omniscient being? Surely, he must have a very long chain!"

M. "Ah—'great,' Sir, 'is the mystery of godliness!'"

U. "You should have said, my dear friend—great is the mystery of the devil!"

M. "Well—well—I don't think it profitable to have any more conversation with you on this subject—I am in haste, Sir—Good day."

U. "Good day, Sir.—[Exeunt.]

CONFERENCE IN MUNNSVILLE.

Br. GROSH—According to previous notice, a conference was held in Munnsville, Madison county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday inst. The services on the first day were tolerably well attended—as much so as we could expect, considering the coldness of the weather. On the second day the house was full. Seven sermons were preached on the occasion—three by Br. Bartholomew of Pennsylvania, two by Br. Morey, and two by the writer—being all the preachers that were present. Our friends in Munnsville and vicinity, manifest a good degree of zeal.—They think they shall organize themselves into a society soon. Br. Morey preaches with them occasionally.

Now, Br. Grosh, if Br. Cook could complain of the non-attendance of preachers at the conference at Vernon, how much more might we complain of the irnon-attendance at Munnsville? Of the three preachers who attended this meeting of the quarterly conference, of the Central Association, not one properly belonged to the Association! "A word to the wise is sufficient."

The liberality of our friends at this meeting will long be remembered. W. M. DELONG.

Lebanon, February 21st, 1840.

* Br. Morey lives in Morrisville, I believe, and Br. Delong in Lebanon, and both these places are in the bounds of the Central Association, if I mistake not. But perhaps I do not understand Br. Delong's meaning. Br. Cook was unwell, or he would have attended. I was prevented from attending by other circumstances, after I had made up my mind to go.

CONFERENCE AT PROMPTON, PA.

Br. GROSH—I attended a Conference held at Prompton, Pa., on Wednesday and Thursday the 5th and 6th of January. There were three preachers present, Brs. C. S. Brown, J. Palmer, and H. Torrey. Seven sermons were preached on the occasion to respectable and attentive congregations. Our friends in this vicinity manifest a good spirit, and seem to be zealously engaged in the promotion of the cause they love. Since Br. Landers left them, they have had no shepherd to "feed the flock;" but are now making preparations to employ Br. C. S. Brown. May the Lord prosper their exertions to the upbuilding of Zion. We had a happy time at Prompton, and we really hope that Conference and social meetings will become more numerous, they are so well calculated to refine the feelings and soften the affections of the human heart—to unite us together in the bonds of brotherly affection—to give us noble and exalted views of man, of nature, and of God. They are, indeed, a "feast of fat things" to the mind, and to the soul they afford a "joy unspeakable and full of glory." May our brethren soon realize their utility to the cause of truth, and feel it as their imperative duty to be zealously engaged in every thing which will tend to promote the interest and advancement of our denomination.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Br. Price recommends the folks down East to get the Rev. Jacob K. as a yoke fellow to work with Miller in getting up revivals. Who would have supposed Br. P. to be so malicious!

Br. L. Hussey removed to South Windham, Me. Br. J. A. Bartlett from Hollis to Bridgeton, Me.

Br. A. A. Miner was installed at Methuen, Mass., Feb. 26th.

Br. Eli Ballou has purchased the establishment of the Universalist Watchman after the present volume, and will commence in the next number, vice Br. J. Wright, resigned. Br. Wright states as a fact, that every proprietor of the Watchman and Repository, from Br. Loveland down to himself, (a period of not less than 15 or 20 years,) has sunk money by the business! Encouraging for those who wish to get up new papers!

A union house in Tunbridge, Vt., erected by the Free Will Baptists, Methodists and Universalists was dedicated Feb. 5th. Sermon by Br. R. Streeter of Woodstock.

An elegant brick meeting house, owned wholly by our friends in Amoskeag, N. H. was dedicated on Feb. 12th. Sermon by A. C. Thomas, of Lowell, Mass.

A new society was formed in Beverly, Mass. on Feb. 17th. Br. John Prince labors with them at present. They hold their meetings in the Town hall.

I can find no other items of news to record, save half-a-dozen in relation to Wm. Miller and his end of the world in 1843.

WALDIE'S SELECT CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

This superior and cheap reprint of Biographies, Travels, Novels, Tales, &c., of superior merit, should be patronized by every person who desires such works as it contains, but lives at a distance from the Atlantic cities—as, by taking it, they will receive the best new publications by mail, frequently before the booksellers can issue them in book form, and what is more, for not more than one-fourth of the usual cost. The selections are carefully made, with good taste and judgment. And this year, instead of the covers of four pages to each number, Mr. Waldie furnishes a monthly supplement of 16 pages, thus effecting a great saving in postage.

It is published weekly, each number containing 16 quarto pages, (which, with the supplements, will give two volumes per annum, of 512 pages each; or 1,024 pages a year!) at five dollars per annum. O. Hutchin-son is an agent for this section. A. B. G.

"A brief account of the last moments of Rev. Aaron Leland Balch."—Such is the title of a very modest little pamphlet of 12 pages, received by mail—probably from the author. Our thanks are due to the sender. We had the happiness of a slight acquaintance with the deceased—saw him a few moments in good health and spirits in Boston, last September, and anticipated the pleasure of again seeing him next Fall—but the meeting is postponed till the eternal Spring of immortality comes around.

The narrative is simple, affecting, profitable—it exhibits the good man, joyful in life, resigned in death, and faithful to the last in urging all around to the performance of duty, by precept and example. I would that every opposer—yea, every believer, also—could read it, and realize how a faith in and practice of Universalism enables the husband, father, son and brother—the man, to die in peace and rejoicing.

Rev. Mr. Kirk, late of Albany, has been reviving it in Philadelphia, and has been so "unfortunate" as to try to persuade the people that the Captain of the sloop who deserted the sufferers in the Lexington, was a Universalist—believed they were all going to heaven, and therefore made no effort to save them! Poor fellow. Br. S. W. Fuller, Editor of the Nazarene, has taken hold of him and his "unfortunate" story. By this time, we suppose, Mr. K. wishes he was out of the scrape, and his system of theology also—for the doctrine he preaches represents God and Jesus as dealing far worse to a vast portion of mankind, than this sloop Captain did to the Lexington sufferers. Br. Fuller thinks the sloop Captain must have believed in unconditional election and reprobation!

"THE LAW IS GOOD."

BY BR. J. FRENCH.

It is rather difficult for Universalists to understand how a law, which is to result in the unending wretchedness of a majority of the human race, can with propriety be called good. But it is highly gratifying to know that there are men among the advocates of that doctrine who not only maintain that the divine law is good, but assign the best of reasons why it is so; viz., because it tends "to promote happiness, and prevent misery; to promote virtue, and suppress vice."

The phrase at the head of this article is from An Epitome of Systematic Theology, by Marcus Smith, A. M., pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church in Watertown; and the following extracts will show the clear and beautiful manner in which he both defends and illustrates the above position.

"That regard to the happiness of his creatures, which God has manifested in the works of creation and providence, furnishes one assurance that a law proceeding from him must be good."

"The reasons of its existence and requisitions are plain, and intelligible to every candid inquirer. It requires men to cultivate those affections, and pursue that course of conduct, which would result in their highest happiness. It is reasonable that man should love God and his neighbor if it is reasonable that man should be happy.—With his present constitution it is the only way he can be happy. A law, then, which brings into view those relations, which really exist, and enforces those duties which are absolutely essential to the peace and welfare of the world, can not but be good."

"Such is the divine law. It is good because it imposes no obligations incompatible with the highest happiness we are capable of enjoying.—What does the law demand? It demands that purity in affection and life, which would diffuse tranquility and bliss through the universe. It enjoins precepts calculated to promote the highest felicity of the world. Imagine for a moment a community or a world influenced at all times by piety towards God, and by benevolence towards man; see love to God leading them on in pursuit of the highest happiness of the universe, guarding them against every infringement on the rights of their fellow-creatures, and then say would not this be a happy world? How would this empire of holiness rise, and spread its blessings and triumph, until it had chased away the vile passions which have agitated, and the crimes which have polluted the world. But all this happy state of things the law tends to produce. Were its commands duly regarded we should see selfishness, and pride, and fraud, and violence cease, and this world become the abode of justice, and condescension, and love. Friendship and piety would beam from every countenance, and devotion would ascend from the hearts of an obedient world. In such a world God could look down with complacency; and in such a throng angels could mingle their kindred raptures. Such is the state of things the law has a tendency to produce."

"Is not the law good? Is not that law good which would raise man from his degradation and assimilate him to his Maker; which would attach him to the throne of the Eternal, and to the dearest interests of the universe? The law is holy, and the commandment is holy, just and good." Even so. Amen.

Surely every sincere Universalist will heartily respond to the view thus given of the divine law, and indeed the subject is vastly more interesting and happyfying to us than it can be to Mr. Smith, because this lovely picture of universal holiness and bliss, which to him is merely the product of a momentary imagination, is to us an eternal truth, having real existence in the unalterable purposes of that God who sent his Son not to destroy but to fulfil this good law, by finishing transgression and making an end of sin.

ANALOGICAL REASONING.

BR. GROSH:—

I wish to submit a question to you, which to me appears to be an important one, and concerning which I shall be obliged if you will give your opinion. The question is this: Can a preacher or theological writer, who avows his belief in the holy Scriptures as divinely inspired, and as being the only certain and sufficient rule of faith and practice, consistently adopt and inculcate a principle, or doctrinal sentiment, unless he be able to adduce some one passage, or more, of Scripture testimony, which, in his judgment, if fairly interpreted, does either plainly express, or by necessary implication clearly contain, such principle or doctrine?

I make this inquiry with particular reference to the doctrine of limited punishment and misery in a future state, for some portion of mankind, for sins committed by them, or for failing to attain to a state of holiness, in the present life—which sentiment is held and inculcated by several of our worthy brethren in the ministry of reconciliation. And here a second question is suggested—Do those brethren claim to found their belief in the above sentiment upon the testimony of Scripture? Are there any passages in the inspired records, either in the Old, or in the New Testament, to which they refer, and on which they rely for proof of the doctrine; or do they claim that they find the evidence of its truth in the principle of analogy; and endeavor to sustain it by arguments derived from that source? I make this inquiry in perfect candor; and because I am ignorant in the premises, and wish for information. I have conversed with several brethren, who avowed their belief in the doctrine of future punishment, for sins committed in the present state, and have requested them to name some one passage which, in their opinion, teaches the doctrine, or has relation to it; but in no instance has my request been complied with. Indeed, in agitating the subject with one brother, not long since, he remarked, in substance, as follows—"We do not pretend to prove the doctrine by the Scriptures, but by arguments founded on analogy." But whether his was a solitary case, or whether it is general with our brethren who adopt the sentiment, I know not; and would fain be informed.

I have been led to these inquiries and reflections particularly by an article in a recent number of the Magazine and Advocate, over the signature of D. S. The article contains some extracts from the writings of the Rev. Albert Barnes, with remarks upon them. D. S.—whom I take to be our worthy Br. Dolphus Skinner—points out some remarkable incongruities in the statements, and in the reasonings of Mr. B., but he seems to think that he should hardly be able to show the fallacy or incorrectness of Mr. B.'s analogical reasoning, were it not for the doctrine of future limited punishment and misery, which Br. S. avows, and which he imagines, enables him triumphantly to refute Mr. B.'s arguments, or at least, to show that they are more forcible when applied to limited future punishment. In the passage to which I particularly refer, Br. S. says as follows—and I greatly marvel at the statement—"As I happen not to be of the number of those who, like the infidel, believe that death terminates the consciousness and being of man forever; nor of the number of those who believe that all punishment is necessarily confined to this state—that the course of justice is arrested, and man freed from all further guilt or responsibility for past sins by death alone; (for did I thus believe, I should not know how to evade the force of Mr. B.'s argument here)."

Upon the above statement some queries are suggested. Whom does Br. S. mean by "those who like the infidel believe that death terminates the consciousness and being of man forever"?—Do any but infidels adopt this sentiment?—are not all who adopt it, infidels? Again; whom does he mean by "those who believe that the course of justice is arrested—by death alone"?—He here doubtless means his brethren in the faith of universal salvation, who believe that death is the "last enemy," and the last of human woes. But does it of consequence follow, that if man is, at death, "freed (delivered) from all further guilt"—from all sin, condemnation and suffering, that therefore the course of justice is arrested—stopped short of its object, and prevented from obtaining full satisfaction? We think not. But Br. S. thinks he should not know how to evade the force of Mr. B.'s argument, without his belief in a limited state of punishment, guilt and misery beyond the present life. Does Br. S. think, then, that there is no Scripture testimony that can be brought forward to destroy the supposed force of Mr. B.'s analogical argument for the doctrine of endless misery? And, moreover, is Br. S. "of the number of those" who acknowledge that the doctrine of limited future punishment, for sins committed in this life, can not be sustained by Scripture testimony, but is to be supported only by analogical arguments? Br. S. may have shown that B.'s arguments from analogy are less absurd, or more forcible when applied to the doctrine of limited future punishment, than when employed in support of that of endless misery; but we see but little force in them, in either case, without Scripture authority, and especially, when abundant Bible testimony can be adduced, in which both those theories are, as we believe, fairly and fully set aside.

The Sadducees, in the days of our Saviour, appear to have reasoned upon the principles of analogy when they questioned Jesus concerning the resurrection, and brought the case of a woman who, in this life, had had seven husbands, and inquired of him whose wife of them she should be in the resurrection. The reply of our Saviour was a merited rebuke of their vain and ignorant analogical reasoning.—"Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." There is nothing more vague, uncertain, and contradictory than such kind of reasoning; it may be employed, with equal plausibility, to support different and entirely opposite theories.—Therefore we would earnestly and confidently urge, in the language of the prophet, "To the law, and to the testimony." M. R.

Lansingburg, 1840.

REMARKS.

I did not read the article by Br. Skinner till I read it in the proof-sheet, or I should have pointed out to him wherein I thought his language might be considered gratuitously ungenerous, as Br. R. evidently considers it. I understood him, in the sentence objected to, as using Mr. Barnes' phrases about "arresting justice," etc., but was satisfied others might not so understand it. Candor, says Dr. Blair, requires that we should never charge others with avowing sentiments which they disavow; or with deliberately sanctioning conclusions drawn from what they do avow, which they deny to be legitimate conclusions from the premises. And whatever may be Br. Skinner's views, we do not suppose he meant to violate this plain rule, not only of candor, but of Christian charity and brotherly kindness. The phrase, "those who, like the infidel," is not a mere tautology—for I believe there are some Christians (not believers in Universalism, of course) who contend for the annihilation of the wicked, at death, and at the resurrection.

In reply to the question, to which Br. Rayner requests my answer, I unhesitatingly say, NO. Opinions should be given as such—but a religious doctrine should always be based on divine testimony. Analogies are valuable only as confirmations of clearly revealed truths—and, unless carefully guarded—unless all allowances are made for the differences which must exist between a mortal and an immortal, a natural and a spiritual, a temporal and an endless, a corruptible and an incorruptible, a dying and a deathless, an earthly and a heavenly, an animal and an angelic, a dishonorable and a glorious state, no analogy drawn from the present state of being, can properly apply to the world of spirits.—For, as Br. R. justly says, give analogy the reins, and any thing may be proved by it.

But, if I am correct, our brethren who believe in punishment after death, rely not alone on analogy—they think they find direct, or at least strong inferential, testimony for their belief in the Scriptures. At least, so I have always understood them in conversations with them—and with Br. Skinner particularly.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS, No. X.

"Nevertheless, we according to his promise, look for a new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." 2 Pet. iii: 13. See the whole chap.

No one opinion has obtained more prevalence in the Christian church, than, that at the end of time, there will be a general gathering of all human beings for judgment, at which period the stars will fall from the sky, the heavens will melt with heat, and the earth be burned up. In proof of this belief, reference is made to language of scripture, which, in my judgment, can not have a literal application, but in all cases should be viewed in the light of strong, eastern figures; for as it regards the burning of the earth, I have not yet discovered any evidence which is satisfactory and clear on the point, though the language of revelation, particularly the 3d chap. of 2d Peter, which the reader is now requested to peruse, may seem to strongly favor the opinion.

It is to be feared, that in regard to the creation of God, our notions are too confined, too mean, too cramped. We are apt to talk as though the close of this race of beings would be the close of the creation of God. We speak of stars falling to the earth, but how much philosophy is there in the statement? Not many stars could rest upon the earth, since abundance of single stars are vastly superior in magnitude to the earth. Besides, though within the circle of our atmosphere, where every object thrown into it and heavier than the air is drawn down to the earth by the power of gravitation, the term fall possesses a relative meaning; yet when we get beyond our atmosphere where mighty worlds float in space, the term fall has no meaning whatever. We are but a comparative moat amid the works of creation, and though this earth was struck out of existence, they would still roll on in their undisturbed harmony, and we not be missed. Stars have disappeared from the heavens; but still the works of God go forward in their unceasing operations. And there can be but little doubt, that the divine energies will be manifested in the ages of eternity, by creating and recreating works to praise his name and magnify his glory. How futile then, even admitting that the earth is to be burned up, is it to talk as though the creation of God was to cease with it.

But even of the destruction of the earth we have no certain data upon which to found an opinion. True, that the present race of beings on the earth will cease, is clear. Christ has power over all flesh, and he is to raise all from the dead—when all are raised from the dead, then, Paul certifies us that Christ, when the end has come, will give up the kingdom to God the Father—when this is effected, as a matter of course, the descendants of Adam and Eve will cease to be as human beings, and live in heaven as the angels of God. What is to become of the earth afterwards, is a matter of mere speculation. Whether it will return to chaos as it was in the beginning, and again be refashioned for another race of beings, (for there may be a succession of races as well as a succession of nations,) or whether it will be destroyed, is not revealed to us—and will remain a perfect enigma until we shall be exalted to the infinite knowledge of heaven. It is true that the text and its context will be urged as explicit in their communications; the heavens shall melt with fervent heat and the earth shall be burnt up—but before we admit this language to have a literal application, we should remember that it was a universal custom in eastern nations, to speak of earthly events with allusions to the most lofty subjects, using ideas as figures, which, if viewed in the light of express interpretation, would be perfectly absurd. For instance, in the time of the Israelitish Judges, when Deborah and Barak overcame the Canaanitish host under Sisera, and sung a triumphant song, they said, "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Judg. v: 20. The prophet Isaiah, speaking of the pride of the king of Babylon, says, "for thou hast said in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God." Isa. xiv: 13. In representing the destruction of Egypt, Ezekiel says, "And when I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light." Eze. xxxii: 7, 8. Daniel in describing one of the four generals who divided the kingdom of Alexander the Great, as one of the four horns which came from the he-goat, says, "And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host, and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them." Dan. viii: 10. Concerning Edom, Obadiah says, "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down saith the Lord." Oba. i: 4. Now in all these cases, the language used is as strong as that used by Peter; yet it evidently is not literal, but forms so many splendid figures, illustrative of earthly facts and events. This truth should teach us to exercise much caution in literally applying the language of the apostle, since he did himself, on frequent occasions, apply bold figures to the destruction of the Jewish Covenant.

After mature consideration, it appears to me that Peter, in the passage under consideration, had reference, not to the end of the material universe, but to the destruction of the Jewish Institution with the elements that sustained it, and to the establishment of Christianity. In attempting to show the reasons for this conclusion, we trust that each reader will receive them cautiously and with deliberation, by proving all things. There is one consideration, which at the very outset, is presumptive proof of the position taken. After Peter describes the melting of the heavens, and the burning of the earth, he says, "we look for a new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." Now, it is a general opinion, that when the earth is burned up and the heavens melted, the righteous go to heaven and the wicked to hell—where then is the use of this new earth? Why is it introduced at all? Does it not seem that the new heavens were as important as the old heavens, and that both are intimately connected? What then is the new heavens but the Christian dispensation? But to bring the matter to a direct issue, we will take up the language in the order in which it occurs.

I. "This second epistle, beloved. I now write unto you; in which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance; that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and the Saints; knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts." Vers. 1, 2, 3. Two questions arise; what were those last days, and who were the scoffers? Our sources of information on this subject are the apostles and prophets; for Peter directed those to whom he was writing to these sources. What then do they say about the last days? "But in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the tops of the mountains—for the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Micah, iv: 1, 2. In this passage, last days refer to the ending of the Mosaic institution and the times of the Messiah, for the law of truth sprung from Zion and the word of God from Jerusalem; it was there the Gospel commenced, for Christ when he ascended from his disciples, commanded them to preach repentance and remission of sins to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Luke xxiv: 47. The apostle Paul said to the Hebrew brethren, "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners, spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." Heb. i: 1, 2. Again, to the Corinthians, "now all these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world (age) are come." 1 Cor. x: 11. John says, "for the time is at hand." Rev. i: 3. Peter says, "but the end of all things is at hand." 1 Epis. ii: 7. To this we may add the language of Christ to his disciples, "for the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; then shall he reward every man according to his works—verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." Mat. xvi: 27, 28. These clear statements, fixing the time of the latter days to the ending of the Jewish world, are decisive; and to them, I would add, that in no instance does the phrase "latter days" have reference to a future state of being.

The scoffers who were to come in those last days of the ancient law, were the numerous false teachers who apostatized from Christ in the primitive seasons of the Christian church, and who introduced errors among believers. They were those who taught the Corinthians, that the resurrection had already passed, and the Galatians to observe seasons—they were those of whom Christ spoke in the 24th of Matthew; "false prophets," of whom the disciples were to beware. But to settle this point beyond controversy, one passage will be sufficient. "Little children, it is the last time: and, as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists; whereby ye know that it is the last time." 1 John, ii: 18. This clear passage absolutely fixes the time of the scoffers to the last days of the Jewish elements; and every one will perceive that this fact establishes the period of the events alluded to by the apostle Peter.

What was the trouble with the scoffers? "And saying, where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." Vs. 4. The coming here alluded to, was the coming of Christ, not in person, but in power, to punish his murderers—an event of which he frequently spake, affirming that the generation in which he lived, would not pass, until his coming was manifested. In imitation of their master, the apostles frequently referred to some great event which was shortly to transpire. Hence, Paul said, "and that knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed—the night is far spent, the day is at hand." Rom. xiii: 12, 13. Again, "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand." 2 Thess. ii: 1, 2. The coming of Christ to destroy the Jewish nation, and to deliver the believers from all the calamities of the times, was then about to transpire. This was the coming at which the false teachers scoffed. Ever since Christ had disappeared, things remained as they always had, and to them there were no tokens of a fearful calamity.

But they were mistaken. Hence Peter says—"For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished: but the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." Vss. 5, 6, 7. These scoffers seemed to be ignorant that the same word of God which created the heavens, also overflowed the old world with water, so that it perished. I now press the question, what world perished? Does not the same world exist now in its ceaseless revolutions, upon whose waters the spirit of God moved previous to the creation of Adam? Certainly it does. By the perishing of the ancient world, then, Peter meant that the waters overflowed and destroyed the wicked race of beings who then existed. So the same word of God would bring calamities upon the Jewish world and institutions, and sweep them away—for of the overturn of Israel and the removal of the ancient covenant, God hath spoken by the mouths of his prophets of old. The antediluvians denied that destruction would come upon them, for though Noah warned them, they heeded him not, when suddenly the flood came and swept them away. So the scoffers were deceived in the days of Peter—they did not believe that destruction was coming. How much this was the condition of the Jewish scoffers! Calling Abraham their father, and viewing themselves the favorites of heaven, they did not dream that a period was just at hand, when their house would be left unto them desolate and their glory prostrated in ruins. The day of the Lord came upon them like a thief in the night, stealthily and unawares. To these very facts our Saviour refers in his discourse with the disciples on the subject of his coming and the end of the Jewish polity. "But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark; and knew not, until the flood came, and took them all away: so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Mat. xxiv: 37—39. In vs. 34 of the same chapter he declared that the existing generation should not pass until all the things of which he had spoken should be fulfilled. This was actually the case. The Jews were careless like the antediluvians; gave no heed to the signs around them, and before they were aware of it, destruction was upon them and they were scattered over the whole earth.

II. "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works thereon shall be burned up." Vs. 10. It may to some perhaps seem, that such language can not be applied to the removal of the Mosaic institutions—but such are reminded, that in this very chapter Peter declares that the world perished by water, when it is obvious that the world stands as it ever did; while he simply intended that the people were destroyed. Besides, the constant application of the phrase "last days" in the Scriptures to the times of the Messiah, invariably fixes the period to which this language alludes.

It must be evident to every reader of the Scriptures, that language as strong as this, is used to designate the removal of earthly powers. A notable instance occurs in Isaiah, who when expressly speaking of the punishment of Babylon, says, "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven and the constellation thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine." Isa. xlii: 9, 10. In another clear instance, speaking of Idumea, the prophet says, "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree. For my sword shall be bathed in heaven; behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment." Isa. xxxiv: 4, 5. In these two clear citations, the fact is established, that the boldest language was used to represent the destruction of nations.

I now remark, that equally strong language was used in express reference to the destruction of the Jews, by our Saviour himself. Christ, after describing the signs that were to precede the destruction of the temple, said to his disciples—"Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Mat. xxiv: 29, 30. Powerful as this language is, not only does Dr. Clarke unequivocally apply it to the spiritual coming of Christ to punish the Jews, but our Saviour expressly designates the time of its application. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye see all these things, know that is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." Vss. 32 to 34. This instruction is so clear that it needs no comment.

Let it now be observed, that on a particular occasion, Peter did apply as powerful language as that found in the text, to the times of the Messiah. On the day of Pentecost, when the apostles by the power of the holy spirit, spake different languages, and were charged with being drunken, in defence, Peter said—"But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel; And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: . . . . And I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, vapor of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." Acts ii: 16 to 20. In quoting this passage from Joel and applying it to his own time, as he does in the context, Peter teaches us important facts. It shows that he applied the phrase "last days" to the end of the law dispensation, and that the events at the commencement of the Gospel justified him in using the bold language that he did.

From these facts then, we conclude that the language of the text and its context is figurative, and is used in reference to putting the ancient covenant aside and scattering the holy people. The object of Peter was, not only to show believers that the scoffers were wrong, not only to show that Christ would as certainly come as the flood overflowed the earth, but also to prepare them for that event. Hence he said, "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness." Vs. 11. In the 24th of Matthew, our Saviour warned the disciples to watch and be ready, lest his coming took them unawares and they fell with the hypocrites.

In due time he came. Although the ancient covenant contains much that is good, yet its elements were fitted but for a season, as it was intended to be replaced in the latter days by a more glorious system, founded by a more perfect individual than Moses. The removal of the ancient covenant, with the elements that surrounded it, the temple, service, priesthood and Jewish people, might well be termed the destruction of an old heaven and earth; while the overturn of the Israelitish nations, the horrors of sieges, the multitudes slain, the captivity of the rest and their dispersion over the whole world, may well be termed the burning up of the old heaven and earth, for fire is often used in the Scriptures to designate punishment. After the law and its splendid temple had been swept away, and no vestige of the old Jewish heaven and earth left in the spaces of the moral universe, then there appeared a new heaven and earth, of glorious formation. After Peter had described the burning of the old elements, he says,

III. "Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." Vs. 13. It seems then that this new heaven and earth was the subject of promise. Where then do you find a literal heaven and earth promised, after material ones have been burned up? I have not seen such a promise. But we do find the Gospel promised, in the figure of a new heaven and earth. In Isaiah, the Lord says, "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind; But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create; for behold, I create Jerusalem (in Revelations the Gospel is called the new Jerusalem) a rejoicing, and her people a joy; And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people; and the voice of crying shall no more be heard in her." Isa. lxxv: 17, 18, 19. How evidently this promise relates to the Gospel! That Peter records the fulfilment of this promise, is clear from the fact, that the heaven and earth of which he spake, were created in the "last days," or conclusion of the Mosaic elements.

There is another consideration which sheds light upon this subject. In this new heaven and earth, righteousness dwelt. Paul to his Galatian brethren said, "Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid; for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law." Gal. iii: 21. That is, if the law could have given spiritual and moral life by faith, then would it have been a system of righteousness; but it could not do this, and hence no true righteousness was found in the old heaven and earth of Jewish institutions. But in the Gospel, it was otherwise. Paul says, "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek; for therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith." Rom. i: 16, 17. The Gospel saves every one who believes it, from sin, from error, from fears of death, and confers moral and spiritual life; hence, in the Gospel is exhibited the righteousness, goodness or love of God, with his purity of character, in giving us a system which enables us to approach his excellence and stand free from guilt. From this fact, we discover that the new heaven and earth of the Gospel contain righteousness, which, if followed, will cause man to be a Christian. In view of these truths, to what else could Peter refer than the newly created Gospel?

To close this part of the subject, a passage from John will be cited, which is so like the language of Peter, and so evidently refers to the Mosaic and Christian Covenants, as to be clear to all. "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away. And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write; for these words are true and faithful." Rev. xxi: 1—5. What a beautiful description of the new heaven and earth of divine truth! This was the glorious system which was to revolve around the power of God, to the good of men. When the decaying principles of the law were removed and swept into oblivion, then the spirit of God moved upon the waters of darkness, and light appeared—under his direction, Jesus caused a new and beautiful creation to arise, rich in all its materials, a world of truth and salvation. Well might it be called a new heaven and earth. The moral worlds before were worlds of darkness, of storm, of torrents of sin and blasting mildews of error. The pilgrims of hope wandered for a home, but the deserts of doubt and the floods of sin met them alternately. The dove of desire might wander, and return, but without the true olive branch of faith. But the new heavens and the new earth of Christianity are free from all evils. No darkness or doubt there, no storms of sin howl in it; all is tranquil; the rivers of truth flow clearly and calmly along, the flowers of hope and faith bloom on all their banks, the refreshing fruits of virtue are every where to be found, of which there is plenty and to spare, while on the ocean of the love of God, all is safety and confidence. Its true inhabitants, commencing with the second Adam, Jesus from heaven, and from him to the present period, are those whose feet are often turned to seek out places of distress, to pour the oil of ease into the wounds of poverty; they wear the spotless robes of righteousness, unstained by iniquity; their confidence and their hope is found in the blazing light of immortality, which Christ hath fixed in the shadows of the tomb, while their benevolence finds full exercise in the abundant regions of the reconciliation, forgiveness for their enemies, prayers for curses, virtue in all things, a pure conversation wherever situated, and a firm retention of the truths which Christ hath taught from the cross, they live, blessed of God and honored by men.

This new heavens and new earth will continue until Christ as supreme Governor in them, shall have effected the splendid object for which he was sent into the world; to redeem man from sin. And "then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." I Cor. xv: 24—28. G. W. M.

THE TRIUMPHANT PRINCIPLE.

There can be no question that man is a progressive being. His very nature proclaims it. So capable of self-improvement is he, that he can not remain stationary in his moral or intellectual capacity, but must either move forward or backward in the scale of attainments. And especially may we regard him in this light when we view the adaptedness of outward circumstances, and his inward tendencies to this end. And first in consideration is his desire to know. Whether it be from curiosity or motives of usefulness, is not essential to the present argument; he has a strong desire to understand the unnumbered mysteries with which nature and providence abound. If he has cultivated the moral faculties, they will prompt him to direct his efforts to the attainment of useful and holy knowledge, and if he has neglected that cultivation, his taste may turn upon the vulgar, and he will find himself prompted to gather up of the poisoning influences of unholy and unbecoming topics, such as float through the brains of low and degraded wretches. Perhaps he will prefer to become acquainted with those matters and opinions which form the secrets of the knave, the idler and the spendthrift. But still, when we look at the influences which are thrown around him, we shall find that the balance is in favor of virtue and truth. This may be seen in the fact that the mind of man is so constituted that he takes real pleasure in real knowledge and useful acquisitions, while he revolts at the unstable and pernicious appendages of vice. This influence alone wins thousands of votaries to kneel at the shrine of wisdom.

But this is not all. Nature around him imparts no knowledge but that which is pure and holy. Every object which greets his eye speaks of a God of wisdom and goodness as well as mysterious power. Every event of divine providence, and every truth in God's revelation, have a holy, a chastening, a purifying influence, and together they teach nothing but what is calculated to exalt and ennoble. Of course they present powerful inducements to man to abandon his downward progress, and to look and advance upward toward heavenly purity. We do not mean, then, to say that man does not resist these influences, but we mean to say that they are the most powerful, and that therefore as long as man continues under such an arrangement of influences and inducements and restrictions, his progress, on the whole, must be towards improvement. A man can not always continue to swallow poison, to listen to the most discordant sounds, and to gaze upon the most painful and repulsive scenes, merely for the sake of withstanding and opposing the impulses of his higher nature. Let us suppose it settled, then, that man is a progressive being, and inquire in what manner we may expect this progression to continue, as long as man possesses a consciousness of his mental and moral nature.

We do not expect that circumstances growing out of our physical condition will continue to influence us in a future state, because nothing but the moral power of those circumstances can be continued. The physical will cease, and all our present connection with it; of course the laws which are inseparable with, and form a part of the physical, will cease with it. But we do expect that God's moral government will be unchangeable as long as there are moral subjects under it. So that whatever is congenial with true moral principle at one time will never cease to be so, and whatever naturally and directly operates unfavorably upon true moral principle, will never be less unfavorable. And yet there is a feature of the human mind which is demonstrable evidence that it would be eternally disappointed, and of course miserable, if it were convinced of the endless depravity of one single kindred spirit. A sentiment which we not long since read in the Lady's Book, is to the point. Let the reader consider it well, for we believe it to be a true one. "Lord Kaimes maintains that there is an original instinctive propensity or faculty in the human mind which demands the completion or finishing of what has been begun, and is displeased by an untimely or abrupt termination." I say the sentiment is a just one, for the mind, if it obtains peace thereby, never engages in any work without suitable reasons therefor; and having those reasons, it can not be satisfied with a half accomplished purpose. Even if the mind becomes convinced that it is engaged in an unlawful work, it will be disturbed at the necessity of a change, and regret that it had not begun a work which it might have finished.

Apply the rule to our blessed Saviour, and what would have been the consequence. He came into the world to save sinners—yes, even the chief of sinners. He began that work by proclaiming the word of God, and the blessings of the Gospel. He continued it by a life of spotless purity, thus affording the world a glorious example for their imitation. He set the finishing seal to his earthly mission by bleeding upon the cross, afterward bursting the cerements of the dead, and convincing mankind that he was victor even over Death. Thus far then, he was a means in obedience to the designs of the Father, of beginning the work of salvation from sin. In the furtherance of this work, he hath ascended up on high, where by the moral power committed to him, he is still the "mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." Shall the work which he has begun, be finished, or shall he be forever demanding that which he never obtains, and forever displeased with his unfinished and interrupted work? Reason and nature, as well as revelation declare that he "shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

But confine the principle to the human mind. We do not claim that a very corrupt mind labors much for the salvation of others; and our opposers in faith claim that such a mind will be eternally damned. But it certainly will not have to experience the anguish and disappointment of having begun a good work which it can not be allowed to finish. How is it with the saint? He has experienced the joys of well doing, and he wishes all others the same enjoyment. Hence, in accordance with his duty, he commences the work of an evangelist, by struggling to save souls. He feels that he can not be content to witness the ultimate misery of any of his fellow creatures. He begins the work, therefore, resolved to do all he can to save them. But alas! he has begun a work that can never be accomplished. Death comes and presents in his way a sudden and awful interruption. Is there any other hand or any other power extended to finish the work which was begun in him? No. He may follow those for whom he has labored and wept, beyond the tomb, but he will find his work still unfinished, and the souls for whom he wrought, groaning in unutterable anguish! According to the popular doctrine, if a man commences a work of reformation in himself, and does not finish it before a certain period, the door of mercy will be shut against him and his work will remain forever unfinished. So, also, we think it follows from the principles upon which the popular doctrine is founded, that if a man commences the work of reformation in another, by instructing him and almost persuading him to be a Christian, and fails of effecting his design, he will have begun a work which, unless he change to a fiend, he will forever intuitively desire to see completed. But he will desire it in vain. Hence it is dangerous to begin a work of this description, because it involves the endless dissatisfaction of all who do so, and as those who do not do so are liable to endless perdition, I see no possibility of their escaping it in any way.

Now the only question remaining is as to the amount of misery. Which will be the most miserable, he who never cared for others, and suffers only for himself, or he who has begun a work of benevolence and salvation which is to be interrupted in the future world, thereby subjecting him to an eternal disappointment of the most holy propensity of his mind, and one which is perfectly and intuitively connected with his moral existence? For ourselves we are not disposed to admit any such disastrous consequences in the government of God. If man possesses an intuitive principle it forms an inseparable part of himself; and if he is a progressive being, that principle must continue to exert on the creature its legitimate influence until it shall have finished the work for which it was given him. Hence we believe that the same God who has given man this propensity to finish or behold the completion of whatever he has wisely begun, and made it his duty to act as His agent in the salvation of souls from sin, will enable him to rejoice also in the satisfaction of his desires, by bringing all created intelligences home "to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads,"

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate
VISION OF REVIVALISM.

BY DAY K. LEE.

—, sleep hath its own world,
And a wide realm of wild reality,
And dreams in their development have breath.
And tears, and tortures, and the touch of joy."—BYRON.

Whilst wrapt in slumbers yester night
I climbed old Nebo's rugged height,
Where early sunlight played;
A voice of trumpet that was swelling,
Wherever rose a human dwelling,
Had drawn me thither without telling
For what the call was made.

Morn's earliest blushes lingered still,
As round the tower of that old hill
In crowded ranks there drew,
Millions that empire-bounds had sundered;
As peal on peal the trumpet thundered,
I stood and gazed, and "guessed," and wondered,
What men of earth would do!

I thought of every festal day
That had been held by breathing clay,
And every jubilee;
But none that shone upon my vision
As myriads passed in quick transition,
From holy land and field Elysian,
Unlocked the mystery.

At length a shout of louder tone
Than Stentor's lungs e'er heaved, alone,
Went echoing down the vale;
And then where Sol was brightest beaming,
I turned and saw a banner streaming,
Whose lettered folds in sunlight gleaming,
Gave out the secret tale.

That tale was this, in blazoned lines:—
"An allied legion of divines—
The first of all the schools.
That limit most the King Eternal,
And loudest sing the Prince Infernal—
With zeal beseeching minds supernal,
Are here, converting souls!"

A stage for priests was builded there,
And "anxious seats" to upper air,
Like "Alps on Alps" arose;
A prayer was made, a hymn was chaunted,
A pennon from the "altar" flaunted,
With this device—"REDEMPTION GRANTED—
"Come, sinners, ere we close!"

Expostulations loud and long,
Were made to that innumerable throng,
And warnings, threats, "desires,"
By sanctimonious tongues repeated,
Went out in sounds that ne'er retreated.
Till thousand thousand souls were "seated,"
And tuning Christian lyres!

The trumpet sounded, still there came
In legions forth of every name,
"Of every tribe and tongue,"
From all the land, and from the ocean,
To see who "set this ball in motion:"
And as each caught the strange emotion,
Redeeming grace they sung!

The trumpet sounded, till at last
All people heard its deafening blast,
And joined the mighty group;
Loud admonitions still were shouted,
Till cold misgivings all were routed
From millions more that long had "doubted,"
And "now had found a hope."

A few still lingered, all unlearned
Of what they'd heard "in words that burnt"—
But lingered they not long;
The voices louder grew, more fright'ning
Than had unscathed hell's vaults of lightning,
The fires of "endless death" kept bright'ning,
Till all had joined their song!

Ne'er scene or sight more glorious seemed Than this—mortality redeemed

From sin and endless woe!
A gush of joy leapt in my bosom,
To know the powers of death would lose 'em,
And think the Lamb of God might choose 'em,
And all to heaven would go!

But that "Revival" closed not then—
Why should it? Souls of wicked men,
Who'd shed "this mortal coil,"
Were wailing now on fiery pillows
In hell's mad sea of lava billows,
Could saints hang harps upon the willows,
And leave them aye to boil?

"They'll not remain in satan's clutch,
If 'righteous prayer availeth much,'"
Burst forth from million lips:
And all the voice of one obeying,
Fell on their knees and went to praying,
That "all dam'd souls no time delaying,
Come forth and death eclipse."

Those fervent supplications, blent
In one loud utterance, eloquent
With Love's impassioned flame,
To heaven's eternal King were lifted,
Until omniscient Mind was shifted,
And hell's wide portals all were rifted,
And out her prisoners came!

Those prayers ascended until all
Save one, had heard the thundering call,
And risen, but alas!
While that poor spirit staid, 'twas stated
That "prayers must cease, and hell be gated,
Or what some heretics had prated
Would quickly come to pass!"

But who had business then to say,
"Twere meet that Christians ceased to pray,"
When such was their avail?
That interloper kept o'erbearing,
Till two bright cherubs came, declaring,
'Twas his own child that still was wearing Hell's dark, sulphureous vail!

That prelate stood no longer there,
He joined the universal prayer
Which rose for HIS DEAR BOY;
Nor were those warm petitions ended,
Till that high hill his child ascended,
When myriad voices all were blended
In pæans loud of joy!

Miss RACHEL DILTS, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Walton, on Thursday morning, January 23d, of consumption, Miss LUCINDA BUTLER, aged 22 years, 9 months and 3 days. She was perfectly resigned to the will of her heavenly Father, and calmly fell asleep in death, trusting in God as the Saviour of all men. Her funeral was attended on the 25th, and a discourse preached by the writer.

In Tonawanda, Erie county, August 30th, 1839, Mr.
ADAM W. ZIMMERMAN, aged 52 years, 6 months and 24 days. The deceased was a man of strong persevering mind, of industrious habits, an obliging neighbor and valuable citizen. For several years he had been a believer in the salvation of the whole human race, and rejoiced in the same lively faith to the closing period of his life. He had been a subscriber for the Magazine and Advocate for six years, and from its columns enriched his mind and stored his memory with the able arguments and illustrations with which they have abounded. He has left a wife and three children to mourn his departure, and to profit by his examples. "The memory of the just is blessed."

The day following that on which he died, the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning family and friends by Rev. L. Knapp, in a sermon founded on 1 Cor.
ix: 13.

In Skeneateles, January 30th, Miss PHEBE SEELY. Funeral attended on the 1st ult. A discourse was delivered on the occasion by A. T. Corey, of the denomination of Friends. May the mourners be comforted by the consolations of the Gospel of impartial grace, which teaches that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." N. B.

In Searstown, Pa., January 10th, of consumption, Mrs.
EVELINE MARTIN, consort of Alexander Martin, and daughter of Ruth and Robert Hinds, in the 29th year of her age. She departed this life resigned to the will of her heavenly Father. W. E. M.

In —, October 17th, 1839, Mrs. SUSAN CRANSON, aged 54 years, 11 months and 29 days. Sermon by Rev.
Mr. Crane, (Methodist,) from Job iii: 17, 18, 19.

In Bainbridge, December 18th, Mrs. OLIVER EASON, aged 74 years. Mr. E. was one of the oldest members of our society in this place. He lived a consistent Universalist, and died triumphantly in the exercise of his glorious faith. Sermon by H. TORREY.

THE DUTIES OF YOUNG MEN, EXHIBITED IN SIX LECTURES.

BY E. H. CHAPIN.

The author of this work does not expect to surpass or to equal the valuable books upon the same subject already before the public. He does not pretend to set forth new ideas and duties. But his object is to do good—to impress the importance of right action, in every position and relation, upon the class whom he addresses. He would contribute his aid, such as it may be, in establishing the great principle of duty in the heart. He would humbly speak for his country and for the age—for righteousness and truth—for humanity, and for God.

The work consists of six Lectures, the topics of which are: 1. Self Duties. 2. Social Duties. 3. Duties as Citizzens. 4. Intellectual Duties. 5. Moral Duties. 6. Concluding Lecture.

It is calculated that it will form a book of not less than 200 pages, well printed and neatly bound. To be ready by the 15th of March. Price 50 cents. Seven copies for $3.
All those friendly to the object, are respectfully requested to use their exertions to circulate the work, and make returns as soon as convenient, to the publisher,

SECOND VOLUME LAYMAN'S LEGACY.

Below, the reader will find a notice from the author, of the second volume of the Legacy. Many have been the queries from different sections, in respect to it. Circumstances have prevented any definite notice of the time of its appearance being given. We can not say, positively, now, when it will be ready for delivery. Extraordinaries excepted, however, it will be out early in April.—N. Y. Chr.

DEDICATION.

TO POSTERITY—generations to come, when the living, who have festered in error, shall rot in their corruption; and TRUTH, rescued from the darkness of ages, shall be prized for its own sake—this work is inscribed by the AUTHOR.

We present below a Prospectus for a new work by the author of the Layman's Legacy. Any one familiar with the author's style, will not doubt his ability to wield a powerful pen on almost any subject that he takes hold of. We have not seen the MS. of the proposed work, but from some outline of it, have no doubt it will be ingenious and conclusive.
The terms will be 50 cents single—$5 per doz. It will be put to press as soon as the number of subscribers will warrant. Returns, therefore, should be made (post paid) to this office as early as convenient.—N. Y. Chr. Messenger.

PROPOSALS

For publishing by subscription, a work, to be entitled,

A CHOICE
BETWEEN TWO HORNS OF A DILEMMA; AN ESSAY

On the present Condition, and future Prospect of the Jews:

ADDRESSED TO THE DESCENDANTS OF ABRAHAM.
BY HENRY FITZ.

"If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

LUKE xvi: 31.

The contemplated work to be of the 18mo size, fine muslin binding, lettered, etc., and not to exceed 50 cents per single copy. To be published when the subscription shall authorize, etc.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered at the funeral of Mrs. Mary Clark, of Port Gibson, N. Y., in October last.

BY REV. K. TOWNSEND.

Infinite Wisdom, speaking to us all by the voice of inspiration, has declared that "it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting." To this solemn scene we are this day called. Death, the irresistible and invincible conqueror, has robbed you of an amiable citizen, an exemplary neighbor, a stedfast friend. This mourning circle weep over the remains of a dutiful daughter, an affectionate wife, an honored parent, a dear sister and a beloved friend.

During the last sickness of our deceased friend, and but a short time previous to her death, and in view of that event, she requested that I would perform the melancholy services allotted to me, and officiate upon the present occasion. It is for that purpose—that consolation may be ministered to the bereaved—that we may pay proper respect to departed worth—that we may mingle our sympathies with these afflicted friends—and this may be an occasion of profit to all—that we have now assembled. In such circumstances as these, I am ever constrained with Simon Peter to ask, "Lord, to whom shall we go but unto thee? Thou hast the words of eternal life"—and I am confident I can not discharge my duties as a Christian minister better, than by calling your attention to the purposes of God, through Jesus Christ, as revealed in the Gospel, while I, at the same time, perform the obligations of friendship, by presenting before you those hallowed and joyous truths, which animated the bosom of our departed friend—in the faith of which she lived—in the faith of which, she passed cheerfully through the dark valley and shadow of death rejoicing. To this end, I have made choice of that portion of sacred truth recorded Isaiah liii: 11—"He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities."

In forming our estimate of the meaning of our text, we must ascertain the objects of the mission of the Messiah—the nature of the work he came to perform, and the sufficiency of the means put into his hands for its accomplishment. We look back to the period of the first transgression, as the time when sin had its introduction into our world. At this same time, the destruction of sin was also promised, and typified by the bruising of the head of the serpent, through the seed of the woman. To Abraham, to Isaac and Jacob, the promise was confirmed; and they were instructed that in their seed, which is the Christ, all the families, the nations and the kindreds of the earth should be blessed. If sin be an evil, the destruction of sin would be a blessing. It is one of those evils to which all mankind have been subjected—all nations, families and kindreds of the earth have been brought under its dominion—and their situation furnishes an abundant reason why the remedy should be co-extensive with the disease. As time passed away, and the period approached when the Messiah was to make his appearance, the prophets appear to have been blessed with brighter and more extensive views of the salvation of God, and the glories of the Messiah's kingdom. This is done under a great variety of figures, and mankind are represented in various different situations. Sometimes they are denominated lost sheep, and our Lord is called the good shepherd. Sometimes they are represented as wanderers from God, in rebellion against him, unreconciled to him by wicked works, and the Son of God is called the Mediator, he who was to reconcile the world to God, to seek out and save the lost. Sometimes the Messiah is described as a king who was to establish a heavenly kingdom among mankind, and rule all nations in righteousness and equity. Sometimes he is represented as an instructor communicating a knowledge of God, his designs and purposes; confirming the united testimony of Holy Writ, that "the Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works."

We shall first cite you to some of those evidences which speak of him as a king. In considering our own situation, our absolute dependence upon God, and the abundant mercies which he ever has bestowed and is still conferring upon mankind, we all see that we owe him a debt of gratitude, and that to yield our unqualified obedience to him is but our reasonable service. That man has not rendered this service, is evident, not only from our own observation, but from his history since the morning of creation. Mankind were then the subjects of God's government; but in open rebellion against him and his laws. Our Lord was then clothed with the necessary powers, sent to instruct, and convince, and subdue these rebellious subjects—to be their governor and King in this spiritual kingdom, and when this work was accomplished, was to surrender up the kingdom to God the Father, that he should finally be all in all.

Micah, in allusion to our Lord, says, "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." Ezekiel also referring to the same subject, says, "And David my servant shall be king over them, and they shall all have one shepherd: they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes and do them." I have only to remark here, that the Jews who best understood their own language, supposed this text to refer to the Messiah, and to teach that he was to be descended from David.

We have thus established the fact that the prophets regarded the Messiah as a king, whose dominion should extend to the whole house of Israel. Simeon, in his prophetic declaration, elicited upon the occasion of receiving the infant Saviour in his arms, says, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever." But the dominion of Jesus as a king extended farther than this. David says the heathen were to be his inheritance, the uttermost parts of the earth his possession. In accordance with this is the testimony of Daniel. "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before them. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Thus you discover by the concurrent testimony of two of the prophets of God, that the kingdom established by the Messiah, was to be universal in its extent, and to include both the Jew and the Gentile—even all nations, and kindreds, and tongues, and people.

We might also here cite you to the presumptive evidence furnished by the prophet, of the final success of our exalted sovereign; but we choose to establish this by testimony too plain, too unequivocal, to admit either of doubt or denial. Paul, who speaks of the resurrection of mankind, and the consummation of the labors of our Saviour, says—"Then cometh the end"—we ask, When? "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, all authority and power." Now I would ask, and the question is an important one, can all rule, and authority and power be put down, while any part of the creation of God remains in rebellion against him, or while Satan continues to exercise an influence among mankind? Paul continues, "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy shall be destroyed, death." Here then we discover that all enemies, even the last, is to be destroyed, and the last is particularly named. Paul continues in the 28th verse. "And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also be subject unto him that did put all things under him, that God may be all in all."

Now let me inquire, what was the object of Messiah as a king? We answer, to subdue rebellious man—to destroy the enemy who had seduced him from his proper allegiance. This was the situation of all mankind—they were all rebels, and their rebellion produced the necessity for these efforts. The rebellion was universal. The means provided were for all—they were ample; and the success is as extensive as the means devised. All things are to be subdued unto the Saviour—not a part—and the subjection of all is of the same character. If voluntary in one, it is voluntary in every one. If extorted from one, it is extorted from all. If extorted from any, it is also extorted from our Lord; for the same term expresses his subjection to God, and ours to him.

But we go farther. The apostle Paul, speaking of Christ, says, "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God, the Father." Here, again, we have the strongest possible assurance of the triumphant success of our Lord in his kingdom, and of the subjection of all mankind to him.

Once more: this passage makes no distinctions—all are to bow, all are to acknowledge, all are to confess; and until the passage gives some intimation of a voluntary confession from some, and an extorted confession from a part, we shall consider ourselves warranted in believing and asserting, that Jesus shall be the King of all mankind, and all the human family shall be the subjects of his government. In short, that

"Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Does his successive journeys run;
His kingdom stretch from shore to shore,
Till moons shall wax and wane no more."

Jesus Christ is also spoken of by the prophets as a Priest. I have not time to trace the history of man, from that period when every father was the priest of his own family, to the time when certain persons were set apart for that particular office; or to recapitulate all the duties they were enjoined to perform. We may however say, that they were the instructors and teachers of the people, a medium of communication between God and man, and appointed to make intercession for (or rather on account of) the sins of the people. Isaiah, in the 61st chapter of his prophecy, gives us a description of the character of our Lord as a public teacher; and as the Saviour applies it to himself, we can receive it without the shade of doubt. "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn." Permit me here to remark, that man's ignorance produced the need of instruction—that his estrangement made the necessity for mediation, and he required reconciliation because he was unreconciled. This ignorance, estrangement and unreconciliation, was universal—extended to all men; and Jesus Christ, in all these characters, was sent to all mankind—to the bound, the captive and the broken-hearted; for these needed his assistance and his aid. With the communications of our Lord, you are all, I trust, acquainted. And all who are acquainted with them, have marked their exalted piety, their undeviating truth. You have also observed the kindness with which they were delivered, the heavenly charity which is breathed forth upon mankind, upon all occasions distilling upon them like the gentle dews from above. It was this, or rather all these combined, which led the multitude to hang with rapture upon his accents, to wonder at the gracious words which proceeded from his lips, and to bear willing testimony that "never man spake as this man."

Paul, in Hebrews, 2d chapter, speaking of Christ, says: "Wherefore, in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people." Now it seems evident that man's unreconciliation to God, arises from his ignorance and sinfulness. You will understand that we do not subscribe to the doctrine of God's unreconciliation to man, because the Scriptures every where represent man, and not God, as the unreconciled party. Jesus Christ was, then, as a faithful high priest, to institute the necessary means to effect this reconciliation. Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians, says it pleased the Father, by him, (that is, Jesus Christ,) to reconcile all things to himself—and he also, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, calls the ministry of the Gospel, the ministry of reconciliation. "And hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation, to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself"—(not himself to the world, but the world unto himself) "not imputing their trespasses unto them." It would then appear that it was the design and purpose of God, through Jesus Christ to reconcile, not a part, but all things to himself. He being a faithful high priest, will perfect the objects of his mission, and accomplish the design of the Father, or else our Heavenly Father imposed a work upon him, without giving him adequate means, or adequate powers, for its accomplishment. To assert this, would be to charge with folly the Fountain of all wisdom, and to contradict the evidence of Holy Writ, which informs us, that all power was given to the Saviour, both in heaven and in earth; as well as the declaration of the Son of God himself, "I have finished the work thou gavest me to do."

To say that God sent his Son to reconcile all things to himself, and that by reconciling a part he accomplished what he came to do, would be an inconsistency of too glaring a nature to escape observation. Now the evidence is just as positive that God sent his Son to reconcile all, as it is that he designed through him to reconcile one—and the evidence of the reconciliation of the whole, is as plainly asserted, as the reconciliation of any number, however small.

Christ is also spoken of as a mediator and intercessor. In the chapter which contains our text, Isaiah speaks of Christ as making intercession for the transgressors. Let it be understood that if there were no transgression, intercession would not be needed. John also speaks of him, and says, "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world." Paul also, informs us that "there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." I have introduced these evidences, that all may see that they harmonize to the letter, with those already produced, and that such a scheme as the benefit of merely a part—the mediation for, or reconciliation of but a few—had its origin any where but in the councils of Infinite Wisdom. God has never revealed it.

We are now to speak of Christ in the character of a Saviour. Our previous remarks in relation to the condition of mankind, will supersede the necessity of any thing farther to show their need of salvation. Jesus Christ is frequently spoken of as a Saviour by the prophets, and the angel who announced his conception, declared, "thou shalt call his name Jesus, (or Saviour, that being the meaning of the word,) for he shall save his people from their sins." It then appears that Christ's people are sinners, and need salvation. We next inquire, what, and how many sinners, belong to him? and the answer is, all that he came to save—all that the Father gave to him. Appealing to the testimony, we find that these were all things—the heathen and the uttermost parts of the earth. This evidence is continually corroborated and confirmed, by our Lord, his disciples, and the inspired writers of the Epistles of the New Testament. John said, on beholding Christ, "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." Again says the same writer, in his Epistle, "For we have seen, and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." And so also our Lord himself—"I came not to judge the world, but to save the world." And those who listened to his teachings declared, "For we have heard him ourselves, and we know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world." Here is the evidence of John twice repeated, confirmed by the Son of God himself, and also by the declarations of those who heard him, and all this must establish, beyond a question, that God sent Jesus Christ to save the world, and that he is the Saviour of the world. I remark, although it seems to me unnecessary, that the world can not be saved, while a part of that world is lost—or that Jesus Christ can not be their Saviour, unless he saves them—any more than a man can be the giver of that which he offers, and yet retains in his own possession.

We shall not leave this part of our subject, without offering further evidence to confirm our views of the salvation of God through Jesus Christ. Our Lord declares that he came down from Heaven to do the will of his Father, and Paul informs us that God "will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth." It would appear that nothing would be necessary to settle the question of the eventual salvation of all men, except to decide that Christ will accomplish what he came to do, and his own testimony is direct to the point—"I have finished the work thou gavest me to do."

But there is still farther confirmation of the salvation of all men, elicited in the delineation of the character of Christ as a destroyer. Yes, brethren, as a destroyer; for our Lord, in the accomplishment of his mission, is not only to save mankind from their sins, but is also to destroy both the devil and his works; and we are informed, that he took part in flesh and blood, that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage. Again says John, "For this purpose was the son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." Here you perceive that the character of Christ, both as a Saviour and a destroyer, harmonizes—that in both we have an assurance of the deliverance of mankind from the power and bondage of the enemy—of their salvation from death and sin, and their subjection to the mild sceptre of the Prince of Peace. We have shown that the salvation, the reconciliation of the world was the purpose of God—that he sent his Son to save the world—that as a King, a Priest, mediator and intercessor, he has performed the duties of his office—and that his reign in his mediatorial kingdom shall continue, until it shall result in the accomplishment of all the benevolent purposes of Heaven. The evidence which we have presented is far very far from including all that might have been produced to establish and confirm our views. We, however, believe it to be sufficient, and more than sufficient, to warrant us in believing and teaching the final holiness and happiness of all created intelligences.

Once more—in the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, brought to light in the Gospel, and witnessed in the triumphant resurrection of our Master from the tomb, we see a blessed, a triumphant evidence that he shall, indeed, see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. Then all who died in Adam shall be made alive in Christ—all who have borne the image of the earthy, shall also bear the image of the heavenly—this corruptible shall put on incorruption—this mortal must put on immortality—the kingdoms of the earth subdued to the dominion of the Saviour, shall be given up to the Father; and God—the fountain of all purity and benevolence—God shall be all in all. When this glorious end shall be accomplished—when the empire of death shall be annihilated, and death himself be destroyed, eternal life and immortal purity shall crown each child of Adam's race. Then shall the important inquiry—the solemn question, be propounded—"O Grave, where is thy victory? O Death, where is thy sting?" But there shall be none to answer. But from a redeemed and ransomed world, shall be heard the song of triumph—"Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

You can not but perceive that such views of God and his character, of the Redeemer and the objects of his mission, are pre-eminently calculated to fill the heart with enduring and well-grounded confidence, and the mind with lasting peace. It was an understanding confidence in the perfections of God, an unwavering and steadfast trust in the Redeemer, which pre-eminently distinguished our amiable and departed sister in the faith of a world's salvation. In the hour of health, in the season of prosperity, she gave to this subject an earnest and careful attention. From the pages of the Sacred Volume she learned that God was her Father—the Father of all created intelligences. Here, too, she was taught that Christ was her Redeemer—yea, the Redeemer and Saviour of the world—and in view of the means devised in the councils of Infinite Wisdom for the accomplishment of an end so glorious, she confidently believed that he who tasted death for every man, and gave himself a ransom for all, should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied.

This was to her, no powerless system, but an active, living faith—a faith which worked by love and purified the heart—calling into exercise all the benevolent feelings of the soul, and dictating her well directed efforts for the welfare and happiness of the children of humanity. This faith threw its hallowed influence around her, in all her intercourse with her family, her relatives, friends and neighbors. It enabled her to meet the unavoidable trials of life without repining—to sympathize with the afflictions of others—rejoicing with those who did rejoice, and weeping with those who wept.

In the prospect of death—in the period of her dissolution, and in the struggles of dissolving nature—her faith was, indeed, an anchor to her soul, sure and stedfast. She was confident, that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature should be able to separate her from the love of God which is in Jesus Christ our Lord. O it is in such solemn scenes as this, that the Christian's hope and the Christian's confidence shines in all its native lustre—enables the wasting sufferer to come off conqueror and more than conqueror! I would that all might have seen, as many saw, the influence of unwavering and stedfast faith, in the perfect resignation and undisturbed composure of our dying friend—that faith which had sustained her in life, rose upon the future, the star of promise, to cheer her passage through the dark valley and the shadow of death. Cheerfully did she commend herself, her bereaved husband, her beloved child, her affectionate parents, her fond brothers and sisters, her dear friends, to the kind care of the great, universal Parent, and in the confidence of a blissful meeting in that bright spirit-world of endless and immortal joy, she peacefully fell asleep.

Such we believe to be the legitimate influence of the blessed doctrine of the restitution—such is the character, and such the blessed influence of a true knowledge of God, and confidence in the Redeemer. If you would be cheered by such hopes in life, sustained by such hopes in the hour of your departure, give to the subject, I entreat you, an earnest, careful, prayerful attention.

EZEKIEL XXXVII: 9.

Br. GROSH—In my last, I told you that I did not often write for publication unless compelled by a strong sense of duty—or words to that amount. At the time I wrote my last to you, I did not think that I should so soon find myself under this obligation. But the subject is before me which compels me to take up my pen again. It may be found in the xvii number of "THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS"—extracted for publication "BY REV. E. E. GUILD." The clause in these Theological Extracts which has struck me so forcibly, is headed with a text taken from Ezek. xxxvii: 9. "Then said he unto me, prophecy unto the wind; prophecy, son of man, and say to the wind, thus saith the Lord God; come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live."

Before going into an examination of the extracts which follow this text, we must take the liberty to say, that they are almost literally, word for word, the arguments I have heard atheists make use of in the support of their belief in the total extinction of man, at death; and were they correct inferences from the text, I should believe it to have been from an atheist!—and to be about the strongest argument that could be adduced in support of atheism! But let us now commence with the extracts.

"Here we see that the difference between a dead man, and a living one, is nothing more than the property of breathing." If this can be seen in the text, as applying to the whole man, mortal and spiritual; it must be seen through the medium of some Theological spectacles that never were borrowed from Christianity. That this was the writer's view of the subject will appear from the next sentence. "Nothing is said about an immaterial, immortal soul entering into them, or of any such thing having formerly belonged to them, and having been in some other place while the body was dead." Here the writer is again perverting the text, carrying the idea that it was speaking of the literally dead being brought to life again. That nothing was said in the text about an 'immaterial, immortal soul,' is pretty strong evidence that the prophet was wholly and totally on another subject. In truth, I can not perceive where the least evidence can be found, either in the text or context, to support such a position. Again:

"Nor is any such thing said either in the Old or New Testament in relation to any individual who was literally raised from the dead." This is an assertion not founded in fact, for it is so said, or implied in the only case, as I believe, spoken of in the Scriptures, where the literally dead was raised to life, viz., in the resurrection of Jesus.

If the writer of the above extract, had reference to the "lad" raised from supposed literal death, by Elisha; or to Lazarus, raised from the same state, in appearance, by Jesus, I am inclined to believe that his evidence rests more upon tradition, and the prejudice arising from education, than from any substantial facts to be found either in Scripture, reason, or common sense. Let us, for examination, take the case of Lazarus, (St. John xi: 4). "When Jesus heard that" (Lazarus was sick) "he said, this sickness was not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby." Again, verse 11, . . . "and after that he saith unto them, our friend Lazarus sleepeth." I know it is said in ver. 13, "Howbeit Jesus spake of his death." But I do not believe that Jesus ever contradicted himself, and I take it that he only meant a death like sleep, which would probably have ended in literal death, had it not been in the power of Jesus to heal all complaints. It appears that Lazarus had lain four days in the grave, and Martha would have been right, when she said to Jesus—"Lord, by this time he stinketh," if animal life had been totally extinct in the body of Lazarus. But the Great Physician, at a word, set the animal functions in operation again in the body of Lazarus, and he came forth, to all appearance, as though he had been raised from literal death.

If the "lad," resuscitated by Elisha; and Lazarus, awakened by Jesus, were absolutely and literally dead; how can it be said that Jesus was the first raised from the dead?—Would the raising of him to Heaven, after being raised from the dead, answer the Scripture meaning of the matter? I should think not. But again:

"All that constitutes them or constitutes us living, thinking, animated beings, is the breath of life, which was imparted to them, and is imparted to us." So far the writer of the extracts is correct, and had he stopped here, his remarks would have been free from a leaning toward atheism. But he goes on to say—"And unless it can be shown that this principle of life possessed consciousness and identity before its connection with the body, we can never admit that it possesses these qualities after the dissolution of the body." This last extract is one of the strong arguments relied upon by atheists against immortality, and a future state of existence.

I must say to the writer of the above extract, that he is begging the question. It does not follow, that because the spirit, or immortal part of man, knew nothing before its creation with the body, it therefore has no identity when animal life becomes extinct. To suppose that it had this anterior identity, to carry out the hypothesis, we should have to suppose, that in some part of Heaven there must be a large magazine of ready made spirits, continually flitting down "to seek their bodies here;" or, being thus garnered up merely as baby spirits, they are too weak in memory to recollect from whence they came. This extract from our writer does not merit a serious consideration. Let us therefore pass on.

"The life and immortality brought to light by the Gospel, is grounded on the Bible doctrine of the resurrection from the dead; but if the doctrine of the soul's immortality be true, what necessity for the resurrection?"

This is the knotty concern about which there is much disagreement among Christians—a disagreement, however, as much about its details, as concerning its general principles. It is well known to the reader of the Advocate, that I disagree with a majority of my brethren, on this subject. It should be remembered, however, that I am but a lay brother, and not a learned priest; and if I am right, and they wrong, it should be attributed in me more to the absence of pre-conceived notions, imbibed from tradition and education, than from an equal chance in the study of Theology.

But let us inquire into the scope and meaning of the words "Brought to light" &c. Was this a new principle that did not before exist, when thus brought to light? If so, it should have read—"The life and immortality created with the Gospel by the resurrection of Jesus." But having been "brought to light," it appears evident to me that it was no new "life and immortality," but a principle created with the first man, and attached to the whole race thereafter; but not being understood, it was necessary that it should be proved by an example—that the veil should be taken off of the principle, and the existing reality fairly brought to view, so that it might be clearly seen and understood. A diamond, is a diamond, whether in a mine in Golconda, or in the hand of a lapidary, after the dirt is all brushed off. Again:

"But if the doctrine of the soul's immortality be true, what necessity for the resurrection?" I answer—none at all, except that of Jesus. Suppose a man in Utica had a large estate bequeathed to him by some person in England, and that the will of the testator should not be known to the Utica man for many years thereafter, would the estate be any the less his from the want of this knowledge? Surely not. This "light" must be brought to his view, before he could receive present enjoyment therefrom. A future salvation there always was, but mankind were lacking a present salvation, until the resurrection of Jesus. This is all the resurrection of the body of any person that ever did take place, and all the resurrection of a body, in my humble opinion, that ever will take place. The body of Jesus was not contaminated by sin—it was free from corruption, and therefore could be resuscitated without doing violence to the order of nature. To suppose that the dead bodies of mankind—crumbled into dust, and scattered to the four winds of heaven, are to be gathered together, and out of this dust to form spiritual bodies, is a supposition as distant from the truth, in my opinion, as the Throne of the Most High, is from his footstool, the earth. If not so, why not go the whole length with the Partialists—have a general resurrection—a general judgment, and all the paraphernalia of casting up accounts, and balancing the same? I wot well how we should all stand—in the vocative, no doubt.

I fully believe in all the resurrection meant to be "brought to light," in the Scriptures, to wit, the resurrection of Jesus. I can not discover in the tenor of Scripture, either the necessity, or propriety, of any other resurrection. That we shall all be "changed—in the twinkling of an eye," I fully believe—that we shall all be clothed with spiritual bodies, is also certain; but that this new garment is to be made out of the old one, I do not believe.

The text quoted by our writer, has the same application as the figure of the dry bones in the same chapter immediately above it. The same, also, as in chapter xii of Daniel. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth" [enveloped in their earthly character, and steeped in sin and unrighteousness] "shall awake, some to everlasting life" [to acknowledge and believe in the Gospel of Jesus, which is life], "and some to shame and everlasting contempt" [a destruction of their ritual, and ceremonies, and all they held dear—a dispersion among all nations—becoming a "by word and reproach."]

The writer of the extracts, in the close, alluded to these passages; but how they should have led him into the quagmires of materialism, is more than I can understand. Not a particle of evidence could he gather from his text, to support his position.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.
NUMBER XXI.

DANIEL 9th chap.—In this chapter we have a prophecy which has occasioned more difficulty to interpreters than any other in this book, or any other in the Scriptures, owing, as Dr. Priestly says, "to an error in the numbers of our present Hebrew copies."

There can be no doubt, however, that this prophecy relates to the Jews, and to the coming of the Messiah, as will be shown by a particular examination of this celebrated prophecy.

Verse 24. "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy."

Let us inquire, 1st, What is meant by the seventy weeks?

Among the Jews there were Sabbatical days, whereby their days were divided into weeks of days, i. e., 7 days for one week; there were also sabbatical years, whereby their years were divided into weeks of years, and this last sort of weeks is that here mentioned; so that every one of these weeks contains 7 years, and the whole number of 70 weeks contains 490 years, at the end whereof, this appointed time expired. All this was accomplished at the death of Christ.

The rest of the passage will be understood by paraphrasing it thus. 1st. To finish (or restrain) transgressions. 2d. To make an end of sin—i. e. accomplish the work and establish a system of religion which should finally bring sin to an end, by reconciling all to God. 3d. To make reconciliation for iniquity. 4th. To bring in everlasting righteousness. 5th. To seal up or complete and fulfil vision and prophecy. 6th. To anoint the most holy. All this was accomplished by the great work of our Lord Jesus, and completed by his death and resurrection.

The end of these weeks being thus fixed at the death of Christ, it doth necessarily determine us where to place the beginning of them—that is 490 years before—and therefore, the death of Christ falling in the year of the Julian period, 4746, and in the Jewish month Nisan, or March, if we reckon 490 years backward, this will lead us up to the month Nisan 4256, which was the very year and month in which Ezra had the commission from Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, for his return to Jerusalem to restore the church and state of the Jews. Now let us read

Verse 25. "Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and three score and two weeks—the street shall be built again, and the wall even in troublesome times."

Verse 26. "And after three score and two weeks, shall Messiah be cut off," etc.

Verse 27. "And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week," etc.

Now let it be observed, that there were four decrees or commandments given to restore Jerusalem, the first, by Cyrus, in the first year of his reign; the second by Darius in the fourth year of his reign; the third by Artaxerxes to Ezra in the seventh year of his reign, and the fourth by the same Artaxerxes to Nehemiah in the twentieth year of his reign. But this computation could not begin from that of Cyrus, because if they begin from thence, they can not by a great many years reach the events predicted. Nor can they begin from the decree of Darius, Hystaspes, for the same reason as above; nor from the decree granted to Nehemiah, because this would extend the time beyond the destruction of Jerusalem. It must therefore be computed from the decree granted to Ezra.

It will be seen that this prophecy is divided into three branches, or periods, viz.—the 1st foretells events to take place within seventy weeks in general, and to be fully completed at the end of them. The second foretells events to be accomplished precisely at the end of three particular periods; and the 3d. events to be brought to pass after the expiration of the said seventy weeks, in the times immediately following.

These periods are divided in the following manner:

1. "From the going forth of the commandment, etc., to the coming of Messiah, should be seven weeks and three score and two weeks"—that is 483 years. In the first seven weeks or 49 years, the church and state of the Jews should be established, notwithstanding the troublesome times from opposition of their enemies, and in three score and two weeks, or 434 years from the end of the seven weeks or 49 years, the Messiah should come, and after three score and two weeks he should be cut off—i. e., after confirming the covenant with many for one week, or seven years, which must be reckoned from the time of the first preaching of the Gospel by his forerunner John; for St. Luke tells us, "The word of God first came to John in the 15th year of Tiberius Cesar." And from the coming of that word to John and his preaching of it to the Jews was the beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the first appearance of his kingdom on earth. This Christ himself tells us. See Luke xvi: 16. "The law and the prophets were until John, since that the kingdom of God is preached," etc.

This confirming of the covenant, then, began with the preaching of John; and continued under him three years and a half, and continued under our Saviour's ministry three years and a half more, which made seven years or one week, at the end of which time he was put to death, and the whole prophecy was fulfilled; and as he did not begin his personal ministry, until the middle of the week of years, hence the propriety of the expression in verse 27; "and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease." This he did virtually when he commenced his personal ministry, and really when at the end of the same he offered up himself once for all.

"LA MARGUERITE."

To the Young Ladies of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

DEAR GIRLS—In the last number of our paper I informed you, that I had selected five subjects connected with your duties as students, upon which it was my intention to address you in the five succeeding numbers of La Marguerite. In apologizing for a choice of subjects so commonplace, and so little interesting in comparison with others that might have been chosen, I asked you to believe that I found my motives in the relation that I bear to you. That relation admonishes me to seek to instruct, rather than amuse. By calling up in my feelings an affectionate solicitude for the happiness of the present, and every future period of your lives, it excites the wish to blend with the illustrations of science, the salutary lessons of virtue. I would do my part to convince you that the true glory of existence lies in its responsibilities; and its only enduring happiness, in making ourselves worthy of them.

My subject for this evening is, your duty to the Institution to which you now belong. You will not understand me, that I consider you under greater obligations to this Institution, than you would be to any properly established school, at which you might be pursuing the usual means of obtaining an education. My subject admits of a general application, but it is not the less particular in its application to you, and the Clinton Liberal Institute.

I have heard many parting admonitions from parents and friends, and witnessed much in the conduct of scholars which had its motive in principle; but I have seldom known the reputation of the school, to be urged or acted upon, as an inducement to propriety of conduct. That is generally supposed to rest with the teachers, and constituted guardians. It does rest with them and it should; but it would be better for the cause of education, and for individual character, if students could always feel that they, too, are responsible. Children are early taught that the honor of the family to which they belong, depends upon the conduct of its members. So strong is this feeling, that where the spirit of domestic virtue is wanting in a household, its appearance will frequently be maintained, through fear of losing the title to respectability. And why may not a similar principle, find active exercise in such little communities as this of ours? Why should not "my school" be almost as sacred with you as "my home"? The former has not, it is true, all the endearments of the latter. It has none of those far back recollections, and far forward dependencies, which make a home for the heart; yet, for the time being, life has no happier period for the enjoyment of the pure affections—no fairer scene for the exercise of "whatsoever things are lovely and of good report," than a school association of young ladies. Here must be called into requisition, those great virtues which are so indispensable to the usefulness of life—industry, perseverance, patience. Here, too, is constant employment for those most successful teachers of the graces—cheerfulness, humility, kindness, charity. The hopes that rise up here, grasp the purest and brightest things of earth: and memories may here be gathered up in the soul; that shall have power to correct the imperfections of nature, and keep in exercise high and happy motives of conduct, to the last hour of life. Fill up the picture that I have presented to you, now, if you please, with the innocent pleasures of happy hearts: the kindness of mutual assistance; the buoyancy, beauty, and freshness of early feeling; and ask yourselves, if, with the pleasures, and the gratitude awakened by the thought, that such is the present of your existence, there should not also come a sense of duty to the Institution, by which you are placed in a scene so productive of enjoyment in the present, and so full of rich promise for the future. Let it be the home feeling, dear girls. Bring with you for the few months in which you are here associated, the spirit that would guard the domestic name from reproach, to exert its hallowing influence for the good of your school.

There is reason in this appeal. You have not yet laid aside all the simplicity—the beautiful simplicity of childhood; nor do you wish to throw off entirely its restraints. Here as in the home government, there is authority to direct; not in the pride of power, but for the good of the governed. You, as children in a well regulated family, are bound to respect this authority, to perform the tasks allotted to you, and to submit cheerfully to the regulations that are made for the good of the whole.

I can read what is now passing in your thoughts. You are ready to answer me with the inquiry—Have we not done this? Pardon me, young ladies, for thus seeming to doubt it. I am not writing to remind you of neglected duties, but to give you an additional and higher motive for their performance; for I would have you enjoy the full reward of well-doing. It is not enough for you to feel that your good conduct is a benefit to yourselves, and a gratification to the affectionate care of your friends; you may have the happiness of believing, that by the faithful performance of your duty as scholars, you are giving character to the Institution to which you belong, and the kindest encouragement to those who watch over its interests.

I do not exaggerate your influence. Schools, like individuals, must possess a reputation, in order to do good; and the reputation of every school must depend upon the progress made by the pupils in their studies, and upon their moral character. In regard to the first, much undoubtedly depends upon academical advantages—much upon the authority to enforce habits of industry—much upon the facility of the teacher to impart instruction; but much more upon the inclination of the scholar. It is so easy to obtain knowledge, that one who earnestly wishes to gain it, will, even amidst discouragements; while all advantages combined, will effect but little with that mind which has no wish to be instructed.—Here, then, the most important point in securing the reputation of a school is to be obtained by the exertions of each individual composing it. You can not be allowed even the poor pleasure of believing that you belong to a merely useless minority—that other and better scholars will give a character to the Institution while you are permitted to remain in obscurity; for so active is the principle of human sympathy, so powerful the force of example, that you must exert an influence. If you are idle or frivolous, your follies must intrude upon the time of others, and you will be sure of finding some, weak enough to be injured by your example. When you leave school, you will find spheres of action in different circles of society, and it is not merely your example here, but the amount of good that you carry away, that is to advance the honor of the institution.

The virtues most necessary to establish the moral character of a school, are, a quiet and devoted attention to school pursuits—respect for authority, and peace and fellowship among the members. I am fully sensible of the weighty responsibilities laid upon those who are expected to exert a moral influence over the minds of scholars, but this can not be supposed to release you from obligations. In a school like this, no close and constant scrutiny can be exercised over you. You are bound, it is true, to regulate your conduct according to a few general principles. But to do, or not to do, a thousand things which may materially affect those with whom you are associated, and through them the Institution to which you belong, is left to your own sense of right and wrong. Have you ever thought what a train of misunderstandings, jealousies, and resentments may be called up by one little slander, or even one idle remark; or what calumnies may be suppressed, and how much bitterness may be soothed by an amiable use of the noble faculty of speech? In your school pursuits, what additional inducements to do wrong, may follow from one act of disobedience; or how many ambitious resolutions may rise up even at the graceful recitation of one well-conned lesson. How much gloom may be thrown over a whole school by the murmurs of the discontented; or how well those days pass away when we live in "the sunshine of kind looks," and listen only to "the music of kind voices."

In another and very important particular, the conduct of the scholar will have an effect upon the prosperity of the school. Teachers, and particularly teachers of high schools for young ladies, need encouragement, for they meet perplexities at almost every step, some of them of the most discouraging kind. Perhaps I shall be permitted to say, that I have felt these discouragements as much as any other person. I do not say it in the spirit of complaint, for I love the profession with all its difficulties. It is for your sakes, young ladies, that I say it. In the severest trials that I have ever suffered as a teacher, I have found in your love a support that I might have looked for elsewhere in vain. To some of you, and to others who hear me not, I owe very much. Your sympathy was not the momentary expression of a weak and easily excited sensibility. It was the proud acting up to the decisions of the understanding, and the high impulses of womanly feeling—and so efficient an assistance have I found it, in the discharge of my duties, that I consider it but an act of justice to give you this public expression of my thanks.

My object, young ladies, in what I have written for this evening, is, to impress you with a sense of what you owe to the institutions which have been established for your benefit. Your duties are not hard of comprehension and difficult of performance. They are completely within the range of your thoughts and feelings. Your teachers need a more heartfelt encouragement than it is possible for them to receive from constitutional laws, or public guardians; but they will more than realise it, in your love of improvement, and your kind regard for their feelings. Your school needs a character for scholarship and virtue. Cheerful submission to authority, energy in intellectual pursuits, and kindness to each other, will secure that character.

If it were necessary to convince you that your happiness depends upon your attention to these duties, I should only remind you of their importance. Go forward with me, twenty, thirty, or forty years in the history of the world. The arts will have attained to a still higher degree of perfection. Science will have continued its researches, and wonders, undreamed of now, will be but common things. Man will have suffered no pause in the race of enterprise; and woman—what will woman be then? It is a heart-stirring question; one that sends the thought back to the institutions of education for our sex, with an earnest appeal to such as you and your younger sisters, that the women of the next generation may not find cause in their want of assimilation to the character of the age, to reproach the young ladies of this.

Shall I not be pardoned now, for asking your interest in the female department of the Clinton Liberal Institute? It needs your care. It has ever been struggling with difficulties; and it has probably many more to surmount. But good and true hearts are praying for its success, and it will yet be all that it should. Certain I am, that it will, if all the pure and bright ones, who congregate here, will give us, while they remain, the power of a good example; and leave a blessing for us when they go. L. M. B.

CONSISTENCY.

I met an old lady a few days since, whom I had not seen for several months past. She affected to be very glad to see me, and after a number of soft and flattering words, said, "Well, they say you have backslidden and become a Universalist. Now do tell me," said she, "is it possible for you to believe such an absurd doctrine as this. Why it is contrary to the Bible, to the will of God, and it is contrary to reason and tradition." Very well, thought I, you have hit it at last, and none the worse for that. But she continued—"Oh, my very heart aches for you, and my prayer to God is, that he may convince you of the awful error before it is everlastingly too late. Oh! that I could convince you of your awful situation." Well, said I, I presume you will pray for me, and do all that is in your power to effect my salvation. "O yes," said she, "I will pray for you with all the fervor of my heart, and for all, who like you are groping in darkness. I will pray that God will have mercy upon them."

Here we parted, and as I sat musing upon what had just been said, I could not avoid thinking how admirably she lived up to the doctrine she professed to believe. For this same woman who here had professed so much friendship and sympathy for me, and who would so willingly do all that was in her power to promote my future welfare and everlasting salvation, has (mark the difference) when my face was turned from her, reported some of the most base and slanderous falsehoods that she could manufacture or conceive to injure my reputation and my religion. And why? Because I have embraced the doctrine of universal salvation and renounced the doctrine of endless misery.

Thus it is. She believes that God is all mercy, and teaches us to do good to them that hate us, but will not set the example himself. Thus it is with her. She will be extremely good in my presence and exhort me to live a godly life, and pretend to be very much interested in my future happiness, then turn from my face, and try to rob me of that which I prize above all the riches of this world—a good name.

Again. She said if she had the power she would not suffer one human soul to be lost. So according to her doctrine, she is more merciful than He who is infinite in mercy, i. e., she believes that God who is all love and mercy, will behold millions of his own children suffering the indescribable pangs of a never ending hell without lending them the least assistance, but mock at their entreaties, thus refusing to return good for evil. Oh, sister, should this ever meet your eyes for perusal, stop one moment after you have read it, and think of the consistency of your doctrine and your professions of friendship towards me, and above all forbear to slander, if it does not belong to your creed. #### PENCILLED PASSAGES.....No. I.

BR. GROSH—It is the habit of many readers to mark with a pencil such passages of the books they read as they think worthy of observation, either for excellence or absurdity, in order to call their own attention, or that of future readers, to those passages. With your permission I will send you now and then some of these Pencilled Passages. T. C.

Clinton Liberal Institute.

Although the following passage, from Dr. Rush's Medical Inquiries, may not be necessary for those (real) Universalists who read your paper, yet it may be useful to some good Christians of other denominations. "If the disease [hypochondriasm] be derived from a sense of guilt, it is generally connected with ignorance or erroneous opinions in religion. The former must be removed, by advising the visits of a sensible and enlightened clergyman. The latter consist, generally, in our patient's believing one or both the following errors: 1. That he is excluded from the divine mercy by an irrevocable decree of the Supreme Being; or, in other words, that he was created on purpose to be made miserable for ever. The second error believed by our patient is, that he has committed the unpardonable sin. To the first error we may reply, that there is no pagan opinion more contrary to nature and reason, and to the whole tenor, as well as the most consistent interpretation of the Scriptures, than the doctrine of men being called into existence on purpose to endure the pains of eternal misery. To the second error we may reply, that no two divines agree in what constitutes the unpardonable sin; that many wise and good men believe it is not possible to commit it, in the present state of the Gospel dispensation, and all divines agree that no "man had committed it, who was afraid he had." It is of consequence to a physician to be fully prepared upon the subjects of the two errors that I have named, for they are the two principal causes of religious hypochondriasm."—"Medical Inquiries and Observations upon the Diseases of the Mind, by Benjamin Rush, M. D." Phil. edit. 1830.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

One of the most beautifully printed periodicals in the country—it always fulfils its engagements, in furnishing original engravings, etc., and is always chaste and elegant in its contents. From its prospectus for the next volume, we copy the following extract and its conditions. What it promises to do, it has done in the years past; and the engravings promised gratis to new subscribers, are all they are said to be. A. B. G.

As a refined and elegant repository of the belles lettres, embracing every subject within the range of polite literature and the fine arts, the NEW-YORK MIRROR has received the spontaneous and universal commendation, not only of the press of the United States, but of Great Britain.

The first number of a new volume, of this beautiful parlor journal, will be issued on the twenty seventh day of June next, at which time, as the work is generally bound at the end of the year, it is desirable that NEW SUBSCRIBERS should commence their subscription. As it is the intention of the proprietor to print no more copies than shall be required, this early notice is given in order to prevent the disappointment that usually takes place in applications for the first numbers of a NEW VOLUME.

CONDITIONS.—The MIRROR is published every Saturday, at No. 1. Barclay-street, next door to Broadway. It is elegantly printed in the extra super-royal quarto form, with brevier, minion, and nonpareil type. It is embellished once every three months, with a SPLENDID SUPER-ROYAL QUARTO ENGRAVING, and every week with a popular piece of music, arranged for the piano-forte, harp, guitar, etc. For each volume an exquisitely engraved vignette title-page, and a copious index, are furnished. The terms are FIVE DOLLARS per annum, payable, in all cases, IN ADVANCE. It is forwarded by the earliest mails to subscribers residing out of the city of New-York. Communications, POST PAID, must be addressed to the editor. No subscriptions received for a less period than one year,

NEW SUBSCRIBERS

Will be furnished, gratuitously, with proof copies of two of the most MAGNIFICENT ENGRAVINGS ever published in this country painted by CHAPMAN, and engraved by DANFORTH; the first being a representation of the "Landing of Columbus in the New World," as described by WASHINGTON IRVING; and the second the "Landing at Jamestown, in Virginia," as described by the Hon. J. K. PAULDING, the present Secretary of the Navy. These BEAUTIFUL PICTURES are intended either for framing or for the port folio, and are particularly valuable, not only as illustrating the writings of two EMINENT AUTHORS by AMERICAN ARTISTS; but as perpetuating events in the history of this country interesting to every person of taste and refinement, and to all who feel a pride in their native land.

Post-Masters generally are requested to act as agents for the work.

Remember, all letters ordering the MIRROR, must contain $5, and be post paid, and that

The terms are always in advance.

LAZY CHRISTIANS.

I am not certain that the moral world contains any such anomaly, and hence I do not design to hit any body in particular, unless it be the very one who thinks I mean him. I have sometimes thought, that if there were any stray sheep in the kingdom, who were afflicted with the disease of laziness, they had proportionately departed from the influence of divine truth. But as there are often exceptions to general rules, there may be in this, especially as it is like all other human rules liable to imperfection.

Taking this exception, then, as a plausible one, we will take a peep at lazy Christians. And what a wonderful race of beings they are, particularly if they bear any resemblance to other lazy people! A practically lazy man expects to live upon the industry of others. Consequently he delights to see others busy, society prosperous, and the times easy. Hence it is not unfrequent to see them in the wealthiest and best regulated communities. Taking this for our criterion, let us look at the lazy Christian. He wishes to see religion prosper, but the reason is because he is averse to religious effort himself, and can more easily escape being called upon for his aid; not his dollars and cents merely, but that hearty co-operation, and that active influence which are necessary to satisfy the community that his dollars and cents are freely given. Others, perhaps, (it is not necessary for us to be positive on this point,) will baulk on both points. Cents and sense will not last long with lazy men. It is therefore necessary that they should spin out their means as far as possible, so that the exhaustion of brain and pocket may not go to loggerheads. We may however venture to say, that those who are too lazy to inquire into the claims of religion upon themselves, or the benefits which they indirectly derive from it, are seldom prepared to say how much they owe towards its support, or whether they shall not be doing wrong to cast their whole influence decidedly in favor of any of the many applicants for their aid. They will offer, now and then, a cent, if you wish, because that is not much loss any way, but if you call for sense, they are off.

As it is not very agreeable to contemplate such aberrations from consistency, so neither is it agreeable to their subjects to contemplate themselves. And as we began this article with the kindest intentions to the unfortunate who do not like to be gazed at, (if any such there be,) we will endeavor to point out the only antidote which is admissible in an article written to just nobody at all. We venture the more freely, because premature advice is better than none at all.

It has become so customary to make excuses for neglect of duty, that even the plea of laziness is considered quite a laughable matter. This affords an opportunity of telling a truth, which most people will doubt, because it would be a dishonor to us if true. If a farmer has failed to secure his crops, or to collect his notes till outlawed; if an editor sends out but half a sheet to his patrons, if a patron sends half the price of his paper to an editor, with a request to discontinue, and makes him pay postage on that—and a thousand other ifs, which the reader is requested to supply—he may frankly say, he supposes it is all on account of his laziness, and never once be suspected of having told the truth. It will be thought that if he was really lazy he would not own it, because the laziest of all God's creatures never own that fault, but seek to screen themselves from criticism on the ground of being gentlemen. Now why can not the Christian take knowledge of the ways of the world? Ask him why he was not at meeting last Sabbath, why he never attends the society meetings, why he dislikes social meetings, why he goes to sleep in sermon time, why he does not have the same zeal that others do, why he can not bend his mind to religious contemplation, why he can not take the responsibility of persuading men, why he never takes the lead in religious conversation—ay more—ask him why he does not love to read his Bible, and store his mind with its treasures, why he lends not a helping hand whenever he can do good, why he does not seek out the poverty stricken, the poor in spirit, the poor in faith, and the poor in honesty, and bestow upon them the necessary assistance—ask all this, and if you can find any person who will own the questions, let him justify himself if he can. But if he has no better excuse, why then let him say it is because he is lazy. By so doing he may possibly tell a truth which no body will believe. They will take it for granted that so far from having told the real reason, he means that he is the most honest, industrious, zealous, and benevolent Christian going, and that he could give answers the most satisfactory to all your questions, if he chose. I say they will take this for granted, but I may be mistaken, and therefore will not insist upon it until I make further inquiries.

A. R. B.

"The Morning Watch" a monthly paper "devoted to religious reformation," edited and published by C. F. R. Shehane, of Greenville District, South Carolina, has the following very correct views of the penalty inflicted on our first parents for their transgression. The Watch appears to be devoted to what is commonly called Campbellism, or the peculiar views of Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Va. It is but lately that it has commenced exchanging with us—but in that short time we have discovered several articles by its Editor, in which interesting, and (as I think,) correct views are advanced on various passages, and phrases of Scripture, considered almost peculiar to our own denomination.

ADAM AND EVE.

Under this head, we design to ascertain from the Bible, whether the sin of our first parents subjected them and their posterity to endless pain. Let us, dear reader, turn to Genesis, chapter 2d. Here we find it said to Adam, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Or, as the margin has it, "dying thou shalt die." Adam transgressed. Now let us notice the sentence pronounced upon the serpent: "Upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." There is no endless pain pronounced even upon the serpent. Its punishment is limited by the phrase "all the days of thy life." The sentence upon the woman runs thus:—"In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." What Paul says to Timothy, forbids the notion of endless pain, being contained in these words. "She shall be saved in child-bearing," etc. The sentence upon Adam stands thus: "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life: Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. chapter 3. To our humble apprehension, the phrases, "all the days of thy life," and "till thou return unto the ground," limit the punishment inflicted on Adam and his posterity, to the cessation of animal life and its turmoils. But perhaps some one will say, "Did not Adam die a death, temporal, spiritual and eternal, and do not the words "thou shalt surely die" imply all these? We answer, that we not believe that the words "thou shalt surely die," convey the idea which metaphysico-theologians attach to the home-made language, "eternal death." They mean endless pain, when they use the words eternal death. But, for the sake of the question in hand, we will suppose that the words, "thou shalt surely die" mean thou shalt suffer endless pain. Take, then, a few examples where this phrase is found. Solomon said to Shimei, "on the day thou goest out," etc., "thou shalt surely die." 1 Kings ii: 37. He certainly did not mean "thou shalt suffer endless pain," for he immediately subjoined, "thy blood shall be upon thine own head." See also 2 Kings vii: 10. Saul said to Jonathan, "thou shalt surely die." 1 Sam. xiv: 44. It is said in the 45th verse that the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not. This surely cannot be forced to mean that the people saved him from endless pain. See also xxii: 16. But to put this matter forever at rest, let it be noted, that the New Testament says, "all die in Adam," which, by all the mystagogues in the universe of God, can never be made to mean that all suffer endless pain in Adam!

THE YOKE OF CHRIST.

We believe we do not mistake the true import of the word yoke, as introduced above, by saying that it is employed to denote a service or obligation which is imposed upon a man, or which he voluntarily takes upon himself. It may have other significations, but at present we have to do with it only in this sense. The great and the mighty of the earth have often had their multitudes of followers, upon whom they have imposed their commands, until they became a burthen past endurance. But such a yoke was not easy. Nor could we expect to find submission among men to such a yoke, unless actuated by the basest motives and the most unworthy inducements. Solomon seems to have fallen into this error, as we understand by the complaints of some of the Israelites with Jeroboam at their head, which were made to Rehoboam the successor of Solomon. "And Jeroboam and all the congregation of Israel came and spake unto Rehoboam, saying, thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore, make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee." In this case they were willing to continue in his service, they were willing to acknowledge their obligations—take the yoke upon them—provided that yoke was not grievous. Here then was a yoke which might have been made easy.

We conceive, then, that there is no inconsistency in calling the service of Christ, and the obligations connected therewith, a yoke, and yet representing that yoke as being easy. And we can not approve of the mistaken notions which are based upon the assumption, that Christ's yoke is a hard and galling one. We are aware that some entertain the opinion that the way of sinners is easy, and that sorrow and distress is the necessary consequence of being engaged in the service of the Lord of the moral vineyard. And with such opinions, we do not wonder that they should complain that it is a sorrowful task to serve the Lord. But those who make such complaints, have not the spirit of Christ, and are not after all in his service, for he says, "My yoke is easy and my burthen is light." And when we reflect that he reveals nothing to us, and lays no obligation upon us, and requires no service of us, but what is for our highest interest, and which we should be miserable without, we ought to respond to the sentiment. And when we understand and appreciate these facts, it is certain that we shall respond to it, and go to Christ and find rest to our souls, however weary and heavy laden they may have been. A. R. B.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

It is said that among Miller's converts to the belief that this material world is to be destroyed in 1843, are to be found some who plan just as if they expected to live many years. Elder Russell endeavors to get his meeting house lease extended nine years, and Miller himself builds a strong stone wall around his farm, instead of a common fence! Wonder if he has made it like the Irishman's—broader than high—so that when it gets turned over in the destruction of the world, it will be higher than it was before! The world was to come to an end in 1830—in 1831 or 2, the great eclipse was to extinguish it—and in 1836, the comet's tail was to smash it to atoms. Yet the very persons who professed to believe this, loaned out money at interest for years, bought state stocks which were redeemable only many years after the supposed destruction, took long leases, and made provision for worldly comforts to be enjoyed only long after the world was to be ended. Such are human inconsistencies—man is a splendid paradox.—True—some of the deceived followers may fret, and neglect business, and starve, or run crazy; but go to the leaders who have farms or cash, and offer to stake a bargain as the result, and you will not catch them napping in worldly matters—they are unwilling to sell out for nothing after 1843. A. B. G.

The Editor of the Morning Watch is respectfully informed that the views of the Friends or Quakers respecting baptism by the Holy Ghost and by fire, are not peculiar to the Universalists as a denomination. We are not unanimous on the subject—some hold to immersion on the views of Mr. Campbell himself, others to immersion on the Baptist views, with the exception of its efficacy so far as the future state of being is concerned—some hold to sprinkling or pouring—but the majority, I think, believe it a matter of no importance, save as the conscience of the candidate may require its administration. The number who hold to the Quaker view of the subject, is probably less than the majority—and in no case that I know of, do any consider its omission a bar to fellowship or communion. A. B. G.

"LA MARGUERITE."—May I ask all our youthful readers, who are, or are likely to become, students in any school—young gentlemen as well as young ladies—to peruse carefully the remarks of Miss Barker in this number? They are of general—almost of universal application, to all pupils of all schools; and their spirit carefully treasured up in the heart and understanding, can not fail to improve vastly the character of the pupils, and elevate that of the schools to which they belong. Again I say, read, remember, and inwardly digest, until its instructions become your principles of feeling and action. A. B. G.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Millerism is still all the go down East. Br. A. C. Thomas is out upon the luckless wight, demolishing his calculations, overthrowing his arguments, and exposing his mistakes and assumptions in a pamphlet of 32 large pages, neatly printed. Price—12 cents single—$1 per dozen.

More new books are announced for publication at the East. Br. T. B. Thayer has prepared a new work for the use of Sunday schools and Bible classes. It is to be published by Whittemore and Paige. The Trumpet says of it, "We have never published a greater amount of information in so small a compass."

A small pocket Manual of the proof texts in favor of universal salvation, together with a collection of Scripture passages usually quoted to prove the doctrine of endless misery, and their explanation by Partialist commentators; to which is added an explanation of the phrases "Kingdom of God," etc., by S. R. Smith, has been published in Albany by one of our friends. Copies may be had of O. Hutchinson—12 cents single—$1 per dozen. It is one of the most valuable works published—neat, concise, embracing every passage and its explanation, yet not occupying much room in the pocket.

Br. Chapin's labors must have created quite a sensation in Charlestown, Mass., as we see notices of his preaching in the Boston, Buffalo, and Philadelphia papers. We hope—yes, we believe, that Br. Chapin has fixed a modest yet correct estimate on his own talents, to which he can bring all the praise and all the censure he may receive, (particularly the former,) and test its correctness, so as to profit by what is just and true, and cast the false away. Wo to the young man in a public station, who has not such a standard! The flattery of false friends and the envious detractions of secret foes, will surely procure his ruin, by giving him an over estimate of himself and then destroying him for having believed their treacherous flatteries. Br. C. must abide the test prepared for him, and we believe he will come out of the fire sterling—but he will find it a trial.

PREACHERS AND PEOPLE.

What of the preacher? He should be faithful in his calling say the people. He should warn without fear, and persuade without dissimulation. He should rightly divide the word of God, without adding to or taking from it. He should preach good news, and defend the Gospel from the reproach of its pretended advocates. He should establish the kingdom of God in the hearts of men, and pull down the strong walls of bigotry and superstition. He should be humble, yet devotional. He should devote his time to the calls of the church though sleep should be a stranger to his pillow. He should labor while the day lasts to meet the demands of his body, and study in the night to supply the religious wants of the multitude. He should owe no man any thing, though hundreds owe him. He should preach the Gospel without salary and not get trusted for his corn, his potatoes or his pottage.

Well, some have done all this, wonderful as it is. But what would Paul say in this matter? His rejoicing should be this: the testimony of his conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God he has his conversation in the world more abundantly toward those of his charge. He should not imagine that he is sufficient of himself to think any thing as of himself; but his sufficiency should be of God, who also hath made him an able minister of the New Testament; not of the letter but of the spirit; and in this spirit he should not shun to declare the whole counsel of God. He should, as a worker together with Christ, beseech men that they receive not the grace of God in vain. Giving no offence in any thing that the ministry be not blamed. But in all things approving or recommending himself as the minister of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labors, in watchings, in fastings, by pureness, by knowledge, by long suffering, by kindness by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by honor and dishonor, by evil report and good report; as deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold we live; as chastened and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing yet possessing all things.

Surely such a laborer would be worthy of his hire. Is it not so? "Who goeth to warfare at any time at his own charges? Who planteth a vineyard and eateth not of the fruit thereof? Or who feedeth a flock and eateth not of the milk of the flock?" "Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel." But this is not all. While the people forget not the wants of the preacher, they should also strive to encourage and sustain him by these good examples in all things. They should so live when he speaks of the superior influences of his faith, that an application to the conduct of his flock will not shame him. Let them "be kindly affectioned one to another," "abhor that which is evil and cleave to that which is good." Let them "not be slothful in business," but "servant in spirit, serving the Lord." Let them "recompense to no man evil for evil, provide things honest in the sight of men, and if it be possible, as much as lieth in them, live peaceably with all men." When this is done posterity may arise and bless both preacher and people.

PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

This work is increasing in interest and utility, and should be patronised by all who would increase their knowledge of this science. A. Wallie, Publisher. It is issued monthly, octavo form, each number handsomely covered and containing at least 48 pp., at $2 per annum. No. 5, vol. 2, has already been issued, and the work can be had from the commencement. J. M. Crowley, of this city, is agent. Br. Hutchinson also receives subscriptions, &c. A. B. G.

REGISTERS AND PAMPHLETS.

For the accommodation of those who wish to preserve the Register and Almanac for future reference, I have bound the numbers for 1835, '37, '38, '39, '40, and the Companion for 1840, Universalist Belief, Grosh's Inquiry into the Sacred Scriptures, Kingdom Shut, and Burning of the Lexington.

The retail price of the pamphlets, independent of the Register and binding, amounts to the retail price of the volume, so it can not be considered dear. Price 50 cents. O. HUTCHINSON.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in March, by Br. GOSSET, in Springwater Valley. Br. GROSH in Tabor. Br. C. S. BROWN in North Norwich.

4th Sunday—Br. C. S. BROWN in South Bainbridge and Br. TORREY in Upper Lisle—Br. COOK in Bridge-water, and Br. GROSH in this city.

Br. BULLARD will lecture at Newfield on Thursday evening, March 19th—at Dean's corners, Friday evening, 20th—at Millport, Saturday evening, 21st—preach at Fairport, on Sunday, 22d, at 11 o'clock, and lecture at Elmira in the evening—on Monday evening, 23d, at South Creek—at Factoryville, Tuesday evening, 24th—at Cran's ferry, Merrill's school house, Wednesday evening, 25th—at Tioga centre, Thursday evening, 26th—at Owego Deepwell schoolhouse, Friday evening, 27th—at Vestal, Saturday evening 28th—preach at Binghamton on Sunday 29th, A. M., P. M., and evening—lecture at Greene, Monday evening, 30th—and at Triangle, Tuesday evening, 31st. The death of my child, which took place in my absence on my last tour, rendering it necessary that I should be called home, prevented me from meeting my last appointments in the last four above mentioned places.

POETRY.

THE RIVER.

River! river! little river!
Bright you sparkle on your way,
O'er the yellow pebbles dancing,
Through the flowers and foliage glancing,
Like a child at play.

River! river! swelling river!
On you rush o'er rough and smooth—
Louder, faster, brawling, leaping,
Over rocks, by rose-bank sweeping,
Like impetuous youth.

River! river! brimming river!
Broad, and deep, and still as Time,
Seeming still, yet still in motion,
Tending onward to the ocean,
Just like mortal prime.

River! river! rapid river!
Swifter now you slip away:
Swift and silent as an arrow,
Through a channel dark and narrow,
Like life's closing day.

River! river! headlong river!
Down you dash into the sea—
Sea, that line hath never sounded—
Sea, that voyage hath never rounded,
Like eternity.

AN ELOQUENT PASSAGE.

The New-York Knickerbocker gives the following as an extract of a sermon delivered sometime since by Edward Irving—that brilliant but transient light, who “fell like a meteor from the bosom of splendor into the grave of thick night—like an eagle smitten down in a too near approach to the sun.”—The correspondent who furnished it, heard the discourse delivered at Irving's chapel, when he was in the zenith of his glory—and declared that the appearance and manner of the speaker would never fade from his memory—his large flushing eye, that seemed to burn in its noble front—the black flowing hair that swept his broad shoulders, and by contrast lighted up his pale features with the ghastly hue of death—his long arm and attenuated hand, employed in action, graceful and yet so energetic, as to have the appearance of throwing his words, and the burning thoughts they embodied, into the very hearts of his hearers. Let the doubters of God's providence and power peruse the annexed extract. Its connection has not been preserved—but it will be, we think, sufficiently complete.

“Take up a handful of dust and ashes, and there behold the materials out of which the Lord God Almighty fashioned man—this living form of man, so quick and pregnant with all sensual and spiritual feeling. And if you would know the kindness which your Father hath put forth in the works of his hands, look to the tribes, from the worm to the lion, all made of as good materials—in size, strength, fleetness, durability, surpassing man. But where is their counsel? where is their government? where is their knowledge? where is their religion? Which of them has any fellowship with God, or reasonable intercourse with one another?—The other creatures are but the outward endowments of man's senses, to clothe, to feed, to lay the lusty shoulders to his burden, to carry him about, to watch over him in sleep, and to minister in other ways to his entertainment.

“And what is the earth whereon you tread, and which spreads its flowery carpet beneath your feet? And what are its various fruits, with their varieties to sustain, to refresh, and to cherish human life—the corn, the wine, and the oil? And what the recurring seasons of divided time—the budding spring, the flowery summer, the joyful vintage, the lusty harvest, and the homely well provided winter? And what the cheerful outgoing of morn, and dewy eve, and balmy sleep, and blessed action? What are they all, but the sweet cradle and blessed condition into which our Father has brought us, his children? Is there nothing fatherly in all this—in the costly preparation and glad welcome of our coming; and in the motherly bosom of a plentiful affection and food stored for us—and in the faithful dwelling places to which we are born? Is it nothing, that the range of our mansion is to the starry heaven, and not cooped within the incumbrance of a narrow shell? Is it nothing that the heavens drop down fitness upon us and that the river of God's bounty watereth all the gardens where we dwell; rather than we should have gripped the rock for our bed, or found our birthplace in the oozy channels of the deep?

“Let us praise our heavenly Father, that he hath made us with more understanding than the beasts of the field, with more wisdom than the fowls of heaven; that he hath made us a little lower than the angels, and crowned us with glory and honor, and made us to have dominion over the works of his hands, and hath put all things under our feet; all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea. “Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him?” Look upon the treatment you have received at the hand of your Creator, and say if it does not speak him more than fatherly in his love and carefulness? Our bread hath been provided, our water hath been sure; we have been protected from summer's smiting heat, and from the winter's blasting cold. The damps of the night have not settled chill upon our raiment, nor hath the pestilence which wasteth at noonday blown its deadly blast across our path. The Lord hath been the length of our days, and the strength of our life, from our youth up to this day. He hath surrounded us with love-against us; no famine hath pinched our borders; no plague, nor pestilence, nor blasting winds have bitten us; no weapons formed against our liberties have ever prospered! Another year hath told out its months and seasons; but each day hath brought our necessary meals and luxurious entertainments, and each night hath brought its refreshment of dewy sleep; each Sabbath hath its rest and blessed ministry of salvation. The ly children, to stand in our room when we are gone; and he hath given us a house and habitation among men; and he hath found us in the sight of men more favors than we have deserved. Hath he not hidden your faults from the knowledge of men? Hath he not been very tender to your reputation, which by the turn of his providence, he could have blasted? Hath he not restrained the wrath of your enemies? No sword hath come up heavens have dropped down fitness on our tabernacles. Very pleasant are our dwelling places, and the places where our lines have fallen, be very good.”

MARRIAGES.

In Richfield Springs, February 11th, by Rev. H. Belding, JOHN S. BUNDA, to LUCINDA CASLER, both of Warren.

In Ullyses, Pa., February 11th, by Ev. J. Lewis, Mr. CHARLES DWIGHT, of Van Buren, La Grange county, Ia., to Miss MARY LEWIS, of the former place.

In Lebanon, January 30th, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, to Miss MARY LEWIS. In Eaton, February 10th, by the same, Mr. JOHN C. LEWIS, to Miss MARY ANN MORRIS. In Lebanon, February 18th, by the same, Mr. LEWIS B. POWELL, to Miss HARRIET BILLINGS.

In Shelby, February 13th, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. EBENEZER PIXLEY, to Miss MARILLA BUSH. In Newstead, February 16th, by the same, Mr. HIRAM DRAPER, to Miss HARRIET WHEELER—and also, Mr. WILLIAM CHURCHILL, to Miss CAROLINE WHEELER.

DEATHS.

In Bainbridge, December 24th, MARY EMELINE, infant daughter of Mr. Ira Hyde, aged 18 months. Sermon by H. T.

In Bainbridge, January 23d, JOSEPHINE, infant daughter of Dr. S. W. Corbin, aged 16 months. Sermon by H. T.

In Bainbridge, February 1st, Mrs. PERRIA CRAWFORD, aged 74 years. May the friends and relatives of the deceased, be comforted with that hope which the Gospel of peace affords. Sermon by H. T.

In Port Gibson, on October last, MARY, wife of Lyman Clark, Esq., and daughter of Peleg Redfield. [For particulars, see sermon.]

On the 8th ult., in Alabama, Genesee county, Mrs. D. BALDWIN, aged 54 years, leaving a kind husband and an affectionate family of children to mourn her departure. She died in the full faith of Universalism, fully reconciled to God. She was universally esteemed by her acquaintances, and a very large concourse of people attended her funeral, on the 10th, in the Baptist church, whom the writer addressed on the subject of an immortal world, the full fruition of our sister's faith. C. H.

In Salina, February 16th, of consumption, Miss LUCY P. WHEELER, in the 18th year of her age. Miss W. was an amiable girl, and a Universalist in faith and practice. She bore up under the suffering of a long protracted illness, with true Christian fortitude and resignation. She died in the triumph of faith. May the consolations of the Gospel of impartial grace, comfort the hearts of the mourners. Funeral attended on the 18th, at the Presbyterian meeting-house, and a discourse delivered by the writer, to a large concourse of sympathising neighbors and friends. N. BROWN.

In Smithfield, on the 11th of February, Mr. JUSTUS BOYDEN, in his eighty-fifth year. The deceased was a patriot of the Revolution, and joined heart and hand in that glorious struggle. In after life, he found that freedom which maketh free indeed: he became a believer in the final redemption of man from moral and spiritual bondage; and through the strength of this firmly-established faith, he was at last enabled to triumph in a nobler and better victory.—Funeral services on the 13th, by G. W. GAGE.

Also, in Ma shall, on the 20th of February, after a protracted sickness, Mr. ASAHEL WHITE, in his 47th year.—His was the spirit of submission that found abundant reasons for gratitude, though in the midst of affliction and sufferings; and trusting in a kind Providence for the direction of events, he bowed with willingness before the stroke of the destroyer, and died in the full possession of a hope for himself and for all the world. May the great Parent of goodness and mercy comfort the widow in her bereavement, and be a Father to the orphaned children. Services on the 22d, by G. W. GAGE.

TO BE PUBLISHED BY SUBSCRIPTION,

A DISCUSSION

Of the Doctrines of Endless Misery and Universal Salvation, in an Epistolary Correspondence between ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, (Baptist,) of Bethany, Va., and DOLPHUS SKINNER, (Universalist,) of Utica, N. Y.

This work will consist of forty letters (twenty by each disputant, and occupying equal space) besides six or seven shorter preliminary letters by Messrs. Spencer, Campbell, Montgomery and Skinner. It will fill between 400 and 500 pages—it will be neatly bound, and lettered, and furnished to subscribers at the very low price of ONE DOLLAR per copy.

The four following are the momentous questions discussed in this controversy:—

1. Are Sheol, Hades and Gehenna, (translated Hell,) or either of them, ever used in the Scriptures to express a place, or state, of endless misery?
2. Do the words Oleu, Aion, Aionios, etc., (translated everlasting,) when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end?
3. Is there any word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or which can certify us that God angels or saints, shall have duration without end?
4. Shall eternal life (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness) be, according to the Scriptures, the ultimate destiny of all mankind?

Of the first and second questions A. Campbell takes the affirmative, and D. Skinner of the third and fourth.

This work was published, as the letters were written, periodically, in the Millelial Harbinger and the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, from February 1837, to July 1839; when the Discussion was brought to a close; and now for the first time it is published in book form by itself, and offered to the public. No questions can be of deeper moment to the theological student, or the inquirer after truth, than those here discussed. What justice has been done to these questions by either side, the reader must judge after carefully perusing the same.

The work will be put to press at an early day, and is expected it will be ready for delivery to subscribers by the time the Spring business and the navigation of the canal shall commence.

Any person paying $5 shall receive six copies of the work. No trust will be allowed, but payment down required in all cases, except where persons ordering the work are known to be perfectly responsible, and to them but a short credit can be allowed. Subscriptions and orders for the Discussion to be returned as early as possible, either to D. Skinner, O. Hutchinson, or the Magazine and Advocate office, Utica, N. Y. Also, P. Price, Union office, N. Y.; J. H. Gibson and Co., Nazarene office, Philadelphia; A. Tompkins, Ladies' Repository office, and Thomas Whittemore, Trumpet office, Boston; Rev. E. H. Chapin, Richmond, Va.; Gad Chapin, Louisville, Ky.; and J. A. Gurley, office of Star in the West, Cincinnati, Ohio, will act as agents in disposing of the work to subscribers living nearer to them than to Utica.

As the volume can not be sent by mail, those ordering it will either call for the work at the office of publication, or designate how and where it shall be sent, and it will be sent at their risk.

Utica, February 1, 1840.

* The distinguished champion who held the debate with Robert Owen, the Skeptic, and subsequently with Bishop Purcell, Catholic, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. III.—Habits of a Wife.

"Those thousand decencies which daily flow
From all her words and actions"

Who is not aware of the power and influence of habit? Who is not conscious of that tendency in human nature, which induces us to continue acting as we have acted, and to follow in the footsteps we have already trod? When habits first begin to form, they have not the strength of the spider's web—the least obstruction, the least opposition, will destroy all their power. But as they continue their sway, they increase in strength, until at length, they become massive chains and fetters, which no earthly power can break asunder. Happy they whose habits are all strictly proper; but alas, for those who have become habituated to practices not characterised by diligence, neatness, propriety and virtue! They are in a bondage, than which none can be more wearisome and grievous.

When a change takes place in our circumstances—when new objects surround us—when new duties and obligations rest upon us, and our feelings run in channels different from those to which they have been accustomed—new and different habits soon begin to form and exert their influence upon us. Thus in commencing married life, the wife has entered upon a new sphere of action, duty, and responsibility, and a new class of habits commence binding their ties around her. It becomes her, therefore, to look well to it, that she commences right in this respect. The habits which she first adopts in her new career, will quite probably, exert an influence upon her through life—for "habit," says St. Austin, "if not resisted, becomes necessity." It is, hence, exceedingly important that the wife should be careful, on becoming the partner of another, and the mistress of a household, to establish good and useful habits—habits that will aid her in an efficient discharge of her duties, and lead her into all those practices which are requisite to her usefulness and enjoyment, and to the happiness of those connected with her.

Good habits can only be founded upon good principles. The former are the legitimate fruits of the latter. Improper principles cherished in the heart, will lead to improper practices, and to repetitions of those practices—and repetition forms habit. But good principles, like good seed sown in a fruitful soil, will bring forth a harvest of good deeds and good habits. Every outward moral qualification, is the transcript of a similar principle within—every good deed, every commendable action, is the fruit of principles resting in the soul. And to insure a continuance of praiseworthy practices until they become habits, it is necessary to examine critically the principles from which they proceed, and to perceive and realise that they are correct principles, and are in the highest degree calculated to promote human happiness, both individually and collectively. If the intelligent wife will pursue this train of reasoning—if she will examine understandingly, the peculiarities of her situation—if she will strive to learn the foundations upon which happiness in married life depends—she will readily perceive the indispensable necessity of forming certain fixed habits, upon which she will practice through life. I have said that they should be good habits; and I desire the patience of the reader while I go beyond this general term and define briefly a few habits indispensable to the prudent and faithful wife.

I consider Neatness, as one of the most important and indispensable habits of woman in every condition of life. Slovenliness in dress or in person, is bad enough when exhibited by men; but when seen in women, it is absolutely disgusting. There is danger here which the young wife especially should guard against. I have known young ladies who have exhibited before marriage, the utmost neatness and cleanliness in dress and in person, and seemed to spare no pains to make an appearance perfectly unexceptionable in this respect. But when a few months of wedded life had passed away, lo! a change most remarkable had come over them. They had apparently parted company with cleanliness and neatness, and a kind of slovenly negligence exhibited itself in their whole appearance—the neat, tidy young lady had become transformed into the slipshod, slatternly wife. Now a change of this description, furnishes satisfactory proof that she who exhibits it, has been guilty of criminal duplicity towards her husband. Being well assured that no young man of taste and worth would be attracted by a lady who was not neat in her habits, she assumed a commendable exterior for a selfish purpose, viz: to obtain a husband. It is evident that her neat appearance was merely assumed; because had it been natural, had it been the fruit of confirmed habit, it would have been as scrupulously exhibited after marriage as before. But as this appearance was not the fruit of habit, it vanished with the cause which prompted its assumption. Having obtained a husband, which was the object at which she was aiming—having attracted the attention of some confiding young man, who believed he was marrying a paragon of neatness—she considers it no longer necessary to wear her hypocritical garb, and she accordingly throws off the mask and sinks into her natural character of slovenliness and negligence. And when remonstrated with, for her want of neatness, by her husband or some intimate friend, she exclaims with the utmost nonchalance,—"Why should I give myself trouble about my appearance? Is not my market made?"

In proceedings of this character, there is a lack of wisdom as well as of honesty. If a young woman is habitually negligent and careless in respect to her appearance, and has no disposition or design to amend in this particular, let her not be deceptive, but exhibit herself in this light wherever she goes. If she can find a young man willing to wed her under these circumstances, he will have no just cause to complain of her habits afterwards. But if she puts on an appearance of neatness, when her tastes and habits are the reverse, and in this respect most deeply deceives the youth who weds her, is she not palpably guilty of moral wrong? And how can she expect, in this state of things, to retain the affections of her husband, or find happiness in married life? There are few things more calculated to cool the ardor of the young husband's affections, and to lessen his interest and delight in his wife, than day by day to make the painful discovery, that she whom he had married as a scrupulously neat, cleanly and tidy woman, is in reality, all the reverse—uncleanly in person, negligent in dress, and slovenly in her whole appearance! Is it astonishing that his feelings become soured—that he begins to neglect his wife, and finally exhibits an entire indifference respecting her? I sincerely believe that in thousands of instances, those animosities and contentions between husband and wife, which so often embitter the marriage state, have had their origin in that deep disappointment which the husband has, in this manner, experienced. There has too generally an impression prevailed among young married ladies—even those whose habits have always been of an unexceptionable character—that it is not necessary to be so attentive and particular in regard to their appearance after marriage, as before. But this supposition is very erroneous, and very mischievous in its tendencies. It is exceedingly important that the young wife should take a correct and reasonable view of this subject. Her happiness depends to an immense extent, upon the continued affections of her husband. If she will exercise a little reflection, she will discover that, as it was necessary, among other qualifications, to exhibit a neat and tasty personal appearance, to gain her husband's love before marriage, so it is equally necessary that the same personal neatness should continue to be exhibited after marriage, if she would retain his love, and continue to inspire his respect and confidence. The sum of these remarks, is this:—That it becomes the wife, if she would enjoy peace and happiness in her marriage relations, to pay the utmost attention to her personal appearance, at all times—not only in company, but also, and especially, when she is in the presence of her husband and the family—and to strive to establish fixed and permanent habits of neatness and cleanliness. There is no possible excuse for indifference upon this point. And whoever is neglectful, will, most assuredly bring unhappiness upon herself. A certain writer remarks—"A married woman negligent of her person and careless of her charms, will soon weaken the respect of her husband, and be charmless in his sight. No married woman ought ever to be seen by her husband with disarranged hair, or soiled gown, handkerchief or collar."

Equally necessary is it, that the young wife should acquire habits of neatness in regard to her dwelling and all her household arrangements. When once the habit is acquired, it is as easy to have every thing in a neat and orderly condition, as in a state of filth and confusion. The health of the family, and the happiness of the domestic circle, depend in no small degree, upon the neatness which pervades the habitation. A person of observation will require to be in a dwelling but a few moments, to determine whether the wife who superintends its affairs, is neat or slovenly. Her habits in this respect, will be legitly inscribed upon the aspect of her residence. The wife who is determined that her house shall always be in a neat and cleanly state, will not entrust this duty entirely to domestics. She will apply her own personal observation and inspection, and will not allow herself to be a stranger to the broom and duster, nor afraid of an intimate practical acquaintance with them. But I need not dwell on this point, as my remarks on personal neatness, will apply to neatness in the habitation; for it is an invariable rule, that as she who is neat in the former respect, is neat in the latter also, and vice versa.

A strict attention to the concerns of her household, is incumbent on every wife. These are entrusted to her care. While the husband is attending to his affairs in the business world, he confides the arrangement and prosecution of the domestic concerns to his wife, believing that she will devote her attention to them, and see that things move on within doors, under proper regulations. And the woman who loves her husband, and is interested in her family, will not be negligent in these respects. Habit will here exercise a sensible influence. If a wife habituates herself to remaining much of her time at home, it will be natural and easy for her to direct her attention to domestic affairs, and become interested in them. But if she is in the practice of going abroad and mingling in company a large portion of her time, her habits soon become averse to domestic concerns, and she is thus induced to entrust to others those things which should receive her personal oversight, and which hence must suffer injury. I would not have a wife seclude herself entirely from society—neither would I have her constantly gossiping from house to house, and mingling so incessantly in company as to make her comparatively a stranger at home! Both extremes are to be avoided, but more especially the latter. While due attention should be paid to society, and to those customs and observances which are demanded by the etiquette of respectable communities, great care should be taken not to allow these things to infringe on those domestic duties which it is the wife's particular province to fulfil.

To render domestic habits of any avail, industry is especially requisite. A woman may as well spend her time in "spinning street-yarn," as to remain at home in idleness; for any activity is better for the health than a drone-like stupor. An idle wife can very readily be distinguished from one who is industrious in her habits. I never yet saw an indolent woman, who did not exhibit a want of neatness in her personal appearance, and in her household. Slovenliness and neglect are legions of evil that cling to her. I can not say enough on this subject, than in the words of the poet, "Industry is not only the source of all improvement, but the foundation of pleasure. Nothing is so opposite to the true enjoyment of life, as the relaxed and feeble state of an indolent mind. Those who are strangers to industry, may possess, but they can not enjoy. For it is labor only which gives the relish to pleasure. It is the appointed vehicle of every good to man. It is the indispensable condition of our possessing a sound mind in a sound body. Sloth is so inconsistent with both, that it is hard to determine whether it be a greater foe to virtue or to health and happiness. Inactive as it is in itself, its effects are fatally powerful. Though it appear a slowly flowing stream, yet it undermines all that is stable and flourishing. It is like water which first putrefies by stagnation, and then sends up noxious vapors, and fills the atmosphere with death." In the language of another—"It is the duty of every individual in this country, to live an active life. No one, even though he be rich, has a right to be idle or useless. In the hive of bees, there is a privileged class of drones; but there the government is despotic, with a queen at its head. Ours is a republican government, which admits of no drones, and tolerates no aristocratic indolence. Nor is industry more a duty to society, than a source of individual happiness. There are no pleasures so sweet as those earned by effort, no possessions so dear as those acquired by toil." Industry is as much a matter of habit as any other qualification. Let the wife settle the truth in her mind, that industry is essential to her happiness and usefulness—let her be industrious from principle, and she will soon be industrious from habit—so much so, that she will find far greater enjoyment in active and useful occupation, than in listless idleness. The words of the poet embody much truth—

"Think not a life of toil severe;
No life has blessings so sincere,
Its meals so luscious, sleep so sweet,
Such vigorous limbs, such health complete,
No mind so active, brisk and gay,
As his who toils the livelong day.
A life of sloth drags hardly on;
Suns set too late and rise too soon.
Youth, manhood, age, all linger slow
To him who nothing has to do,
The drone, a nuisance to the hive,
Stays, but can scarce be said to live;
And well the bees, those judges wise,
Plague, chase and sting him till he dies."

The most perfect picture I have ever seen of an industrious and useful wife, is that painted by Solomon three thousand years ago. The modern wife can do no better than to imitate it. "She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands. She is like the merchants' ships: she bringeth her food from afar. She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens. She perceiveth that her merchandise is good: her candle goeth not out by night. She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor: yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. She is not afraid of the snow for her household: for all her household are clothed with scarlet. She maketh herself coverings of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple. Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land. She maketh fine linen, and selleth it; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant. Strength and honor are her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come. She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

There is nothing that assists a wife more in the discharge of her duties, than Order and Method. The habit of conducting all her proceedings on a well regulated, methodical system, is one which she should early endeavor to acquire. "Whatever is worth doing, is worth doing well." And to do things well, especially in household affairs, which consist of a multiplicity of varied occupations, they must be done in order. However trifling the employments may be, it is still important to proceed on a well digested system. Unless the house-wife proceeds in a methodical manner, her affairs are liable to become confused and entangled—she herself is perplexed, loses temper perhaps, and in consequence, falls out with her husband or domestics, makes herself and all around her unhappy, and toils harder to bring her occupations to a conclusion, than she otherwise would—and then, more than probable, they will be but imperfectly executed. Such an one is almost invariably behind her affairs, and hurried by them—and whatever is done in a hurry, is generally ill done. But when the wife establishes a well defined system in which all things shall proceed—when every thing is done methodically and orderly—her affairs will proceed quietly and pleasantly. There will be no jarring, no confusion, no slighting, no losing of temper, no unhappiness. Every thing will be done at the proper time, and well done—there will be a place for each thing, and each thing will be in its place—and order, neatness and comfort, will reign throughout the habitation. The discreet housewife will strive after this state of things; and she will be satisfied that the only way to secure it, is by proceeding in all things, upon the strict rules of method. On arising in the morning, she will form her plan for the day's proceedings, and she will be careful to adhere to it as strictly as possible. She will avoid procrastination, that "thief of time," as her great enemy. Whatever should now be done, she will see that it is done now. She will have a time for every thing, and every thing will be done in its appropriate time. Nothing more facilitates the dispatch of business, than to have each particular duty done properly at the right time. The poet seems to have entertained correct views upon this subject, when penning the following distich:—

"Let order o'er your time preside,
And method all your business guide.
Early begin and end your toil,
Nor let great tasks your hands embroil;
One thing at once be still begun,
Contrived, resolved, pursued and done;
Nor till to-morrow's light delay
What might as well be done to-day."

There is one habit that some wives fall into, which I must beg leave briefly to notice. I refer to the habit of making confidants of certain visitors or associates, and spreading before them all their troubles in house-keeping, and all the faults of their husbands and families. There is an impropriety, an indelicacy in this practice, which is exceedingly reprehensible. That there will occasionally be perplexities and difficulties in the best regulated households, is to be expected—and that domestics, children and even husbands may possess many faults, is not at all surprising, when we consider how frail is human nature. But I can conceive of no reason, and no apology, for spreading these things before another—and a small degree of reflection will show the impropriety of such a course. When it is pursued, I am inclined to attribute it in general, more to an unthinking volubility of speech, which must have food for conversation, than to any inclination to do that which is improper. For were the same ladies to hear a stranger utter these complaints and accusations against their husbands or families, they would be exceedingly offended. The prudent and circumspect wife will guard against a habit so indiscreet and reprehensible. Sensible of her own foibles, she will be desirous to throw a concealing veil over the feelings of others, and especially of those most dear to her, rather than to spread them before the world. She will have but one confidant, and that will be her husband. Towards all others she will exhibit that proper reserve which is requisite to her who is, in no small degree, the depository of the happiness of the household.

GO ASK THAT SAINT HIMSELF.

Sometimes, in spite of us, we are told that facts are all against us. Arguments from experience and observation come crowding fast upon us, and the voice of stern reality must be heeded. The righteous, we are told, are not recompensed in the earth, for our own senses testify to their mysterious affliction. Take the case, says one, of those true worthies who have always endeavored to maintain virtue; who have practised all their lives the principles of justice, benevolence, and mercy; who have earned for themselves an involuntary reputation of uprightness from the whole community in which they move, and it is true—it is mysteriously true, that these exemplary patterns of Christian devotedness do, many times, bear the inflictions of an inscrutable providence, and are called to pass through the furnace of intense trial.

Yes, it is true; but then it must be remembered that these afflictions may not be punishments for moral disobedience. I say, they may not be, and, without stopping here to argue the case, I proceed upon the known fact that they are not, in many instances; and the confession is freely given in, in the admission that the subjects of these misfortunes are the "true worthies"—the "exemplary patterns of Christian devotedness." Now, if they are not punishments for moral disobedience, who can tell that their virtues are not sufficiently rewarded? For we have in these cases, no more after all, than an individual divested of these sufferings; and why should we let our judgment be embarrassed or influenced by them? We might as well take a virtuous man not afflicted, for the argument, as to take one afflicted; for his afflictions are not, by admission, punishments for moral transgression; and we have, therefore, but a virtuous man, after all, to build the argument upon. And who can tell that his virtues are not sufficiently rewarded? They may be, as we have seen, notwithstanding these afflictions; and that they are, we may believe, if we can not realize.

But, as I was going to say, to cut the argument short, Go ask that saint himself. Go ask him, poor man—humble Christian—if he thinks he has not been rewarded sufficiently for his deeds of righteousness. Will he tell you no? Can you imagine him rising up from his couch, and, trembling and pale, accusing Heaven of injustice in not rewarding him according to his merits, or else looking wishfully beyond the boundaries of time for some coveted expectancy for duty? We should then have a hardened and ungrateful sinner rather than a saint, and for such ingratitude his sufferings might be just! But tell me, can you seriously imagine him pondering on the mysteriousness of Heaven's ways in not rewarding him—poor man—for his goodness? Will he not rather tell you that his righteousness is filthy rags; that, for what little good he had performed, he found a sufficient blessing in the deed; that, if he had walked in the paths of justice, he had found a sufficient compensation of reward in the conscious satisfaction of integrity and truth; if he had refrained from evil speaking and defaming, he was more than repaid in the generous feelings of an honorable good will; if he had lived a life of chastity and temperance, he had been amply rewarded, for the time, in the firmness and health of body that he had enjoyed; if he cultivated filial piety towards God, he found a plenteous blessing in the trust and resignation which he exercised; or, if he had walked the rounds of charity and mercy, and fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and soothed the widow's woe, he had met with more than a return in the simple tear of gratitude that trickled down upon the cheek of suffering humanity? Such, undoubtedly, would be his reply. If, then, this afflicted saint himself will not acknowledge that he has not been sufficiently rewarded—nay, if he persists in gratitude, that he has been more than repaid for his works and labors of love, how careful should we be in pronouncing against the recompense of virtue in the earth! Go ask that saint himself.

But, I put it to yourselves. Is there one of you who can say—who can call up to remembrance an act of virtue in your life, and say that it has passed unrewarded? Do you ever recollect of saying to temptation, "Get thee behind me, Satan," and, at the same time, realizing no reward? Did you ever maintain truth in preference to falsehood, when either, perhaps, at the time, would have served the turn; and have you gone away without any conscious sense of nobleness or honor? Do you remember, ever, in the course of your pursuits, of stepping aside to take the part of the oppressed and trodden down, when you have not experienced the glow of a manly emotion more than sufficient to remunerate for the trouble you have taken? Did you never feel an "etate independence of soul in the consciousness of having nothing to hide, and nothing to be ashamed of?" Did you ever give to poverty a shilling, or to haggard misery a cold meal of victuals, and have you gone away a miserable man for having so turned aside from your accustomed train of interest and pursuit? When you have carried food to the hungry, clothes to the naked, and comfort to the widow's house, did you ever think of looking up reproachfully to Heaven for having annexed no reward to the deeds of virtue and of charity? or did the simple tear that burst involuntarily from the sufferer's eye, in gratitude to Heaven for you, the benefactor, abundantly and ten fold satisfy you for the deed you had undertaken? Did you ever think, my friends, while in the performance of one act of justice, charity or mercy, that the present reward and satisfaction was not enough, and that, to balance the account of duty, an eternity, or even a few days of happiness in heaven, might be a reasonable consideration, and prompt you to duty's task again?

I protest against such grovelling and degrading sentiments. I assume the responsibility to declare, that the task of virtue, in any one of these considerations, you have not known; the blessing has been in the deed, and you have been a happy man for so adhering to the principles of right. You have found, in your own experience, if it has not entered into your theory, that righteousness is compensated in the earth. Finally, brethren, whatever others may say, whatever theory may assert, try it among yourselves—do the will of God, and the recompense you will not find far off. If, after all, you are discouraged from trying, Go ask that Saint himself.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Br. Whittemore says the present year seems to be favorable for the erection of Universalist meeting houses in Massachusetts—that probably a greater number will be dedicated this year, than in any preceding year. He accordingly names seven places where houses will soon be dedicated, or finished, or begun—Barre, Newburyport, Lexington, Concord, Stoneham, Wellfleet, and Truro. Well done, Massachusetts! Where is the Empire State?

A meeting house, in Randolph, Vt., owned by Methodists and Universalists, was dedicated February 20th. Sermon by Br. W. S. Ballou. A Conference followed, in which sermons were preached by the Methodist and some of the Universalist preachers present.

A union house was dedicated in Wilmot, N. H., February 6th. It is owned by Universalists and Free will Baptists.

The brethren in Pittsburg, Pa., have sold their meeting house, and purchased a lot 60 by 85 feet, in a good situation, on which to erect a new house in the course of the coming year. Br. Andrews has removed from that city, and the friends desire to procure a young man to labor with them.

Br. E. M. Pingree has removed from Cincinnati, to Montgomery, Ohio. Br. W. N. Barber from Swazey, N. H., to Guilford Centre, Vt. Br. E. W. Locke preaches the whole time in New Gloucester, Me. Br. A. S. Dudley has removed from Norridgewock to Union, Me. Br. N. Gunnison from Provincetown, Mass., to Amoskeag, N. H. Br. J. Boyden from Dudley, Mass., to Woonsocket Falls, R. I. Br. Wm. Jackson, late a Baptist preacher in South Boston, to Holliston; and Br. J. O. Skinner from Holliston, to Framingham, Mass. Br. R. S. Pope from Sterling to Hardwick, Mass. Br. G. G. Strickland from North Reading to Reading, Mass. Br. S. Brimblecom from Danvers New Mills, Mass. Br. L. F. W. Andrews from Pittsburg, Pa. Br. H. M. Nichols to West Haverhill, Mass. Br. E. H. Chapin of Richmond, Va., has received a unanimous invitation to settle in Charlestown, Mass.—it is said here, he will remove there next Fall. Br. O. Wilcox has removed from Fowler to Denmark, N. Y., and wishes to be addressed accordingly.

A new society was organized in Beverley, Mass., on the 17th ult.—and another in Cheshire, Mass., on the 22d ult.

Br. W. C. Strull, late of Provincetown, Mass., was ordained in Farmington, Me., on the 26th ult. Sermon by Br. Bates.

What shall we do? Hire an Editor expressly to read and notice new books? Can't afford the money and the room. Br. Williamson, of Baltimore, is about to publish his lectures in defence of Universalism. The Universalist's Guide is published, the first edition sold, the second going off rapidly, and the third (each edition, 1000 copies) nearly printed to follow the other two. Would it not be well for Br. Whittemore to announce that subscribers in this region can be supplied by Br. Hutchinson? It will secure a number who have subscribed expecting such arrangement, and accommodate many others better than any other mode.

One of Br. Adams' new works (for he has written two, and both of them, we doubt not, will be very useful, and well worthy of purchase and perusal) is in the press—who wants copies? See prospectus in No. 8, current volume of this paper. The other is an exhibition of the power of Universalism to support and console its believer in the hour of sickness and death. It is to be entitled "The Christian's Triumph; including happy death scenes, illustrative of the power of the Gospel, drawn from facts." This will be put to press as soon as a sufficient number of copies is subscribed for to warrant the undertaking. Price, 50 cts. per copy. We will give the proposals in full as soon as we can find room. But as it will be seen to be a full refutation of the popular objection that "Universalism will not do to die by," with practical and salutary remarks on the general subject, we hope our friends in this region will order copies immediately, by subscribing for it at Br. Hutchinson's Book Store, in this city.

Br. A. A. Miner, late Principal of an Academy in Unity, N. H., was installed as a pastor of the society in Methuen, Mass., on February 26th.

Br. H. B. Soule was ordained, in Fort Plain village, on Thursday the 5th inst. Sermon by Br. S. R. Smith, in his most impressive manner, and equal to his best production.

Br. G. Rogers is somewhere on his Southern tour—Br. G. Messenger is in the neighborhood of Vicksburg, Miss., on a visit—and Br. E. Manford is about to start on a tour to Mobile, Ala., and from thence go to Boston, Mass.

ERRATUM.

An error occurs in an article on the last page of our last number, which turns a part of "An Eloquent Passage" into nonsense. Thus, on the second column, commencing on the twentieth line from the bottom of the article, we read, "He hath surrounded us with love against us." On the twenty-ninth and thirtieth lines: "The ly children, to stand" etc. On lines three and four, "No sword hath come up heavens have dropped" etc. Now by reading first, all that occurs between the twelfth and the third lines, in connection with the twentieth; (thus—"He hath surrounded us with lovely children" etc.) and all that occurs between the twentieth and the tenth lines in connection with the fourth; (connected thus—No sword hath come up against us etc.) and lastly joining the eleventh line with the third. (thus—The heavens have dropped etc.) the reader will be able to discover some eloquence even amid confusion.

A. R. B.

Br. Sawyer in his refutation of Elder K.'s story about Francisco, says—"It was told, however, in New York, as he has told it every where he has been," etc. Elder K. was in this city two years ago, and preached for some time in the house, owned by the second church, of which Francisco was a member—yet I can not learn that he related the story here. The reason is evident—the facts were too well known for even Elder Knapp's foolhardiness in risking his reputation for veracity. I would like to see some of the Certifiers' faces of that church, while the Elder should tell his story, and appeal to them publicly for its correctness and Francisco's good standing. There would be not a few red faces!

LIST OF AGENTS.

If any errors or omissions are discovered in the list of Agents for this paper, which we are publishing, they will be corrected on being pointed out. If the friend in any neighborhood have no agent in their midst, let them appoint a responsible and active brother of their number, and we will publish him in our next list.

Where there are no agents, and the Postmasters will not frank remittances, it will be cheaper for the subscriber to send us a good one or two dollar bill, to be placed to his credit, and pay the postage, than to wait, and pay the enhanced price. All letters containing a good five dollar bill, may be mailed to us at our expense. See the terms.

A THEOLOGICAL TYRO IN ANDOVER.

"I have no wife or children, good or bad, to provide for. A mere spectator of other men's affairs."

It is the opinion of a great man, whose writings I love, and whose apothegms I would ever desire to treasure up, "that there is nothing so baleful to a small man as the shade of a great one."—Judge then, of the trepidation and fearful forebodings with which I, a young novice, who had seen little of the world, and known less of the great ideas that were in it, must have entered such a place as Andover, the grand centre and focus of Orthodoxy, and the home of so many learned men, wise heads, and incomprehensible ideas. I had actually fancied to myself a very heaven upon earth. The people stood before me as perfect paragons of every thing great and good, virtuous and wise. Every inhabitant seemed to wear a smile of joy and gladness; even the trees themselves, I thought, must be arrayed in a loveliness not of earth; and, in short, I had expected to find a learned, wise, and happy people, living together like a band of brothers, acknowledging no law but truth, and no king but love. Such, kind reader, were my thoughts, and such was I, immediately previous to my having entered this little theological world. I felt like a weak, frail, fallible creature, who, with all his imperfections, is about to appear before a superior order of intelligences and take up his abode in a place, which in comparison of those in which he has been residing, is, as it were, the very bosom of innocence.

Soon after entering the town, however, a veritable "change came over the spirit of my dreams." I no longer felt any involuntary trembling or even thought of my own insignificance, for I actually found that I was among mortals, and that, so far from their being super-human, they seemed to be nothing but erring and imperfect beings. Indeed, the very first man I met, looked as if he was not only mad with me, but with about two-thirds of the world around him. This individual, I soon learned, was not a bad specimen of a majority of the town. And hence, all my former indescribable feelings were now exchanged for a kind of theological awe. I did not doubt that these men were Christians; but why they should look so cross, sorrowful and sour about it, was beyond my comprehension. I was soon informed however, that this was a mark of very great piety, and a strong evidence of godliness of heart. I confess that this looked somewhat mysterious at first; but on being told, that "great is the mystery of godliness," I no longer endeavored to proceed understandingly, but received it as something that my feeble comprehension could not fathom.

Having been thus initiated into one of the first principles of Orthodoxy, my next step was to conform myself to it. But here again I was put to my wits. How could I look cross, sorrowful, or sour upon a person, unless such were really my feelings? I had always been accustomed to look very much as I felt; and as I did not feel either mad or grieved, I was at a loss to determine how I could appear so. I had always too, been taught, that a man's heart does generally give coloring to his countenance, tone to his voice, and that the eyes, not unfrequently tell tales that the tongue refuses to utter. And hence I had ever been a firm believer in the doctrine that "murder will out"—that the eyes of a thief shrink from a scrutinizing gaze, and that transgressors now, as well as in the days of Cain, were marked. But now I was introduced to quite a different philosophy. I saw clearly, that all these common-place observations which had been taught me by my father, were wrong; that they had undoubtedly been drawn from the practical affairs of life, and not from books; and I regretted exceedingly that my father should ever have been one of those unfortunate individuals, who study "men instead of books." "It is true," muttered I to myself, "he used to read much, but then he always said that books would never make a man. What a fool he was," continued I, lost to all paternal reverence; "men rather than books! A pretty maxim, indeed, for a parent to enunciate; I'll not adhere to such nonsense longer." Such were my thoughts on retiring to my pillow, the first night of my stay in a place where I had anticipated little besides the Christian graces, universal philanthropy, and brotherly love.

The next morning when I arose, I was fully resolved no longer to study men but books.—"Books," thought I, "contain the thoughts of great men; and great men's thoughts are of no small importance. Besides, reading the thoughts of great men is tantamount to associating with them; and associating with them will soon make a learned and wise man. This latter I have always been taught, but it is strange my father never enjoined it upon me, to study books instead of men." At this stage of my thoughts, I took up a small volume that lay upon the table in the room where I then was. I opened it and on the title page read as follows: "An Essay on Native Depravity, by Leonard Woods, D. D., Professor of Christian Theology, in the Theological Seminary, Andover." Here, then, was just what I wanted. Native Depravity of Man! This, doubtless, would account for all my perplexities about looking good natured, which had troubled me so much on the previous day. "I will read this work," thought I, "and then I shall know something about man by nature." To reading I went. I read some paragraphs over, and over, and over again, endeavoring to grasp the mighty thoughts that lay therein concealed, but all in vain. The work was too profound for me. Indeed the reasoning itself was so awfully profound that half of the time I could not discover the least particle of connection whatever, between predicate and conclusion. I was vexed with myself, and was just on the point of laying down my book, when suddenly, something flashed across my mental vision, and the very foundation of my mind seemed to tremble; while a voice as if from beneath whispered, "you must not use your reason in these matters." I saw instantaneously that I was in an unregenerate state, and therefore must not expect to understand these profound mysteries. This consideration was immediately reinforced and strengthened by another which I had often heard from a venerable old deacon of my native town. "Man," said he, "in a state of nature, is incapable of thinking a good thought;" and by parity of reasoning, thought I, he must also be incapable of understanding a good argument. I however resolved to read the work attentively. I did so. But for my life, I could not comprehend one-half the author said. What was to be done? The more I thought of the subject, the more difficulties there seemed to be to encounter.

Here another thought flashed across my mind, and seemed to tear it from its very foundation. This revealed in an instant, the whole grand mystery. I had been reading the work in order to understand it; whereas it was very plain, if I persisted in such a course, I should ruin my own soul. For no man could understand these things until he had been entirely made anew; and had been constituted a genuine believer; which was equivalent to saying, that I must first be brought to believe these things, and then—and then after that—I may read them; but it is unsafe for me to do so before. This consideration made the whole matter very plain. I had wasted all this time in vainly endeavoring to comprehend what no man in a state of nature ever has comprehended or ever can understand. I saw that it was useless to read unless I could understand, and that I never could understand spiritual things in an unconverted state. "Man," thought I, "in a state of grace is evidently the very reverse of what he is in a state of nature. And hence instead of reading, understanding and believing, as the child of nature does, the order must be reversed, and man must believe first, then understand, and then read." Now, too, I could account for all my perplexities about sour faces and angry looks. These smiling faces and glad countenances, I saw, were nothing but the sunshine of the heart in its natural state; the child of grace has nothing in common with these—nothing of this kind about him. No, far from that; the child of grace, he who has true piety and godliness of heart, and possesses a heart warmed by pure, and generous philanthropy, is so far from possessing any of the smiles and cheerfulness of the natural man, that he very seldom speaks to, or treats with common civility any person who does not go to the same church that he does. The truth of the story is, I must have religion—I must have a radical change of heart. I will live no longer in a state of nature.

Such, gentle reader, was the state of my mind at the close of the first week of my stay in what I had supposed to be a paradise upon earth. How I succeeded in getting a new heart, and the awful result of all my investigations and book-readings, will be made the subject of another communication. SIGMA.

BURNING OF THE LEXINGTON AND GOSPEL BANNER.

Br. GROSS—Permit me, through the Magazine and Advocate, to offer a few remarks in reply to an article in the Gospel Banner, from the pen of our worthy brother, its Editor, on my sermon delivered in this city, on the burning of the Lexington. I request this privilege, not for the purpose of discussing the merits of that production, with Br. Drew, but to save others from the same errors into which he has fallen. Hence my desire (and consequently my request) to have my remarks appear in your paper, instead of the Banner, as the former circulates more in the region supplied with the pamphlet in question.

Br. Drew objects to one principle which, he says, is "put forth in that discourse." It is, that the ill-fated passengers in that boat, (the Lexington,) deserved the fate they shared, by violating a law of God, which, the author says, "requires us to put to sea only in sound and well protected vessels." Gravitation is a law of nature, and God is its author. It is not a moral, but a physical law. Were it repealed for any length of time, a miracle would be required to keep man on earth, the earth in her orbit, and the universe from chaotic confusion. Hence this law, ever in force, evinces the goodness of God. But the least infringement of this law, whether it be the result of ignorance or intention, is visited with punishment. The child who, ignorant of the law of gravitation, walks off the roof of a building, is not borne up by guardian angels; and seated gently upon the ground, and descends with accelerated velocity, and often pays, with his life, the penalty of the law he has unwittingly transgressed. Will Br. D., on this account, condemn the order of nature, and say "it strikes us as a pretty severe penalty for the innocent violation of a law of which the child was 'ignorant'?" To him it may appear so. How then will he account for the fact that the child falls and is killed? If he did not "deserve so severe a misfortune," how happens it that he suffers it? Has God been cruel instead of just, and rendered to him more than he deserved? Truly "it must be a sorry consolation to the bereaved relations and friends of" the unfortunate child, to hear such a character ascribed to the Deity!

Perhaps it will be said that "the supposed case, as well as that of the Lexington, was a mere accident, or 'misfortune,' with which the Creator had nothing to do." But can Br. Drew assent to this notion, bordering so largely on skepticism? If God governs the universe, then all events must be traced directly or indirectly to him, as their cause. If he does not, then we may with pro-piety doubt his existence, and seek repose beneath the black banner of atheism!

Once more; it is a law in the physical world, that when highly combustible substances are placed in close contact with fire, they shall ignite and produce a flame. If it were not so, the chill blasts of winter might spread desolation over the northern climes, and render gloomy and cheerless the habitation of men; the art of cookery would be unknown; metallic ores would lie undisturbed in the bosom of the earth, and nearly all the conveniences of life would be wanting. How wise and how benevolent is this law then!

But fire will destroy the life of man if he rushes into it. He may be an idiot or a mad man; neither his idiocy nor insanity will save him. And this certain and fatal consequence, of plunging into the devouring element, as clearly proclaims to intelligent beings, a law requiring them to avoid the fire, as God proclaimed the decalogue to Moses, amidst the terrors of Sinai. If they transgress it to a certain extent, death is their portion, though it may be considered a "severe penalty."

Now did not the passengers on board the Lexington transgress these laws? Did they not neglect to take the precautions requisite to insure safety? Did they not go aboard of that boat without sufficient regard to the dictates of prudence, which would have forbidden their embarking until the cotton was removed from the immediate vicinity of the fire, and the boat was in every respect sea worthy? None will deny this. And what was the consequence of their imprudence? They perished. And was not this the penalty of the law they infringed? Reason answers yes! Then why does Br. Drew object to the principles he alludes to in my discourse? And why, but to avoid adopting this principle, does he speak of calamities like that of the burning of the Lexington, as "misfortunes?" Will he inform us whether God has any agency in producing what he calls misfortunes or not? If he has are they deserved, by those who suffer them, or are they not? We may not be so far apart as he imagines after all.

Br. D. objects to my "comparison of the horrors of that night, etc.," "as out of place." Others think it was proper. My object was, to show that Partialists, themselves, would condemn characters far better in the eye of reason than they represent the object of their worship to be, in hopes of arousing those of that class who heard that discourse, (it was not intended for publication when written) to serious reflection upon the nature of their creed, and thus to the adoption of a better one. And the effort was likely to prove more successful at that time, than at any subsequent period, since the public had not then recovered from the shock occasioned by the intelligence of the disaster. I have yet to learn that the comparison was "one born out of due time."

In trying to "provoke consistency in" my "argument," Br. D. has destroyed the consistency of his whole friendly criticism! He asks, "If it was 'barbarous indifference' in Kenny, or Lamphere, (I said nothing about the indifference of this sloop!) or Terrell, not to repair to the Lexington to rescue the sufferers, etc., what would Br. Cook call it in God, which could look on and not prevent the sufferings which actually took place?" I answer; had they not deserved such a fate, for a violation of some of the inflexible laws of God, I should be constrained to pronounce it barbarous indifference in Him. But as he was only suffering them to reap the reward of their doings, I "call it" mercy, not merely to them, but to the world of mankind. It was with this view of the subject, that I remarked in my sermon, "not one pang" of grief "has been suffered by the children of men, from the dawn of human existence, down to the present time; but what, could we clearly comprehend its design, would as clearly reveal to our understanding, the riches of divine Benevolence, as do the ten thousand thousand joys that crown our obedience to Heaven." What does Br. Drew call it?

But Kenny and Tyrrell (if guilty of what they were charged with) violated, not a physical, but a moral law, which requires us to love our neighbor as ourselves. They stifled the generous promptings of humanity, and justly deserve the contempt and execration of every philanthropic mind. This view of the matter, I trust will so far relieve Br. D. from the inconvenience of his affected blindness, as to enable him to see my argument in its proper light, and to withdraw the charge of inconsistency which he has virtually preferred against it.

LETTER III.

"And death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works." Rev. xx: 13.

Whatever, or wherever, the place or places may be, designated by the sea, by death and by hell, it does not appear that they are here used to signify places of punishment for the dead; otherwise they would receive in them according to their deeds. It can not be, therefore, that the word hell, as used in this sentence, signifies a place of endless misery. Because to bring forth the dead from a place of endless misery to receive according to their deeds, would be, to say the least, absurd. If it means the grave, then what place is meant by death? And if it means the abode of departed spirits, I would then ask if departed spirits are to be found in the sea also? And not only this, but death and hell after having delivered up their dead, are cast into the lake of fire. How could this be, if death and hell were constituted places of endless punishment? The absurdities that thus present themselves, show conclusively that the prophet has used these words figuratively, and applied them to the state of the apostate church, the subject on which he was then writing. And in this use of language, he is sustained by David in the Psalms, by Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Christ, as might be shown, but for want of room I shall for the present omit it.

The sea, and death, and hell, are addressed or spoken of as places of power holding dominion, and as delivering up their dead through compulsion; because, not only are they compelled to deliver up their dead, but death and hell by a superior force are cast into the lake of fire. And this agrees with the state of the question, touching the empire of the beast, which contains church and state united, and is better represented by these terms than any other. For this adulterous wedlock of church and state, constitutes in its civil authorities, death, and in its church relations, hell; and this, is the state of that empire to this day, and more or less of all the daughters who have followed the example in the same unholy union.

"And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." As death and hell properly denotes dominion over the apostate dead, that dominion is lost when the beast and false prophet are taken by him that rides upon the white horse, and cast alive into a lake of fire. Death and hell must then deliver up their dead, for church and state necessarily goes with the beast and false prophet into the lake of fire.

The first death represents the state of the dead, as delivered up by death and hell, and in which state they stand before God to be judged. The second death, the judgments of God brought upon them for their abominations; represented by a lake of fire, as a proper emblem of that punishment. To apostatize from God, is death to the soul, because it loses the spirit of life; and to be judged and punished for that apostacy, is a second death, necessarily brought upon the offender, as a proper chastisement. The second death is therefore a means in the hand of God, effectually to overcome the apostacy, to put a stop to the man of sin, and to restore the world to life, liberty and peace. It is therefore replete with the best consequences.

"And whosoever was not found written in the book of life, was cast into the lake of fire." Those referred to in this prophecy, whose names are not in the book of life, are the worshippers of the beast. It is written in Rev. xiii: 8: "and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Also in Rev. xiv: 9. "If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation, and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever, and they have no rest day nor night who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." That apostate Christians have their names blotted from the book of life, we may learn from Rev. iii: 5. "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life." And that those whose names are blotted from the book of life are liable to the punishment of the second death, is manifest from Rev. ii: 11. "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." This sentiment is again expressed Rev. xxi: 7, 8. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things, and I will be his God and he shall be my son. But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." All these characters are applied by the Revelator to the apostate church in the course of his work. There is no question therefore, but what the apostate church will suffer the punishment of the second death, whether any other portion of the human family does or not. And yet, surprising to relate, that Mystery Babylon, and all who have come out of her and brought her doctrines with them, have interpreted these scriptures to mean endless misery. Verily the wise are taken in their own craftiness—or as Nathan said to David, "Thou art the man."

The blessings promised to those who overcome, are all that can be desired by man. They are to receive of the fruit of the tree of life, to eat of the hidden manna, to be presented with a white stone and a new name, to receive power over the nations, to be clothed in white raiment, to be made a pillar in the temple of God, and to sit down with Christ on his throne. But he that overcometh not, but continues in his apostacy, shall be hurt of the second death, shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, shall be tormented with fire and brimstone, shall be cast into a lake of fire, and shall be tormented for ever and ever, or ages of ages. Blessed and holy (therefore) is he that hath part in the first resurrection. (For) on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.

Gen. Washington's opinion of profane swearing has often been quoted but can not be too often repeated. It is recorded in the Orderly Book of the army under command of the great General, dated at head-quarters, in the city of New-York, August 3, 1776:

"The General is sorry to be informed that the foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing, a vice heretofore but little known in an American army, is growing into fashion—he hopes the officers will, by example as well as influence, endeavor to check it, and that they and the men will reflect that we can have but little hope of the blessing of Heaven on our arms, if we insult it by impiety and folly; added to this, it is a vice so mean and low without any temptation, that every man of sense and character detests and despises it."

MR. LEWIS C. TODD.

It will be recollected by most of our readers that this gentleman publicly renounced Universalism in the Spring of 1833, in Chautauque county, where he then resided, and where he had for some years been preaching the doctrine, and for two years editing and publishing a paper (the "Genius of Liberty,") in its defence. It will also be recollected that his renunciation was published entire, accompanied with a review, in the Magazine and Advocate for August 10, of that year. (Vol. iv. No. 32.) That renunciation, (though unaccompanied by my review of it,) was seized by the self-styled Orthodox, and by nearly every Limitarian sect and print throughout our land, with the utmost avidity, and trumpeted from Dan to Beersheba, as though it proved the complete and everlasting overthrow of Universalism and the eternal triumph of the doctrine of endless misery, although it contained not a single argument from the Bible against the former, or in favor of the latter doctrine.

Taking into consideration the state of mind and situation in which Mr. T. then was, and had been for some time previous to his renunciation, I regarded and spoke of it as the result of "some intellectual hallucination, or temporary prejudice, or hypochondriacal affection." I thought then, and have thought ever since, that Mr. T., after further reflection—after years had passed away and the excitement attending that step, had entirely subsided, and he had taken opportunity to review the whole ground in sober earnest, would himself come to the same conclusion. That opinion is now confirmed by the following article from Mr. T.'s own hand.

Mr. Campbell, in his controversy with me, accuses me of having "most shamefully abused" Mr. T. "because of his honesty." This charge I denied at the time, (and would again deny,) declaring that I had "never abused him, either for his honesty or anything else," that I had "never had an unkind feeling towards, or wish to injure him," and appealed to all I had ever written or said about him. It will be recollected that Mr. Campbell laid great stress on Mr. Todd's renunciation, and considered (or wished to have his readers consider) himself and cause triumphant over Universalism, by the testimony of Mr. T. What will Mr. C. and his coadjutors say now? Will they publish the following article from Mr. T. as readily as they did his renunciation?—nay, as readily even as Universalists published his renunciation? Will they even inform their readers of the fact? Let us see whether there is a single Methodist, or Presbyterian, or Baptist, or any other Partialist paper in the land, that will inform their readers of what Mr. T. now says.

Will my dear brother, Alexander Campbell, or dare he, inform his readers that Br. L. C. Todd, from whom he quoted so largely in his efforts to demolish Universalism, now says of that very renunciation, "I have long been satisfied that my renunciation was the result of a state of mind unfavorable to the investigation of truth"—"a kind of hypochondriacism, which physiologists know to be a diseased state of some of the organs of thought"—when "every thing appeared almost the reverse of what it had appeared before."—"And now I feel myself no more accountable for anything I have said or done for the doctrine of endless punishment, than any one is for having a fever."—"My defence—is entirely defective in relation to endless punishment. And my assertions in reference to the conduct of Universalists, can only show how their conduct appeared to me at the time, and although they were written with the most scrupulous conscientiousness for truth, I consider them little more entitled to confidence than they would be if uttered in the deliriums of a fever."—"I do not think that any intelligent person of sound mind, can believe in endless punishment. 1. Because such punishment is horribly unjust. 2. The Bible represents the Deity as a just and good being."—"I have published ten times as much against the doctrine [of endless misery] as for it; let my readers get all my published writings, and read both sides; and I will risk the result. I have been all my life opposed to the doctrine with the exception of about a year. Let those who love the doctrine, have my labors of a single year; I think they needed some assistance."—"I am fully satisfied that real believers in the final purity and happiness of all men, are as much more virtuous and moral than believers in endless punishment, as they are more intelligent."

Will my friend Campbell please, or will he dare to lay these facts before his readers? The following letter is addressed to the Editors of the "Glad Tidings."

D. S.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—As I have given you permission to publish a series of essays formerly published by me in the "Genius of Liberty," it seems proper that the public know more definitely, my own views in regard to them, and my renunciation of Universalism. I have slightly perused them recently, and agree to the general sentiments therein expressed. I have long been satisfied, that my renunciation was the result of a state of mind unfavorable to the investigation of truth. Sedentary habits, intense study, the insincerity of some professors of Universalism, together with some other sources of trouble, had brought on a kind of hypochondriacism, which physiologists know to be a diseased state of some of the organs of thought. In this condition, every thing in religious matters appeared almost the reverse of what it had appeared before. A dark and dismal gloom gathered around the doctrine of Universalism, and the practice of its adherents. The change in my views and feelings was so great and complete, that I felt assured that God had brought on me this state of mind for the express purpose of bringing out the renunciation. And now I feel myself no more accountable for anything I have said or done for the doctrine of ENDLESS PUNISHMENT, than any one is for having a fever. My "DEFENCE," I think, contains much argument for FUTURE rewards and punishments, but is entirely defective in relation to ENDLESS PUNISHMENT.—And my assertions in reference to the conduct of Universalists, can only show how their conduct appeared to me at the time; and although they were written with the most scrupulous conscientiousness for truth, I consider them little more entitled to confidence, than they would be, if uttered in the deliriums of a fever.

When I had so far recovered as to know what had been the real difficulty with me, I became inert in religious concerns, but still the Bible appeared to teach ENDLESS PUNISHMENT; and just in proportion as it appeared to teach that sentiment it appeared to me to be unworthy of the regard of intelligent men, although it might be useful to the ignorant and vicious. Hence it follows that I must either be a Universalist or skeptic. And I do not think that any intelligent person of sound mind can believe in endless punishment. 1. Because such punishment is horribly unjust. 2. The Bible represents the Deity as a just and good being. These facts alone may be made to overthrow the doctrine beyond all controversy. But if the Bible does teach the doctrine of endless punishment, it is certain to my mind, that it not only contradicts itself, but such a fact would be a stronger argument against its divinity than all the arguments that have ever been used in its defence. With regard to those expressions, which speak of punishment or rewards as eternal, I think they are hyperbolical figures. And it might be showed that such kind of figures abound in all parts of the Bible, on almost all subjects. And these figures can only be detected by a knowledge of nature and facts. Such truths as God has exhibited in nature, must be truths indeed; and they can never bend to accommodate any written revelation; but all written revelation must be so construed as to comport with them; or at least so as not to be contrary to them.

Now the doctrine of endless punishment is contrary to the eternal and immutable principles of justice and goodness, as ascertained by the light of nature, science and philosophy; and consequently cannot be true. And no book can possibly prove it true, because no book can claim any authority which should teach any such unjust and unchristian sentiment.

The terrible and awful imagery, and frightful hyperboles, which describe the punishment of the wicked in the Bible, may be necessary to restrain the uncultivated class of men. This is probably a reason why it is used.

There appear to be many even among professors who can see no other reason why men should be good only to keep out of hell. Even some of them tell us, if they knew the punishment would ever end, they would do all the evil they could, notwithstanding all their religion! and if such religious folks can find no other motive to good actions than the fear of endless hell, we think it better for them, to have their brains haunted with it till they can be so taught as to be able to appreciate other and higher inducements.

It is said that my "DEFENCE," is sufficient proof of endless punishment. Let it pass for what it is worth. I have published ten times as much against the doctrine as for it, let my readers get all my published writings, and read both sides; and I will risk the result. I have been all my life opposed to the doctrine, with the exception of about a year. Let those who love the doctrine have my labors of a single year. I think they needed some assistance; and I am not desirous that they should become Universalists, until they become intelligent, so as to be capable of comprehending moral principles. My own conviction now is, that the Scriptures do not necessarily teach endless punishment. And I will further add, that I am fully satisfied that real believers in the final purity and happiness of all men, are as much more virtuous and moral than believers in endless punishment, as they are more intelligent.

SAVE—SALVATION.

Br. Upson says "I have been requested by several subscribers to solicit you, or some other one, to write an article upon the words, "Salvation", "saved", etc., commenting upon the different kinds of salvation spoken of in the New Testament especially, (and elsewhere, if convenient,) and publish said article, long or short, in the Magazine and Advocate, convenient for reference. You will undoubtedly perceive why this request is made—because our Partialist friends uniformly believe that these words refer to a future state almost exclusively. You are requested to be plain upon this point."

I have given this request here at full length, for the purpose of showing our friends who are able to spare two dollars per annum, how much they lose by not taking the "Expositor, and Universalist Review." The January number of that most excellent periodical contained, beside several other very valuable articles, one on these very words, in which their meaning and application was thoroughly and plainly investigated—more at length than we have room to do it in our columns, and more ably and completely than my abilities would enable me to perform it. That article alone is worth more than two dollars to any sincere and anxious inquirer after truth on this subject. And yet, almost every number has one, two or three, just such thorough and interesting expositions, written by the best writers and clearest minds in our denomination—articles which every inquiring mind would as greedily read as the thirsty man would drink of the cooling spring. Why, then, do not our lay brethren who are able, subscribe more generally for the Expositor? I can give but one reason—they do not know the real character—they do not realize the benefits and value of such a work to them and their neighbors. Many of our preachers, too, should have it—poverty, alone, (I hope for their credit,) prevents them from taking it. But could not some two or more of them club together and take a copy between them? Or could not they get one or more of their neighbors to unite in taking it with them in company?

The Expositor needs more good subscribers—it deserves them—and I do think that no society of Universalists in the country should be without one or more copies among its members. If no other way can be devised, let each society take up an annual collection to procure copies for general circulation. Let one of those copies be presented to the preacher as a donation, and the rest circulated among those members who are unable to subscribe for it for their own use. But, at such events, let the preacher be supplied with it, and let our wealthy lay members subscribe for it forthwith. What say our societies? Will they not make such a donation?

to their preachers, and so support a valuable and useful periodical? What is done, let it be done quickly.

A. B. G.

P. S. I will endeavor to furnish an abstract of the article from the Expositor, as soon as I can find time and room. I wish we had room for it entire.

"THE AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR THE DIFFUSION OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE."—A writer in the last Expositor, (probably T. C. A.) in speaking of District School Libraries, says—"By some strange trick of the trade—some phoenix-like power of the publishers—another 'Richmond' came into the field, 'who was not yet another.' Harpers' old series got new title pages and new binding, and came before the purchasers for the district school libraries as the School Library of 'The American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.'"

I have nothing to say, in particular, and at present, against this Library—not having fully examined it—though some of the works in it are tinged with sectarianism, and others are such as I could not warmly recommend as suitable for that object. My present object is to state what I know of the society under whose auspices this Library is published. The name is a great one—a taking one—a name that may influence some to purchase the books without examination, because that name is put on the title page, when, in fact, that very name is a strong reason why the books should be scrutinizingly examined before they are purchased by any friend to unsectarian education.

It was my hap to be one of a committee appointed by the State Education Convention, held in this city a few years ago, to confer with the Rev. Gorham D. Abbott, the General Agent of "The American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," on the objects and plans of that society. The Agent assured us that it merely designed to publish and encourage those publications which were well imbued with the general principles of Christianity—that it was not, and would not be, sectarian in any sense; and referred us for proof, to the names of its officers, and particularly to those of eminent Unitarians, as the Hon. Edward Everett, and others. But on being driven to a more definite reply, by several direct questions, he admitted that the doctrines of the trinity, vicarious atonement, endless sin and misery, and their kindred tenets, would be among those principles which the Society would feel itself bound to inculcate and support in the publications it might issue, or encourage others to issue, from the press; and that it would do all in its power to discourage the circulation of works in any wise, opposed to these doctrines! On being pressed to reconcile this admission with the asserted unsectarian character of the Society, he denied these doctrines to be sectarian—declared that all Christians held them, and that all who denied these doctrines of the trinity and endless misery, were infidels—thus virtually declaring that the very Board of Managers of this Christian Society had in it not a few Infidels!!!

Of course, after various fruitless attempts to draw up a Report which should please all parties, the Committee reported a milk and water resolution in approbation of this "American Society," but declining any connection with it. When the Report came before the Convention, I opposed it, and succeeded in getting the obnoxious approval so modified as to embrace only its efforts to spread correct useful knowledge, among the people, (I speak from memory only,) in which shape it passed by a small majority, much to the chagrin of the worthy General Agent, who declared that he would rather it had been defeated, than passed in that shape. And so ended that attempt to aid "The American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge"—in "faint praise" that was felt to be "condemnation." And thus, too, was it proved to the satisfaction of a majority of that Convention, and of the audience present, that the professions of unsectarianism of this American (?) Society were as hollow and hypocritical as those of the "American Sunday School Union." Both have assumed the task of being "dictators to the consciences of thousands of immortal souls," (as the latter has publicly declared,) and both will persist in their assumption. Beware, then, how you trust to the professions of these self-styled "American" societies—they are sectarian to the very heart's core—"up to the hub"! Again I say, Beware!

It is due to the Rev. G. D. Abbott, to say that he treated me as politely as his difficult position allowed him to do; and that, too, even after he was compelled to unmask his society, and unchristianize me. We parted in good humor, and, infidel as he deemed me, with professions of mutual respect and good will—sincere on my part toward him, but I pretended no respect for—no good will toward this American Society.

BY THY WORDS SHALT THOU BE CONDEMNED.

When we hear a description of the sublime and beautiful, of the conquest of truth, of the triumph of integrity, or of the spread of Christianity, and, as the speaker's heart glows with the brightness of the holy theme, witness the hearer's approving smile, and that satisfaction which can be looked, as it is felt, even when it can not be expressed, we conclude that the hearer has a sympathy for the pure and lofty. If we could go and visit the sunny glade, vocal with rapturous life, or listen to the thunder's loudest peal, or the cataract's roar—that eloquence of nature which stirs the sensitive soul with emotions of grandeur—and not feel the joy, and the wonder, and the awe of our hearts diffusing themselves over the countenance, and speaking through the eye and the gesture, methinks we might justly bear the charge of stoicism and cold hearted indifference.

But suppose an individual should portray the opposition which the truth has met with in the world, and should contrast with it the more successful promulgation of it in our own day. He speaks of the expiring moments of persecution, that destroying angel which has spread devastation over the earth, under the cloak of religion; of bigotry and superstition retiring from the habitations of intelligence; of hope gladdening the heart of the hopeless, of light beaming in celestial radiance where darkness reigned, of faith claiming and receiving the allegiance of thousands, and finally of fruition filling the souls of the whole race of intelligences. What emotions would you look for in the countenance of the intelligent and pious listener? Would it be malignant hatred, and mean contempt, and mad defiance, and dark despair? No! there would be life in the eye, a smile on the lips, and a triumph in the pent-up breath as it bursts from the control of eloquence. But it would be the triumph of hope, of joy, of holy principle.

Partialist reader, would you deem it possible that all these emotions without this basis of holiness, could be felt and exhibited, under the influence of the most damning fanaticism? Would you not say if you witnessed such a scene, that it betokened a heart as far from the spirit of Christ as heaven is from hell?

I came to such a conclusion once, for I saw just such a scene exhibited by a young man who had conceived the notion that his pure and exalted feelings could not contemplate the horrible things which he had associated with the name of Universalism, without abhorrence. He went to hear what I suppose he called evangelical preaching—viz., to hear a preacher put down Universalism, or in other words, fool his hearers by making them believe that all he said about Universalists was true. Well, the preacher pretended to show that there was danger of losing the soul. This he did by showing that we might always know where to find the lost soul—viz., in hell. The benevolent young man's eyes brightened. He heard the preacher assert the total depravity of the human heart, and his eyes flashed with gratification. He listened to the denunciation of those who would not repent immediately, and the suggestion that they might be in hell before the next morning if they went away without making their peace with God, called up a smile on his lips. It was such a powerful argument against Universalism! But the best was to come. The preacher continued, "The heathen had gone down to hell by thousands!" The young saint nestled a little on his seat. "And Universalism was now leading, and was destined to lead a majority of God's heritage after them." The saint looked around, as much as to say, What do you think of that? "It was evident that Universalism could not be true, for all pirates, and murderers, and thieves, and liars, etc., believed in it." The saint looked very agreeable. "And if Universalists did not repent, and abandon their God-dishonoring heresy, they would be damned as certain as there was a God in heaven." It was enough! Whether the young man was rejoiced at the prospect of a hell peopled with immortal souls, or whether it was especially gratifying to him that Universalists would help to swell the number, or whether he was pleased with the supposed success of his preacher, or whether his countenance belied his heart, is not for me to say; but there was triumph on that brow that told no honorable tale. And I thought that if it did speak the real emotions of his soul, and there was to be no change after death, his spirit, to be made happy, must be permitted to sit upon the battlements of hell, and witness the scorching agonies of its million victims, and swell the reverberating groans of despair, with the loud laugh of a self-esteemed saint!!

Reader, you have already decided that the Christian spirit could not display emotions of joy under the ravings of fanaticism. Have you ever rejoiced in the thought that Universalism would not prove true? By thine own words shalt thou be condemned.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate
LINES

On the death of Mrs. H. L. Simmons, who died in Bristol, February 18, 1840.

Calm and serene as yon blue sky
Fair Helen sleeps in death's embrace;
No more to draw the heaving sigh,
She's gone to taste a Saviour's grace.

That brow, though now so pale and cold,
Those ghastly cheeks now sunk in gloom,
But lately in fresh beauty told
That health there dwelt in living bloom.

Rich were thy hopes of future joys,
Bright promises were held to view,
Of earthly bliss without alloy.
With brothers, friends, and partner too.

To pass a few more days on earth,
To view a brother's laughing eye,
To join with friends in harmless mirth—
O, these are sweet—"tis hard to die."

To sit once more in pensive mood,
Encircled by kind friends at home,
Or muse in silent solitude,
And o'er past years in fancy roam—

What charms do such reflections bring,
To one whose hopes death comes to blight;
How sad to see the tyrant king;
Destroy such scenes of pure delight.

Departed friend! alas, to thee,
Those scenes are folded from thy view!
All worldly joys, fond pleasure's glee,
Fair earth, and friends, all, all, adieu!

Adieu, a long, and last adieu!
No more on earth thy form we see;
Though tears shall long the grave bedew,
Yet tears are shed in vain for thee.

Grief can not raise the sleeping dead,
The valley long must be thy rest,
Thy body in the dust is laid,
Thy spirit now in Christ is blest.

Thou'rt gone to see the Lord of love,
To join the blissful angel throng,
To view Jerusalem above,
And chant with saints the deathless song.

Then, why lament, O, kindred soul!
Why mourn for her whose home is Heaven—
Celestial bliss—man's final goal,
Which God, through Christ, to man has given!

PSALM 103. Ver. 11, 12.

"My days are like a shadow that declineth: and I am withered like grass. But thou, O Lord, shalt endure forever, and thy remembrance unto all generations."

A "shadow" never continueth in one stay, but is still gliding imperceptibly on, lengthening as it goes, and at last vanisheth into darkness. The period of its existence is limited to a day at farthest. The rising sun gives it birth, and in that moment when the sun sets it is no more. The "grass" of the field, in like manner, hath a being of the same duration. In the morning, clothed with verdure and beauty, it refresheth and delighteth the eye of the beholder; but the evening findeth it cut down, dried up, and withered. Such is the life of man, sojourning in this land of captivity, and doing penance for his sins. But the eternity of Jehovah, the infallibility of his promises, and the remembrance of his former works and mercies, comfort our hearts, and encourage us to hope, nay even to rejoice, in the midst of sorrow and tribulation.—Horne.

BEAUTIFUL SENTIMENT.—The modest deportment of those who are truly wise, when contrasted with the assuming air of the ignorant, may be compared to the different appearances of wheat, which, while its ear is empty, holds up its head proudly, but as soon as it is filled with grain, bends modestly down, and withdraws from observation.

Bachelors, get married; ladies, put on woollen stockings, and thick-soled shoes; editors, stop lying and do the public a service; politicians, cease quarrelling about the truth, for the more you quarrel, the farther you get from it.

MARRIAGES.

In Champion, on the evening of February 16th by Rev.
H. L. Hayward, Mr. JOAB MILLER, to Miss LUCINDA A., daughter of Wm. Twining, Esq., all of Champion.

In Bristol, February 5th, by Rev. Wm. Queal, Mr. AL-PHEUS RANDAL, to Miss HARRIET FINLEY, all of Bristol.

In Waterville, N. Y., February 3d, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. ISAAC WILMOT, to Miss SUSAN DANA, of the former place.

DEATHS.

At Panama, November 30th, Mr. BENJAMIN DICKINSON, in the 29th year of his age. Also, in Oil Creek, Pa., Feb-9th, Mrs. SARAH DICKINSON, aged 29 years, wife of the above. About 20 months since, this couple were married by the writer: they both lie buried now by the side of each other. It is not known that Mr. Dickinson made any profession of religion. It is enough to say of Mrs. Dickinson, that she lived a Universalist in spirit and in truth, and died triumphant in that faith. This notice is sent for publication by her request made just before she expired. L. PAINE.

On the 31st day of January, ELIJAH WOOLCOTT, aged 60 years, after an illness of nine weeks, caused by inflammation arising from a wound inflicted by an axe on the knee.
He died leaving a good character, mild and inoffensive in disposition, honest and upright in his dealings and habits, respected by all who knew him. He was a firm believer in the doctrine of universal salvation, and remained firm and steadfast in that faith in the hour of his death, witnessing to all who called to see him, his firm confidence in a Saviour of redeeming grace, and manifesting a willingness to go to his God without a doubt as to his future welfare.
He has left a numerous family to mourn their loss. And strange to tell, the grave was hardly closed over his remains, before a worthless, evil-minded person, reported that he had renounced his religious principles before he died; which was reiterated by the believers of endless misery far and wide. The person, when asked the reason why he reported such a story, said he knew he had, because he heard him pray, and Universalists never pray.

DANIEL PARKER.

In Bristol, February 15th, Mrs. HELEN L. SIMMONS, consort of Mr. Richmond Simmons, 3d, in the 19th year of her age. Just as our departed friend was entering on the busy theatre of human action, cheered with hope and animated by those pleasurable feelings and emotions which appertain to the young and active, she was arrested in the midst of her usefulness, by the icy touch of death, and laid low in the dust. By this painful event, a kind husband and two affectionate brothers, together with other relatives and friends, are called to mourn their loss of one who was greatly beloved by all who knew her, and was endeared to them by the excellence of her character, and the sincerity of her affections. The infant child of the deceased, that died a few days previous, was laid upon the arm of its mother, and now side by side they sleep in death, like the buds of early flowers prematurely withered by an unexpected frost. But we trust, their spirits have returned to their heavenly Father who gave them being, to mingle with the glorified millions in the cloudless regions of everlasting day. May all who are afflicted by this event of Providence, submit to it, with the spirit and fortitude of Christians, and be enabled to say cheerfully and affectionately, "Not our wills, but thine, O God be done." Funeral services were performed on the occasion by the writer, in the presence of a large and deeply sympathising congregation. WM. QUEAL.

In Liverpool N. Y., January 7th, of consumption, Br.
JOHN PINNEY, aged 33 years. Br. P. died as he has lived, a Universalist, in the full acceptance of the word. He bore up under his long protracted illness, with Christian fortitude and resignation. He was a worthy citizen, an affectionate husband, and a kind and tender father. He has left an amiable companion and an interesting little daughter, together with a numerous circle of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. May they be comforted with the assurance that the "spirit has gone to that God who gave it," and that the "dead shall be raised incorruptible." May they not mourn as without hope. His funeral was attended on the 20th, and a discourse delivered by the writer from Rom.
v. 20, 21.

In Prattsburgh, Steuben county, September 26th, 1839,
ELIZA ANN TOOK, after an illness of only five days, aged 14 years. She was the hope of her family and relatives.
Her funeral was attended on the following day by Br. M.
L. Wisner. M. S. POTTER.

At Canastota, Madison county, N. Y., on the 18th of October last, MARY ELWOOD, daughter of Mary and Isaac Quackenbush, aged 14 months, and 5 days. Also, at Canastota, Allegany county, on the 16th of February, MARY, wife of Isaac Quackenbush, and daughter of John Smith, formerly of Kinderhook and Fort Plain, aged 23 years, 1 month and 9 days. Within the short space of three years, Mr. Quackenbush has parted with his two only children, and the partner of his bosom, and been left solitary and alone, and pierced with the shafts of affliction—behind him grief —before him melancholy. But he is not without the consolatory hope that the sun of peace will yet shine upon him to dispel the cloud of affliction; and that he will be reunited with his kindred spirits beyond this transient world, in the fulness of time.—Communicated.

SECTION III.

The genealogy of Christ.

MATTHEW I. 1 The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham.

2 Abraham begat Isaac; and Isaac begat Jacob; and Jacob begat Judas and his brethren;

3 And Judas begat Phares, and Zara of Thamar; and Phares begat Esrom; and Esrom begat Aram;

4 And Aram begat Aminadab; and Aminadab begat Naasson; and Naasson begat Salmon;

5 And Salmon begat Booz of Rachab; and Booz begat Obed of Ruth; and Obed begat Jesse;

6 And Jesse begat David the king; and David the king begat Solomon, of her that had been the wife of Urias;

7 And Solomon begat Roboam; and Roboam begat Abia; and Abia begat Asa;

8 And Asa begat Josaphat; and Josaphat begat Joram; and Joram begat Ozias;

9 And Ozias begat Joatham; and Joatham begat Achaz; and Achaz begat Ezekias;

10 And Ezekias begat Manasses; and Manasses begat Amon; and Amon begat Josias;

11 And Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren, about the time they were carried away to Babylon;

12 And after they were brought to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel; and Salathiel begat Zerobabel;

13 And Zerobabel begat Abiud; and Abiud begat Eliakim; and Eliakim begat Azor;

14 And Azor begat Sadoc; and Sadoc begat Achim; and Achim begat Eliud;

15 And Eliud begat Eleazar; and Eleazar begat Matthan; and Matthan begat Jacob;

16 And Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ.

17 So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations.

"The evidences of Christianity, can not be correctly, if at all understood, unless the genealogy of the Messiah, and his descent from Abraham and David be distinctly traced. This

LUKE III. 23 And Jesus himself began to be about 30 years of age, being (as was supposed,) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli, is obvious from the prophecies, which, ages before his son of Sem, which was the advent, determined the line son of Noe, which was the of his descent, and left nothing to chance or imposture on the important subject of the promised seed, son of Enoch, which was that in the fulness of time, the son of Jared, which was to "bruise the serpent's head," and by this one oblation of himself, once offered, was to make a full and perfect atonement for the sins of the whole world."—Horne's Introduction, Vol. I. p. 350.

MATT. I. 1. The book of the generation. This is thought by some to refer merely to the first seventeen verses of this chapter, giving the genealogy of the Saviour; while others consider the phrase as a title to the whole of Matthew's Gospel. The former seems the most correct opinion, and appears to be sanctioned by the following passages, Gen. v: 1; ii: 4; xxxvii: 2; Num. iii: 1. Dr. Adam Clarke, however favors the latter view of the phrase, and refers to these passages for proof. But whatever may be said of the others, Gen. ii: 4 is obviously against the view he adopts. The phrase must there be understood, not as denoting the history of the world, but merely its birth or genealogy—that is, its origin, and the successive steps of its formation.

8. Joram begat Ozias. Ozias was not the immediate son of Joram, but was distant three generations. Such omissions were common in the Jewish genealogies. Compare Ezra vii: 3, with 1 Chron. vi: 7-9.

11. Josias begat Jechonias. Neither was Jechonias the immediate son of Josias; but his grandson, and the immediate son of Jehoakim. See 1 Chron. iii: 15, 16. This supplement is necessary to make out the fourteen generations, between David and the carrying away to Babylon.

16. Christ. This term is from the Greek christos, and means anointed. It should be preceded by the article, as the term is not a proper name; but is used merely to denote the office of the Saviour filled. It should therefore have been rendered the Christ. As we say, Augustus the emperor, Herod the king; so we should say Jesus the Christ. Jesus Christ is as improper rendering of Jesous o Christos as it is improper to say Augustus emperor, or Herod king. The corresponding Hebrew term is Messiah. The propriety of applying these terms to the Saviour is seen in the fact, that, among the Jews, prophets, priests, and kings were anointed, when they were set apart to their respective offices; and as Jesus fills these three offices in a more elevated sense than any other being, he is properly and emphatically called the Christ. See Lev. iv: 3; 1 Sam. ii: 10; Ps. cv: 15; Isa. xlv: 1.

17. Fourteen generations. The Jews, in referring to their genealogies, were accustomed to sum up the number of generations occurring between particular important periods, in some such summary manner as here stated.

LUKE III. 23. As was supposed. Jesus was not the son of Joseph but was merely regarded as such. The Jews no doubt considered him such, but Luke was aware that he was not, as he had been begotten directly by the divine spirit. Being regarded by the Jews as the son of Joseph, he was doubtless put down as such upon the genealogical tables.

Joseph was the son of Heli. That is, in the same manner as Jesus was of Joseph being regarded as such on the public records. It is obvious from this construction of the language, and in this verse, that we are left to as much liberty in supposing the relation between Joseph and Heli, to be other than that of actual father and son, as we are in respect to the relation between Jesus and Joseph. The public records regarded the relation as that of father and son, in both cases; but in one case we have reason to believe that the relation was only "supposed," not real. And hence should we find any good reason for believing that the same is true in the other case, we shall be justified in adopting that opinion. See the concluding remarks.

27. Salathiel was the son of Neri. Matthew says that Salathiel was the son of Jechonias, to which agrees 1 Chron. iii: 17. To reconcile the two verses we must conclude that the relation expressed by Luke was "supposed," and so placed on the public records; but was really something else. See concluding remarks.

36. Which was the son of Cainan. In Gen. x: 24, Sala is called the son of Arphaxad and no mention is made of Cainan, whom Luke placed between them. But this omission may be accounted for like others of a similar kind. See Matt. i: 8, 11, and the notes.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

Much investigation has been resorted to by Christians to reconcile the discrepancies existing between the genealogies as given by Matthew and Luke. And by infidels much labor has been employed to prove that they can not be reconciled. And considering how much has been said and written on this subject, it will not be expected, nor would it be consistent with the design of the present articles, to enter into a full and elaborate discussion of the main questions here involved. We will venture to offer only a few remarks. In the first place, I must confess my inability to discover wherein consists the great importance that many Christians have attached to the present point. That if it were a fact, that the genealogies given by Matthew and Luke are defective, or even contradictory, as maintained by infidels. Does it follow that the evangelists were not inspired, or that the Christian religion is false?

Is it supposed that God condescended to impart directly and supernaturally to the minds of Matthew and Luke the knowledge which these genealogies imply, or is it more rational to conclude that they took their accounts from genealogical tables that were kept in the public depositories of the Jews? If the former were the opinion entertained by Christians, infidels might well object to any discrepancies that these genealogies might seem to contain; but if we suppose, (as all will admit as the most rational and consistent) that they were transcribed by the evangelists from the public tables, then it follows, that the evangelists are acquitted, and that the blame (if any) that has been attached to them belongs to others. The defects or contradictions, if there are any, in these genealogies are the errors of those to whom the preparation and preservation of the genealogical tables were committed, and not of those who transcribed them. Thus all objection to Christianity drawn from this source, falls to the ground. And if the object of these remarks was merely to answer the infidel objection, we might here learn the subjects, with the admission that the genealogies are as defective and contradictory, as infidelity may imagine. But we wrote for other purposes, also. And accordingly we will proceed to show, wherein it has been pretended that these genealogies are contradictory, and what solutions have been offered to remove the apparent discrepancy.

In Matt. i: 12, we are told that Jechonias begat Salathiel; and in Luke iii: 27, it is said that Salathiel was the son of Neri. In Matt. i: 13, we read that Zerobabel begat Abiud; but in Luke iii: 27 we are told that Rhesa was the son of Zerobabel. Also in Matt. i: 16, Jacob is said to have been the father of Joseph, while Luke iii: 23 represents Joseph as the son of Heli.

That here is an apparent contradiction is admitted; but that there is no real contradiction, will soon be seen. In the first place, it should be recollected that when Luke commences the genealogy of the Saviour, he makes use of the expression "as was supposed," to apprise us at the outset, that the genealogy he was about to present was given according to the supposition of others—that is, it was in accordance with the public registers, but not, in all cases, in accordance with truth. It has been thought by some, that he meant to confine the expression "as was supposed," to the relation between Jesus and his reputed father Joseph; but the reason of this restriction we have never yet discovered. But admitting the right of restricting the expression to that particular case, there is still another important consideration that would yet serve to show that Luke did not regard the relation of father and son as real, in all the cases stated in the genealogy he has given. It is this. He says that Jesus was (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, but he does not say that Joseph was the son of Heli: for it will be seen that the word son in the latter case, and in all the subsequent cases, is supplied by the translators.

Hence it will be seen that the genealogies of Matthew and Luke are not contradictory, whether we confine the expression "as was supposed," to the relation between Jesus and Joseph, or extend it to other instances.

With the supposition that the expression was designed to extend to other cases besides that of Jesus and Joseph, it follows that Matthew has stated what was, and Luke merely stated what was supposed to be. But with the supposition that the expression, "as was supposed," is limited to one case, it makes Matthew to affirm that Joseph was the son of Jacob; and Luke, that Joseph was of Heli, leaving the relation unexpressed, as we find that all the evangelists have done in several other instances. See, for example, Matt. i: 6; iv: 21; x: 3; Mark xvi: 1; Luke vi: 16; where the literal rendering would be "her of Uriah"—"James of Zebedee"—"James of Alphaeus"—"Mary of James"—"Judas of James."

But again, were we to admit that the word son is correctly applied by the translators, it remains to be seen in what sense that word is to be understood. It may denote a natural son or it may denote a son-in-law, that is by marriage; and it may denote a legal son in a sense which I will soon explain. If the first of these was the intention of Luke, then his account is opposed to that of Matthew. But who shall decide this point? The infidel may affirm that natural sonship was intended in both cases, but he must still allow the Christian to reply, that what he affirms is mere assertion, while the most plausible reasons can be offered for a contrary opinion.

I will explain. There existed among the Jews a law to this effect; "when a man died without issue, his nearest male relative was obliged to raise up seed to him: accordingly he married his widow, and the first born son of that marriage was reputed to be the son of the deceased, to whose name and rights he succeeded." Hence we may suppose that Matthew's genealogy is founded on the natural relation of the persons named in his list; while Luke's is based on the legal relation, as stated in the above law—a supposition which will not only explain the discrepancies which we have noticed, but also the difference in the number of generations, and in the names of the persons respectively mentioned.

But there is still another supposition that removes all the difficulties that are known to exist in the two genealogies, and that is favored by several important considerations. It is, that Joseph was the natural son of Jacob, as stated by Matthew, and the son-in-law of Heli, as the language of Luke will allow us to suppose: and that the same was intended in the other cases wherein they differ. This supposition is favored by the following weighty considerations. 1. The Jews were accustomed to omit, in speaking and writing, terms expressive of well-known relationships. This is done by Luke in the instance under consideration, and by the other Evangelists in several instances previously referred to. In such cases, therefore, the reader is left to such historical documents, or merely to conjecture, what the relation was that is thus left indefinite. Now that Mary was the daughter of Heli, and consequently that Joseph was his son-in-law, is favored by a tradition, both among the Jews and the early Christians. 2. It is related of the Jews that they never admitted the names of women into their genealogical tables, but substituted the names of their husbands, from which it became necessary in giving the genealogy of Jesus on his mother's side, to use the name of Joseph instead of Mary. 3. It seems most reasonable to suppose, that, since Matthew had given a genealogy of the Saviour, on his father's side, Luke should do the same on his mother's side; as this would be necessary to prove that Jesus had descended from Abraham and David, and the prophecies to that effect fulfilled in him, even though his descent on his father's side were questioned, as it might be, on the ground of his miraculous conception. For from both genealogies it will be seen, that the reputed father, and real mother of Jesus, were both descended from David, and consequently from Abraham, making out the truth of the prophecies relating to his descent, beyond the shadow of a doubt.

In conclusion it may be remarked, that Matthew wrote his Gospel particularly for the benefit of the Jews; and hence he does not carry his genealogy back any farther than Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation. But Luke wrote his Gospel for the benefit of the Gentiles, and accordingly he continues his genealogy back to God, who was and is the father of both Jews and Gentiles.

ORGANIZATION OF CHURCHES.

BY REV. A. C. BARRY.

The subject before us is one concerning which there has been much controversy, and much, perhaps, has been said, which had better been left unsaid, and which has tended to create in the minds of many, a deep rooted prejudice against Church organization. At the same time, we do not doubt but that much has been done toward eradicating those errors with regard to this matter, which have had so deleterious an effect in society, and in the Church of Christ, and leading mankind to view the subject in its proper light, and to entertain concerning it just and well grounded opinions.

In cutting themselves loose from what is termed the Orthodox Church, in abandoning a faith which they deemed to be erroneous, and embracing one that they conceived to be more firmly established in the word of Truth, very many went too far—they rejected every thing that pertained to the former system, without inquiring concerning its tendency, or whether it was sanctioned by the genius and spirit of the Gospel of Christ. And hence they rejected much that was good—much that was beneficial to mankind—much that was calculated to cultivate, and cherish, and improve, the pure and holy principles of the Gospel in the soul—much, the tendency of which was to cleanse and purify the heart, and make man wiser, and better, and happier.

Again, they brought with them, views, feelings and opinions, in support of which no proofs can be advanced from the Scriptures, and which are wholly without foundation in truth, and totally irreconcilable with facts. And not only so, but they are calculated to retard the mind in its progress toward perfection, and to keep man back from laying hold on those means which have been provided for his growth in grace, and in the ennobling virtues of the Gospel.

But, notwithstanding, there is not probably a single individual believer in the doctrine we advocate, but who desires to see it prevail, and is willing to do every thing in his power that would tend to aid it forward. He would sooner chop off the right hand, than knowingly or intentionally do it wrong, or cause it to be reproached. The true hearted Universalist loves the religion of his Saviour so well, that he is willing at all times to make use of those means which he considers will be calculated to advance the interests of the same, and to increase its influence on his own heart, and the hearts of those around him.

Now it is on these very grounds that I would urge Church organization. If I am not very much mistaken, it would not only tend to our own benefit, but to the benefit of others; not only to unite us together by the most sacred and endearing ties, to purify our hearts, to improve our conduct, and to increase our happiness; but also to do away much of the prejudice that exists in community against us as a denomination, to silence those objections that are being continually raised to our injury, and consequently to advance, materially, the interests of the Redeemer's cause.

In an unorganized state, we can do comparatively little or nothing toward advancing the interests of the cause in which we are engaged. There will be, in most cases neither unity of effort nor of action; and where this is the case, nothing of amount is ever accomplished. We need to be bound together by some strong compact, and thus be made to realize that we are engaged in a common cause, and that it is necessary unitedly to put our shoulders to the wheel—UNITEDLY to go forth into the field of labor, and toil for the upbuilding of Zion. Now, by coming together, and organizing ourselves into a Church, we are brought nearer together—we are bound together by the ties of a more endearing relationship, and are made to feel a more deep and abiding interest in the welfare and prosperity of the cause of Christ.

While in an unorganized state, each and every member considers that he is to cope single handed and alone with the enemy—that with his own good right arm he is to encounter the formidable array of opposition, and fight the good fight of faith. He consequently devises his own method of operation—arranges his own plans—goes his own way to work, and in the end accomplishes but little. Now, let the different members be brought together—let them be united by the ties of Church relationship, and become, as it were, a family of brothers and sisters, all engaged in the accomplishment of one object, and having one common rule of action, and you shall see a work commenced, carried on, and finished, at which the world shall be astonished!

That an established form of religious government in congregations or societies, is necessary to their prosperity, is further shown from the fact, that a majority of those societies which are without any, are in a lukewarm and lifeless situation—are either dead or dying. While opposition was strong and powerful—while they were obliged to encounter the world's scorn and contempt, and all those mighty and formidable obstacles that were thrown in their way, then they were zealous and active—then they were united, and shoulder to shoulder breasted the heaving tide of battle, and in the strength of Almighty God prevailed. And then the ardor of their zeal began to abate, and instead of striving to secure the advantages already gained—instead of taking measures for a full and efficient organization, they all dispersed, and every man was for himself as before. This is no fiction, and the half is not yet told. And how much injury have these things inflicted on the cause! How has its onward march been thus impeded, and a desolateness brought over the face of our spiritual Zion! And all for the want of a proper organization.

In a future number I will speak further on this subject, likewise give my views relative to the observance of the Ordinance of the Lord's Supper

A SHORT SERMON.

BY REV. E. B. WHELOCK.

"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us."—1 John iii: 1.

That Christian who feels the bestowment of God's love upon him—who feels that the kindest of Parents has given him being—who can say within himself, "My God is my creator, my protector, guardian and friend"—is of all persons the most cheerful and happy. With a heavenly smile upon his countenance, he can survey the immensity of God's works, and reap refined enjoyments from a thousand sources. He rejoices to see the rose that blushes in the desert, and to see the tough bending low with the weight of the lemon and the orange, and the rice field upon the plain waving in the gentle breeze—and to hear the rustling of the sugar cane, the gentle ripple of the neighboring stream, the melody and chorus of the swift-winged messengers of the spicy groves of the South, and the deep shaded forests of the North—the roar of the distant cataract—the lashing of the shore by the ocean wave—the bellowing of the thunders in the heavens, and the crash of the mountain oaks, which, like empires, fall to rise no more. He looks up to God and smiles. He forgets not his love; and like the Apostle he is heard to exclaim, "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us."

The manner of that love which flows from the human heart, is altogether unlike that which flows from the fountain of all holiness. For as man's existence is derivative, so are his virtues, and his love. To-day, the finest feelings of his nature may be called into exercise, and all the tender emotions of his heart be put in action, and be influenced thereby to entwine with himself and make closely his own, every object of lovely form which the Creator has made. But to-morrow his expectations are not realized, his hopes are disappointed, his air built castles are blown away, the crystal waters of life are become dark and sluggish, the objects of his affection have changed their loveliness, the winds of adversity whistle around him, sickness seizes his frame, darkness and gloom pervade the mind, and loneliness the soul—and nought but the idea of a God can give him comfort.

But not so with God our Father; himself is undervived, and all his attributes. He thinks, and the thought remains forever. In the beginning, one glance of his Omniscent eye surveys immensity. On the borders of infinite space were his counsels written. Mounting upon the chariot wheels of infinite love, he commenced the work of Creation. "And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. And God said let there be light, and there was light." He spake and it was done. He saw, and it was finished. He gave being to man, implanted in him a portion of his own nature, leaving it to germinate, to blossom, and mature. Hence, annihilate one soul, and you destroy the infinity of God. His love, uniting with his power, gave us being, and rolls on our existence, and determines our end. No frost can blight it, no sun can wither it; the coldness of the human heart, and the frowns of the world, can not alter it; neither can the floods of the sea drown it. No man can call it into being; kindness can never give it existence; continued supplications, unceasing praise and prayer, mingled with tears, and burnt offerings, and the loud groans of both saint and sinner, can have no effect upon its origin, or add one ray to its brightness, or change it in its direction—nor yet give a single impulse to its action, or a day to its duration.

O, vain man! stop and consider, and behold, in the language of the text, "the manner of that love which the Father hath bestowed upon us." Its action is entirely independent of merit, and not in the least influenced by any act of his finite creatures. Man is not the cause of God's love towards him, and therefore is not the author of its existence. Though a man by wicked works should withdraw himself from the influence of God's love, that destroys not its existence. He loveth not us because we first love him, but he commended his love towards us while we were yet sinners—and that too, for a special purpose, that of "reconciling the world unto himself."

"O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor?" His love filleth immensity. It girts the universe around. It fills it with the music of salvation, and gives joy to every land. It rides upon the ocean, and dwells in the desert; it is found in the humble cottage of the poor, and the splendid palace of the rich; it visits the African slave and the Ethiopian lord—the savage that roams among the mountains, and the kings that dwell in crowded cities. It calls from the dark regions of chaos, myriads of beings to life; sets bounds to the sea, and peoples its waters. It hangs the clouds in the heavens to sprinkle the earth with showers and replenish the fountain. It rears the mountain to the skies, and crowns it with foliage and flowers—spreads out the expansive plain and the wide extended prairie, and causes the whole to teem with life and vegetation. Yes, the whole is a plan of infinite wisdom, created in love, to be matured and perfected in the endless beatitude of the whole intelligent creation, who are ever permitted to rise in the scale of being to give glory to God, and "Behold the manner of his love" forever more. Amen.

A CONFERENCE

Or religious meeting, of the friends of Universalism, was held at the village of Evan's Mills, on Thursday and Friday, the 20th and 21st of February, 1840. The object contemplated by our friends at Evan's Mills, in the appointment of this meeting, was briefly the following:

No meeting of the kind, had ever been held at that place; and but few discourses in favor of Universalism, had ever been delivered, either in that village or "in the region round about." Of course, the community in general, were most deplorably ignorant of even the first principles of the doctrine of God's boundless and changeless love. And as the natural fruit of this state of ignorance, Universalism was misrepresented and turned into ridicule, and its advocates slandered and scoffed at, by every thing claiming the title of Orthodox. In fact, our good natured, honest hearted Orthodox brother, expressed much surprise, when he learned for the first time, that Universalists believed in and worshipped a God!

To rend this "veil" of ignorance, from the minds of the opposers of Universalism, and give them clear and enlightened views of the religious principles we hold and advocate, was the object contemplated in the appointment of this meeting. And this object was kept constantly in view, by those who conducted the services of that interesting occasion.

Owing to the bad state of the roads, (and it has never been our lot to travel when they were worse) the congregations were not as large as had been anticipated—but still, they were respectable in numbers, and most devout in attention. It was probably owing to the same cause, that we were disappointed by the non-attendance of two or three brethren in the ministry, with whom we had fondly hoped to share the labors of the occasion.

During the meeting, eight discourses were delivered, four each, by Brs. Waggoner and Hayward; who were the only ministering brethren in attendance. We trust—and judging from the deep interest visible in the countenances of those who composed the congregations, we feel assured that the seed there sown, "fell on good ground." And it is our ardent prayer, that in due time, it may bring forth an abundant harvest.

But we beg leave to suggest to our brethren at Evan's Mills, that they have yet a great work to perform—"there remaineth yet much land to be possessed." And if they would see the work of the Lord prospering among them, and converts to our most holy faith multiplied on every hand, they must follow up this commencement with well directed and united exertions for the maintenance of public religious worship on the Sabbath. It can not reasonably be expected, that the favorable feelings and impressions, created in the minds of community by the services of only two days will be felt during the year, unless this effort be followed up by corresponding and continued exertions.

Brethren, will you not awake to this subject—arise from this sleep of moral death—"put on the whole armor of the Lord"—not forgetting to gird on the "sword of the spirit which is the word of God," and go forth and fight manfully, in the warfare against "principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places." And by all means, take immediate measures for establishing public worship in your village, as much of the time as your means will allow. If you can not sustain preaching one half of the time, try it for one fourth. And if unable to accomplish that, then engage one eighth, or one sixteenth, according to your means—for a very little preaching is much better than none at all. And if Universalism is worth believing, it is worth spreading among your neighbors; and we know of no more certain or successful method of promulgating the doctrine of God's changeless and impartial love, among mankind, than by the establishment of regular meetings on the Sabbath, for the preaching of "good tidings of great joy."

To the Methodist society at Evan's Mills, we tender our sincere thanks, for their kindness and liberality, in granting us the free use of their house, in which to worship the "Father of the spirits of all flesh." And we can not close, without expressing our gratitude for the last (though not least) act of kindness which we received from our brethren on that occasion—an act clearly showing that they are not ignorant of the fact, that preachers are "men of like passions," and subject to the same wants with others—that they are subject to cold and hunger, and consequently require "food and clothing." Per request, CONFERENCE MEETINGS.—For the encouragement of others, I would inform our friends that a weekly Conference meeting has been commenced in this city, which is increasing in interest, as facility increases in its exercises, and the numbers increase who take part in them. We anticipate a great deal of spiritual enjoyment for ourselves in these weekly assemblies, and no little benefit to our cause in this city, from the active exertions of Br. Cook and the lay brethren and sisters on whom they are principally dependent for their interesting services.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. V.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"And they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished."

"The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth."

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake."

In the present number we are to examine those three passages of Scripture which are supposed to afford proof positive of two literal resurrections of mankind, the one of the good to happiness, the other of the wicked to misery. But before entering upon this examination, it may be well to observe that the terms and phrases which the Scripture writers employ, in teaching the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, are most or all of them also employed, somewhere in the Scriptures, to express certain changes, national or individual, political or moral, which take place in this world. Thus in the 37th chapter of Ezekiel, the return of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon, is prefigured by a vision of a sort of resurrection of a great quantity of dry bones. And the same thing is intended when it is promised them, in the same chapter, that their graves shall be opened, that they shall be brought up out of their graves, that they shall live, and shall be placed in their own land. Ezek. xxxvii: 12—14. In the 18th and 33d chapters of Ezekiel, the reformation of sinners is represented as a resurrection, since it is set forth, again and again, that if a man practise wickedness he shall die, but that if he practise righteousness he shall live; and that then if he turn from his righteousness and commit iniquity, he shall die, but that if he shall still turn from his iniquity, and do that which is right, he shall live. In the New Testament, the believer in Christ is said to have "passed from death unto life," to be "alive from the dead," (a strong expression) to possess "everlasting or eternal life," etc. In one place we even find this spirited exhortation, as addressed to men in the flesh, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Eph. v: 14. Also see 1 John iii: 14—Rom. vi: 13—John vi: 47, 54—where may be found the expressions above quoted; also Eph. ii: 5, 6, where Paul tells his brethren of having been "quickened together with Christ," of having been "raised up together," and made to "sit together in heavenly places in Christ," etc. These quotations and references, which are only a specimen of what is contained in the Scriptures, we make for the purpose of shewing what some seem to be ignorant of, that a resurrection in the Scriptures is not always to immortal life.

Now for the passages in question, and the proposed examination of them. In John v: 28, 29, we read that "all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, [the voice of the Son of God,] and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." In Dan. xii: 2, it is said, "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." In Rev. xx: 4—6, we read of some, that "they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." And it is added, "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power," etc. These passages thus brought together, separated from their connections, and but in part quoted, as is usually the case, may seem, as they doubtless have often seemed, to agree in teaching two different resurrections to immortality. But a careful comparison of the passages, especially if each one is considered along with its connection, will, we think, convince any unprejudiced mind, that not all of them, if indeed as many as one, have reference to the immortal state, for the reason that when viewed as referring to that state, their testimony does by no means agree, nor can it, by any fair means, be made to seem to agree.

In Revelation, the two resurrections are separated by an interval of a full thousand years—"the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished"—but in John, both of them are to happen in the same hour—"the hour is coming, in the which [mark the unusual definiteness of the expression] in the which all that are in the graves shall hear," etc.) Difficulties of this kind are sometimes attempted to be obviated by misapplying the text which declares that "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day;" but I know of no passage which can be tortured into the position than when the Scriptures speak of two events as happening in the same hour, the meaning is that ten whole centuries shall intervene betwixt them; hence I think it must be conceded that the passages above quoted from the Revelation and from John, are not parallel, at least if they are to be referred to the immortal state.

If one hour is equivalent to a thousand years, why is not a thousand years equivalent to one hour? Surely the Revelator's time may as well be reduced so as to agree with what Christ says, as the time that Christ gives be expanded so as to agree with the period named in the Revelation. "The Millennium," then, about which so much is said, and respecting which so many volumes have been written, may, after all, prove but a very brief period—a reign of sixty minutes!

But to return. To be "in the graves," in John, is thought to be the same as to "sleep in the dust of the earth," in Daniel. Indeed this must be so if the passages are parallel. But then, if we suppose the two passages to refer to the future state, they disagree very materially, as the one says "all," and the other says "many of them." Thus the text in John, if it applies to the resurrection of mankind into the future state, teaches unequivocally what it is commonly supposed to teach, that all our race are to come to the one resurrection or to the other—"all that are in the graves shall hear," etc. But the text in Daniel says that "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," some to the one destiny, and some to the other; and if this applies to the literal resurrection, then according to this, some of our race are to be neither in happiness nor in misery, being left unraised. Thus we are compelled to see that of these three passages, only one, at most, can have reference to the future state. The doctrine, then, of two resurrections to immortality, if taught in direct terms at all in the Scriptures, is taught in one text only. But strong reasons can be offered against its being taught in even one of these passages. For take whichever of them we may, and apply it to the future state, its teachings must stand directly opposed to what we find in many other passages, especially the one which declares "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." See the preceding number, also Acts xxiv: 15.

The reader may now be disposed to ask, if the texts we have been examining do not describe a resurrection to immortality, what is their meaning? This question we will endeavor to answer in our next. In the mean time, let the passages, with their contexts, be carefully read and considered.

ANALOGICAL REASONING—AGAIN.

BR. GROSH—I perceive by a late communication in the Magazine and Advocate, over the signature of "M. R.," that my late review of some of Rev. A. Barnes' writings, (see No. 5, current vol. Magazine and Advocate,) has, in some respects, been misunderstood, and its language misinterpreted.

Butler's Analogy, to which Mr. Barnes' Essay was written and published as an introduction, was expressly designed to counteract the prevailing infidelity and skepticism of the age and country in which he lived. As the unbeliever in Divine revelation did not admit the authority of the Bible to prove a future state of being, Butler's design was to show the unbelievers of his age, the futility and madness of their objections to such state, and that, aside from the voice of revelation, there was abundant reason to believe, from the analogy of things and the order of God's providence and moral government in this world, that this life was not the only or final state of man's existence—that it was altogether probable, and reasonable to believe, even if there were no revelation to that effect, that man would exist hereafter and in an immortal state of being.

Barnes' Essay was written on the same plan, and took the same ground substantially as Butler: but Barnes enlarges and expatiates on some points that Butler either mentions not at all, or passes very lightly over, and especially undertakes to show on the ground of analogy, that not only is Christianity probably true, but even Calvinism, (or what he is pleased to call the "distinguishing doctrines of grace,") is also probably true!

As Butler's arguments are based wholly on analogy, aside from the testimony of Scripture, so my review of that part of the essay relating to Calvinism and endless misery, took the same ground, i. e. the principles of analogy, and was designed as an argumentum ad hominem, or a refutation of his reasoning on his own ground, or demolishing him with his own weapons. And I think I succeeded in showing the illegitimacy of his conclusions, and that fair analogical reasoning from the premises admitted, would evidently lead to the doctrine of the restitution of all things, instead of the doctrine of endless misery.

I was therefore not a little surprised that any of your readers, (and especially one as well informed as I take M. R. to be) should have been ignorant of these facts, or should have so far overlooked them as to suppose (as it appears he does by his first and fourth paragraphs) that I think "there is no Scripture testimony that can be brought forward to destroy the supposed force of Mr. B.'s analogical argument for the doctrine of endless misery," or that I "acknowledge that the doctrine of limited future punishment can not be sustained by Scripture testimony, but is to be supported only by analogical arguments."

I supposed that all who had been familiar with my writings for years past, were well aware of the fact that my most common and strongest arguments against the doctrine of endless misery were drawn from the clear and positive testimony of Scripture, and that my faith in the doctrine of future retribution or discipline, was, in like manner, based on the same divine authority—that a belief in it naturally and necessarily results from an unbiased and enlightened perusal of the Scriptures, and a fair construction of the teachings and principles therein contained. I think the latter sentiment supported both by Scripture, reason and analogy, and likewise that all these stand opposed to the doctrine of endless misery on the one hand, and that which limits all punishment to this life, on the other.

You, Br. Grosh, correctly interpret my meaning when you "understand" me "in the sentence objected to, as using Mr. Barnes' phrases about 'arresting justice,' etc." I chose to use his own phraseology wherever I could, for the purpose of more clearly showing him and his adherents that his arguments, when fairly carried out, went directly against his own theory, which limits all emendatory justice to this life. I then regarded, and still must regard, any doctrine that limits all chastisement and discipline for the good of its subjects, exclusively to this life, as theoretically arresting the natural and legitimate course of justice, whether held by avowed infidels or Calvinists, or Universalists, and that fair analogical reasoning stands opposed to such theory; but still I do not suppose those who hold it regard it in this light.

By the expression "those who, like the infidel, believe that death terminates the consciousness and being of man forever," I meant simply and only the infidel. Here I allow that my language was more circuitous and less clear than I might have chosen. But as Mr. B. spoke of two distinct classes, against whom his arguments were directed, so also did I, and said I was not of the number of those belonging to either class described. From the above remarks and explanations, I trust my meaning will be obvious to all your readers.

With regard to analogical reasoning, I allow that it is only secondary and subservient to the teachings of Scripture. Nevertheless, I can not regard it as either pernicious, or dangerous, or useless. I regard it as a highly important aid in the improvement of the mind and the discovery of those truths which God has placed within the reach of our reasoning faculties. True, it may be abused and perverted, as no doubt it was by the Sadducees in the passage referred to by "M. R." But this is no reason why its proper use should be disparaged. Our Saviour himself often employed this mode of reasoning with his hearers: so also did his apostles, both in their preaching and writings. And where the glorious light of revelation has never shone—even among the benighted heathens—mankind have used analogical reasoning with great advantage; and though they have not demonstrated a future existence and the doctrine of immortality, they have urged weighty reasons in favor of it from the analogy of nature and providence. Where all just analogy goes in favor of a particular principle, and there is nothing in Scripture, in nature, or in reason, against it, it appears to me to be entitled to great consideration. Nevertheless, I say, "to the law and to the testimony;" wherever that leads I am ready to follow. D. S.

EXPIRED.

Expired on the 16th of January, at the Lutheran church in Fordsbush, a protracted meeting, after a lingering and troublesome illness of about sixteen days. One year ago, a similar meeting was held in the same place; when the Rev. gentleman who is now pastor of said church, (but was then only a visiting revivalist,) said he should sink to his grave if he was placed in the awful situation of the then pastor of the church. To see so many blooming and intelligent youth around him, who might, ere another morning dawned upon them, lift up their heads in hell, if they did not come and take the anxious seat that very moment, must surely have struck a deep solemnity in the mind of the Rev. gentleman. But deeper and more awful still must have been the pang, when to his "utter astonishment," none came forth to receive the "pardoning grace."—Therefore to rend this awful veil, and make an extension of their earthly kingdom, was one reason for this meeting. Another, and the most important one, was that the Universalists, after having been shamefully abused by the Lutherans,* circulated a subscription paper with such success that materials are now being brought on the ground, for the purpose of erecting a church. In this lamentable state of affairs something must be done, "to stop the monster in his wild career;" and that something was no more nor less than a night meeting which was to commence on the first of January and continue till the final object was accomplished. This surely to many was an awful undertaking, and rendered the more so in consequence of their gloomy anticipations of the future. However the work commenced; the preparatory measures had been taken, and nothing must therefore impede its onward march. The friends were charged to use their influence upon each and every one of their friends, and that too with the fear of God before them, until they were prevailed upon to attend church. They were also exhorted to choose from among their sinning friends a certain number, and centre all their prayers and supplications upon that number; and if they prayed in faith without doubting, God would answer their prayers to the satisfaction of their souls. (Query. Will not God answer prayer as soon when all human beings are included, as he will when only a dozen are prayed for?) The first week was no more, and the great work was not yet begun—nothing was discovered save a breaking off of the congregation—the case began to border on the desperate; when a Mr. U. was called in to assist in accomplishing the great object. He exhorted the friends to be faithful and steadfast—though they might not witness the workings of the spirit—and should the work not be accomplished then, they might rest assured that soon some great and mysterious change would be accomplished by means of their supplications and prayers, in some other part of the world.

* The Universalists having made application to the trustees of the Lutheran church, for the use of their house, previous to the meeting of the Otsego Association, for the purpose of holding a Conference, which request was granted; and upon the strength of which, application was made, and a conference appointed. But stifle not when I tell you, that a short time previous to the time of the appointment, the use of the house was denied, without an attempt to assign the least reason. However a large congregation assembled, and the occasion proved very interesting, notwithstanding the great inconvenience, and exposure to the cold. A. Z.

But all this proved ineffectual. Again there was a breaking off. Another week had passed, and the great work of reformation was not yet beginning to begin. What was now to be done? was a question that struck a deep solemnity into the minds of the few remaining friends. The most powerful antidote prescribed had been administered, without apparently effecting the least good, but rather sinking the patient deeper and deeper into the vortex of misery, and hurrying it on with a redoubled speed towards the confines of the tomb. Thus the affair dragged along until the night of the 16th of January, when the few remaining friends assembled, and the protracted meeting yielded up the ghost and was no more. In consequence of the coldness manifested by the friends of the meeting, I have deemed it my duty, and an act of humanity, to thus briefly notice the end of this protracted effort to revive the doctrine of God's ceaseless and unmerciful wrath in this place. May it rest in oblivious peace! Minden, 1840. A. Z.

KNOWLEDGE.

Dick says "Knowledge is valuable chiefly in proportion as it is practical and useful." A knowledge of God is valuable, because it leads us into the love and practice of holiness. If we learned of the character of man, that he was cruel, revengeful, vacillating between good and evil, and giving his power in the perpetuation of evil rather than of good, and deserting those who are dependent upon him just when they most need his assistance, we should lose all respect for and confidence in him. And the same result would follow with respect to God, if our knowledge of him should convince us that such was his character. And those who had rejoiced once in their trust to a being whom they knew not, would lament that they ever acquired such knowledge.

But the true knowledge of God is valuable. It gives the soul something to venerate and trust; something to love and obey; an object to adore, and a principle to imitate. It establishes a spiritual intimacy between the thoughts of man and the designs of God. It gives man a sphere of action in the government of one who rules in parental love. It gives him an exalted station, and thus enables him to respect himself by doing honor to his calling, and his fellow beings by the charitableness of humility. A. R. B.

THE WILL OF GOD.

The Editor of the Morning Watch, a Campbellite paper, says—"When Jesus came into our sinful world, he said, 'Lo, I come to do thy will, O God.' He also declared that he 'came down from heaven not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent him.' Now if it can be clearly shown what the will of God is, it will follow as a matter of course, that it either has been, or will yet be done, unless, forsooth, the Prince of Peace should fail to accomplish the purpose for which he came!"

This is strong, clear and positive language—such as every Universalist would use on the subject. Nor does Mr. Shehane shun to declare what the will of God is for he says, in continuation, "We are not left to conjecture what God's will is. It is revealed. Hence Paul says, 'Having made known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ,' etc. To this end, Christ took away the Mosaic covenant, and established a new one," etc. He then travels on to the personal or individual salvation of the believer. But if Br. Shehane believes that this is the will of God which Jesus came to perform, and that this will will yet be done, if it has not been (and it certainly has not yet been performed,) he must believe in the salvation of all men by their being brought to a knowledge of the truth through Jesus Christ. And if so, Mr. Campbell has an able opponent to his gloomy system of endless sin and misery in his own camp! A. B. G.

EVERLASTING.

Let but the Biblical scholar free his mind from prejudice, and go to the Bible for a definition of this word, and you will find him explaining it precisely as Universalists do. In looking over the Morning Watch, a monthly periodical of the sect commonly called Campbellite, we find some definitions of this word and its kindred terms, which are sadly against Alexander Campbell's positions in his controversy with Br. Skinner—though, it must be acknowledged that they are in accordance with his own more candid and deliberate views contained in the notes in his translation of the New Testament, which notes he felt so unwilling to admit as authority in the discussion that he never copied them into his paper, though repeatedly requested, challenged, and dared to copy them!

The following are the definitions referred to. I wonder what Mr. Campbell will say to them!

On Isa. ix: 6, the Editor of the Watch says, that the title "the everlasting Father," is rendered by Dr. Dwight, "The Father of the everlasting age"; and by Dr. Clarke, "The Father of the everlasting age, or, abi ad, The Father of eternity," and that Dr. G. Campbell thinks that the former rendering is best, meaning, the Father of the Christian age. "But," says Mr. Shehane, "as I suppose the translators of the Septuagint understood the idioms of the Hebrew and Greek languages, I will put down their version of abi ad, and then give a literal rendering of it into English. Here it is:—Megales Boules Angelos, in plain English thus:—the Angel of the great Council."

In reply to a question as to the Scripture meaning of the words everlasting and eternal, he says—"I do not believe that everlasting and eternal always mean the same thing in the Scriptures. My reasons are these—1. We have in the Old Testament, the phrase 'eternal God,' we also read of 'the everlasting mountains.' We should pity the weak understanding of the man who would contend that the mountains were coeval and will be co-perpetual with God. 'The everlasting moun tains were scattered, is at once a phrase that puts the seal of absurdity upon all the schemes that contend that everlasting must necessarily mean endless.—2. Although the words everlasting and eternal are from aiónion, yet as these epithets are sometimes applied to God, and sometimes to things of temporal duration, it would seem that their meaning depends upon the very nature of the nouns which they qualify."

Amen—just what Br. Skinner contended for in the discussion with Mr. Campbell. What is the nature of (kolasin) correction, punishment and chastisement? Are they necessarily endless in their nature? Are they a means only, or are they an end in God's government? These are questions that arise after this concession, and Heb. xii: 5-12, together with many similar passages, shows that punishment is not, of itself, or in its very nature, endless in duration, but the reverse. Of course, then, the words everlasting and eternal, are limited in their meaning, when applied to punishment in the Scriptures.

The other instance in which the Morning Watch furnishes an important concession in regard to the words in question, is in an examination of the famous passage Mark xvi: 16—"He that believeth, etc., shall be saved," etc.—the succeeding context of which Mr. Shehane applies and confines to the apostolic age, and the miracles then performed by the primitive Christians. He incidentally brings in the saying of Christ—"I am with you always, even unto the end of the world"—and in commenting on this foundation text of "apostolic succession," he says—"According to our apprehension we are not to expect such signs [Mark xvi: 17, 18,] in the present day, because Jesus only promised to be with his apostles until the conclusion of the Jewish age." "We.....contend that the phrase end of the world as it stands in Matthew, means end of the age, because the word aion is sometimes rendered age in the writings of inspiration." "We therefore contend, that when Jesus said to his apostles, 'idou, ego meth humon' etc., he, as explained by Mark, meant that he would be with his apostles all the days of the Jewish age, enabling them to perform signs and wonders in attestation of their mission. We further contend that he fulfilled his promise, and that we are not to look for such signs in this our day, because ton aionos limits the promise to the conclusion of the Jewish dispensation."

We thank Mr. Shehane for these remarks, and hope that, unlike Alexander Campbell, he will never turn from this clear statement, and attempt to prove punishment to be endless because the Bible applies the words everlasting and eternal to it—or to prove endless damnation by quoting "he that believeth not shall be damned," as if the text had reference to a future state of being, or was spoken to others than the primitive believers, who, only, could exhibit the signs there pointed out.

IS THINE EYE EVIL BECAUSE I AM GOOD?

The parable of the laborers in the vineyard, though adapted to the peculiar disposition of the Pharisees, was probably aimed more at evil principles than men, and was therefore as good a caution to the disciples, to whom it was addressed, and will be to us of the present day, against self-righteousness, and its kindred vices, as it was a rebuke upon the same faults among the Jews. Wherever these faults are found, there is the application of the parable. It applies itself to the self-righteousness of the Jews, in arrogating to themselves the peculiar favors of the divine government. They claimed to have borne the heat and burden of the day; but they were not satisfied with what they merited, but expected some extra favor, which should place them above their more recent fellow-laborers. So the laborers in the vineyard were not satisfied with what they could justly demand, but murmured because they had not received in proportion to the length of time they had labored. They were jealous, too. They had borne the hardest part of the labor, and the others had not, and they did not like to have the last laborers made their equals in point of pay received. Had those who were last in the vineyard been requested to go in, at an earlier hour, and refused to comply with the good man's request, and thus remained idle until the eleventh hour, we are not authorized to believe that they would have received the reward which they did. But recollect, this was not the case. The first were hired in the morning, at a stipulated price. That price they received. The latter commenced their labor at the eleventh hour, but they made no stipulations. They spoke of no reward. They made no excuses; but yielded a cheerful, prompt and happy obedience as soon as their duty was pointed out to them. "And about the eleventh hour he went out and found others standing idle, and said unto them, why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto him, because no man hath hired us. He said unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right ye shall receive." And what was the consequence? They trusted to the justice of their employer, and went. And I may say that the reward which they received, and of which their prouder companions complained, was not only a reward for their labor, but also a token of their employer's kindness, and a testimony that he appreciated their faith in him, and the cheerfulness with which they complied with his invitation. Hence the exclamation, "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil because I am good?"

I have before hinted that this parable was aimed more at evil principles than men, and therefore might be as good a lesson to self-righteousness and its attendant evils in any other case, as it was in that of the Pharisees. If I am not strictly correct in this opinion, still I think I do no violence to the sacred text, by giving it such an application. If I am correct in my opinion, it will not be difficult to see how the disciples, even, received a pointed rebuke through it. One or two instances, where they evidently deserved this rebuke, will suffice.

After the display of worldly mindedness, which the disciples witnessed in the case of the young man who inquired what he should do to inherit eternal life, and who went away sorrowing because he was required to forsake his great possessions, Peter's mind seems to have been exercised with the contrast between the situation of the followers of Jesus and this rich young man. The disciples, though perhaps not as deep thinkers generally, as Peter was, were much amazed at the saying that it was "easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God," and exclaimed, "Who then can be saved?" Jesus answered, "With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible." Peter seems to have thought himself and brethren entitled to the first rank in the estimation of the Saviour, and that if God was able to save one so completely glued to the treasures of the world, as was the young man alluded to, he and his companions might expect some signal favor, more than they had received, for the sacrifices they had made. Hence he says, "Behold we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" May not the parable which follows this account, have taught these disciples to beware of self-righteousness, and to place more confidence in the justice of him in whose service they were.

Self-righteousness assumes, many times, a very specious appearance, by arrogating to itself the name of piety; so that in its first stages it is difficult for a person who is in danger of being led into it, to discern clearly its nature—and especially when assisted by superstition. This was sometimes the case with the disciples, though not to that criminal degree which had obtained among the Pharisees. As for instance. In Matthew xix: 13, we read that "there were brought unto him [Jesus] little children, that he should put his hands on them and bless them, and pray; and the disciples rebuked them." They thought that it was arrogance to presume upon that notice and favor for little children, which they claimed as the Saviour's long tried laborers. Just as many mistaken Christians in modern times with a more criminal obstinacy, have thought to advance their own merit, in the contrast which they could establish by representing infants as totally depraved and unworthy of the least favor from God. Their eye was to a certain extent evil, because their Benefactor was good. A similar instance may be found in Mark ix: 33, 34, where certain disciples on their way to Capernaum, disputed who should be greatest. Christ taught them the necessity of yielding to that wise regulation between the haughty and the humble, in accordance with which "the last shall be first, and the first last." "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all."

It is a singular trait of the human mind, through self-righteousness, or arrogance, or what not, that what is once granted to it as a favor, it soon claims as an absolute right. The controllers of literary institutions, which have received distinguished favor and encouragement from a liberal community, have many times been led to think that those favors, which they once received as the contributions of a charitable public, really belong to them, and that they have a right to demand their continuance with undisputed authority. Some of these have obtained support and encouragement under the pretence that they were to be free from sectarianism, and turned immediately round and condemned the very men who had given them an existence, because they would not continue to support an institution which had falsified its faith and forfeited all claims to interest. They had an evil eye, but before they have established their precedence, they will find themselves humbled and abased, and marked with that contempt which they deserve. I had intended to mention several other particulars which have received, or which deserve the rod of correction, but as this article has already extended to a greater length than was intended, I must defer them till another opportunity.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Rev. D. D. Smith, of Gloucester, Mass., has tendered his resignation of membership to the Standing Clerk of the Massachusetts State Convention of Universalists, and of all bodies in its fellowship; and said resignation has been accepted. Mr. Smith states that he is not disposed at present to state the reasons.

Paul Dean's paper, the Phoenix, has been merged in the Christian Register, a Unitarian paper in Boston.

Br. S. Barden has asked a dismission from the societies in Harvard and Roxboro', Mass. Br. J. K. Ingalls has agreed to remove to Southold, Long Island, in April.

Br. Fuller, of the Nazarene, gives a preference to the folio, over the quarto or octavo form, for our newspapers; because papers in that form are not so likely to be preserved and bound, and hence new papers will constantly be needed to supply their place! Suppose we quartes profit by this hint, and print on such bad paper that no copy will bear reading by more than one person—will it tend to increase our list? I doubt it. We are sorry to hear that Br. F. has been very low with bleeding at the lungs, since December last. Br. Gihon says he is now recovering. We hope so, for I have no faith in wearing out the old, as the best means of keeping people as supporters of the preached word, one whit more than I have in that plan for retaining them as subscribers for the printed word!

The Nazarene informs us that Br. Asher Moore, now of Roxbury, Mass., will commence his labors as pastor of the Philadelphia Lombard street Society, on the first Sunday in April next. May both pastor and people be greatly profited by the connexion.

Br. John Moore, late of Lebanon, N. H., now of Hartford, Ct., has taken an apartment in Br. Everett's establishment—or, in other words, has opened a Hartford department in the Connecticut Universalist, and agreed to edit it "his own way." We wish Brs. Everett and Moore, "Uncle Jacob Loveworthy" and Sister M. A. Dodd, all the enjoyments, with as little as possible of the perplexities and cares, of the life editorial.

By the Star in the West and the Glad Tidings, (the tidings it contains are not always glad,) we learn that a storm of fanaticism in the shape of protracted meetings, is just now sweeping over Ohio, without, however, doing any injury to, but rather benefiting the cause of Universalism. Rev. Mr. Aikin, of Cleveland, has vouched for the truth of Francisco's story, as told by some revivalist in that region. He at the West, and Elder Knapp at the East, had better not refer too confidently to Utica for proof of Francisco's good standing in the Second Church, at the present time! There is a rumor that all that part of the Record was expunged about the time Francisco was hung in Erie, Pa. Can any one inform us if this is correct?

Poor Br. Drew! we really pity him—he is always "a day after the fair." He has a large porringer, which he holds out toward any quarter in which donations seem to be falling. Sometime ago, Br. Everett had a number of fine donations given him. Slide—slide—went Br. Drew's porringer toward Middletown, Conn. Then Br. Buri had a quantity of goodly apparel bestowed on him—a perfect shower, that clothed him from head to foot, and covered him with a new cloak into the bargain. Quickly Br. Drew drew his porringer back into Maine again—but again it was too late to catch any of the drops of the gone-by shower. And now Governor Fairfield has had a cheese weighing 287 pounds, presented to him by a lady. Br. Drew draws his porringer homeward; but groans, and shakes his head in doubt of success, saying, "We wish we were a Governor—then charity might reach our wants, also. But our porringer will not hold so great a cheese as that." Verily, Br. Drew, I do not wish you were a Governor; for I love you better as a preacher and an editor; but I wish somebody would take pity on you and fill your porringer, before you wear the bottom through by shoving it about.

The Rhode Island Convention of Universalists, holds its annual session in Woonsocket, on Wednesday and Thursday, April 8th and 9th. Br. John Boyden will then be installed as pastor of the society in that place.

REV. R. J. BRECKENRIDGE, of Baltimore, Md., the opponent of Br. L. S. Everett in a public discussion, and the bitter maligner of Universalists, who he declared should be put down by law, is now being tried for a libel on the keeper of an alms-house, and has allowed to remain selected for one of the jury that is to try him, a well known and devoted Universalist—one of those very men whom he himself declared not fit to be a witness or a juror, incapable of holding office, and unworthy of the common rights of a citizen! So much for Mr. Breckenridge's opinion of Universalists, when put to the test of his own practice. For, Br. Williamson says, Mr. B. was particularly anxious this Universalist should be one of the jury, on account of his well known character for intelligence, honesty, candor, and firmness in uprightness. Yet this juror is one of those whom Mr. B. would have put down by law! "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel!" A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

We have received, read and approved the March number of this excellent work, and we have thought that its Editors and contributors are doing a noble work. The number before us, will be particularly useful to theological students, and those engaged in the ministry, though it contains valuable hints for all classes. Especially would we be gratified if it could obtain the serious perusal of opposing clergymen. Its contents are as follows:—

Article VII. Scriptural doctrine of the Logos, or the Word, by Rev. W. E. Manley. VIII. The Minister and the Pulpit, by Rev. T. B. Thayer. IX. Use and Importance of Biblical Archaeology, by Rev. O.

A. Skinner. X. Interpretation of Figures in the Prophetic and Poetical parts of the Scriptures, by the Editor. Literary Notices.

MISSOURI.

Br. Jasiel P. Fuller says of our cause, in the section where he is located, that "the cause of truth is prosperous in this place and vicinity. The greatest hindrance to its progress is ignorance of the doctrine we advocate. [The same is measurably the case in this State!] It is embraced in the same proportion that it becomes known and understood. There is much ignorance of the Scriptures. I have been charged with doing great violence to the Sacred Oracles, merely by stating what the commonest man at the East would not think of disputing, that the phrase "end of the world" does not mean the end of time, but the end of the age, viz. the Jewish age. And when I have read before a congregation, from Paige's Selections, extracts from Orthodox commentators, to prove my position, a great many will still doubt the possibility of the phrase having such a meaning. Universalist preachers here, have the same ground to go over, that they had at the East 20 years ago.

"All communications for me I desire to be directed to "Troy, Lincoln county, Mo."

We thank Br. F. for his kind offer to serve as our agent in that section, and gratefully accept it. His suggestions and advice are also thankfully received, and will be followed in the case referred to. We have been, and now are, so situated that poverty and misfortune always command our sympathy and respect.

THANKS.

Br. Wm. Middleton, of Salem, Marion Co., Ills., says in a letter recently received from him—"My thanks to Harriet L. Burley, of Exeter, N. H., for Whittmore's 100 Arguments and some numbers of the Trumpet—also to the person who sent me two numbers of the Gospel Banner. May the Lord ever bless the donors with the like precious blessing that is bestowed on the receiver. Have I no dear Sisters in Utica who are able to do likewise? Most certainly, and willing too, if they knew how. May the Lord bless their charitable wishes, and give them a knowledge of the way to accomplish them. Every little present that tends in the least to build up the good cause, is received with thankfulness. Those who are blessed every day with the means of obtaining a knowledge of the light of the glorious Gospel shining in the face of Jesus Christ, can scarcely imagine how great a favor they bestow on their far western brethren, where every thing is new to them, and how those favors are calculated to kindle a spark into a flame, and make us rejoice with that joy that is unspeakable and full of glory."

Br. Middleton is an aged convert from the Methodist ministry—is almost alone in his faith, and opposed even by his own family in his present views. He has never yet seen the face of a Universalist preacher. Any favors sent him will be well employed, I have no doubt, in spreading abroad the knowledge they impart to him. I would suggest, therefore, that those who have any papers, pamphlets, or even books, to spare, and can afford to pay the postage on them, should enclose them in strong wrappers, have them marked postage paid, and send them to him by mail, directed, "Rev. Wm. Middleton, Salem, Marion county, Illinois." Even if he obtains more than one copy of any work by this means, he can find others, to whom it can be presented for perusal and circulation—for Br. Middleton has gradually gathered around him an increasing little band of believers, by his preaching and conversation. May he go on, until his little band becomes a great nation, of which each one shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight.

BOOKS IN ALBANY.

Br. N. R. French, 29, Green st., Albany, keeps a constant supply of Universalist books.

UNIVERSAL DAMNATION.

Mr. S. E. Shepherd is out in Mr. Campbell's Harbinger proving universal damnation, and claims to have done it as well and truly as Br. Skinner has proved universal salvation in the discussion with Mr. Campbell. We admit it—his and Br. Skinner's arguments are of equal force, and supported alike by irrefutable Bible testimony. But Mr. Shepherd does not even pretend to prove the damnation to be endless, or to occur after the salvation, or the resurrection to immortality; whereas Br. Skinner has proved universal salvation to be in a state of immortality, and to be from a state of (and therefore after) damnation, or unbelief. Consequently we have universal damnation first and after that, universal salvation, which is endless. Go on, Br. Shepherd—you may, peradventure, arrive at a knowledge of the whole counsel of God in time—that "he hath concluded all in unbelief [damnation] that he might have mercy on all," [i. e. salvation.] A. B. G.

CORRESPONDENTS are requested to exercise a little patience. The Winter season is our harvest for communications. Those that are on general subjects are therefore mostly reserved until we shall have more room, and the preference is generally given to those more local, and calling for immediate attention. And even these latter, we are sometimes obliged to defer from week to week against our will, often after they are in type, to make room for the series of articles commenced, of which we have just now a greater number than usual. Thus Br. J. K.'s notice of Theological Gleanings, was postponed week after week—crowded out, we might say—for the want of just room enough to accommodate it; and a longer or a shorter article, as the case might require, was inserted in its stead. We beg of all to rest assured, that we willingly slight none—that we do the best we can with our small sheet and numerous articles, even re-writing many, and correcting others, at a considerable labor and perplexity, in order to please, if possible. Errors, lapses of memory, and mistakes we are not free from—but intentional wrong we do not feel guilty of towards our correspondents. We ask, then, in return, a little care on their part in preparing their articles—fair writing, with visible ink—and patience and charity.

Waldie's Select Circulating Library, of Philadelphia, deservedly a great favorite of ours, has been suspended in the progress of its 15th volume, in consequence of the delinquency of subscribers, added to the ill health of the Publisher. It will be resumed as soon as the requisite collections of back claims can be made. We hope this will be early, and that Mr. Waldie will be restored to health speedily.

TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD.

AN ALLEGORY.

'Twas early in the dawn of time,
When human nature, in its prime,
A stranger was to guile,
That Truth and Falsehood took a walk
One Summer's morn; and mutual talk
And glee employed their while.
O'er hills and dales, through groves and glades,
'Cross fertile fields and flowery meads,
They passed in cheerful mood;
Till by a dark and rolling flood
Arrived, they both in silence stood,
And thus the billows viewed.
But Truth at length the silence broke,
And unto Falsehood thus she spoke;
(For she had nought to dread.)
"Let us within this liquid wave,
Ourselves on this fine morning bathe,
Then on our way proceed."

To whom the latter thus replied;
(With feigned assent, her guile to hide;)
"Well, thou shalt enter first,

And soon I'll be near by thy side,
And with thee stem the rolling tide,
Till we are safely passed."

Then Truth in haste herself undress'd,
And on the bank her garments placed,
Then plunged into the deep;
This done, her garments Falsehood seiz'd,
And put them on herself, well pleas'd
To make her safe escape.

E'er since that day has Truth appear'd
Stark naked, though she ne'er has feared,
The darkest flood to stem,
And Falsehood in Truth's garb is seen
Her own vile form and filth to screen
And thus impose on man.

Anecdote of Napoleon.—After having gained the battle of Wagram, the Emperor Napoleon established his head quarters for a time at Schoebrunn, and there occupied himself, pending the negotiations for his Austrian alliance, with reviewing his troops and distributing among them rewards and honors. One old and brave regiment of the line was drawn out before him for this purpose, his custom being to examine every corps individually under the guidance of the officers. After having formed the regiment into columns, Napoleon entered among the ranks and bestowed praises and decorations on all who appeared worthy of them. Five hours he spent in this occupation; and at length, when he had satisfied himself that no man's claims had been overlooked, he finished by saying aloud to the Colonel—"Now present to me the bravest soldier in your whole regiment." In some cases this might have been a difficult matter; it did not appear so now. The Colonel, indeed, hesitated for a moment; but the question was caught by the soldiers, and one universal answer came from the ranks. "Morio! Corporal Morio!" was the cry. The Colonel approved of the decision, and Morio was called forward. He was a man still young, but embrowned by service; and he already wore on his person three badges of merit, and the Cross of the Legion of Honor. Napoleon looked at him attentively. "Ah," said he, "you have seen service!" "Fifteen years, my Emperor," replied Morio; "sixteen campaigns and ten wounds, not to speak of contusions." "How many great battles?" asked the Emperor. "Sire, I was at your heels at the bridge of Arcola; I was the first man who entered Alexandria; it was I who gave you my knapsack for your pillow at the bivouac of Ulm, when forty thousand Austrians capitulated; I took five hussars prisoners with my own hands on the day of Austerlitz. It was I who served you—"

"Hold! it is well, very well! Morio, I name you Baron of the Empire; and to that title I add a hereditary gift of five thousand francs a year." Acclamations rose anew from the soldiery. "Ah, my Emperor," said Morio, "this is too great a reward for me. But I will not play the usurer with your bounty. None of my companions, while I have it, shall want for food or clothing."

Morio still lives. He only quitted the service when his master fell; and, in spite of that change, Morio still enjoys the Emperor's gift. He has kept his word to his companions. No old soldier in the department to which he has retired, wants wherewithal to drink the health of Napoleon.—French paper.

MARRIAGES.

In Chili, February 13, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. DANIEL ROGERS, of Wheatland, to Miss EUNICE FELLOWS, of the former place.

In Deerfield, March 3d, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. ELIJAH WARREN, of Utica, to Miss CAROLINE HOLBROOK, of the former place.

In Troy, Bradford county, Pa., in the Universalist meeting house, by Rev. W. Bullard, EZRA LONG, Esq., of Troy, to ADIGAIL H. SHERMAN, of Athens.

In Paines Hollow, March 8th, by Rev. Mr. Richards, Mr. DE LOSS L. FILER, to Miss JULIET GOLDEN, both of that place.

DEATHS.

In Rochester, on the 11th of November last, in the 20th year of his age, GEORGE, eldest son of Nathaniel and Mary Bingham. The deceased was a young man of very amiable and lovely character, and highly respected and beloved by all who knew him. But few of earth's children ever suffered under the influence of a more painful disease, which had been preying upon him for eight years. But he bore all with extraordinary fortitude and resignation till the last, and then bid adieu to his affectionate parents, family and friends for the spirit-land, where pains and sorrows are no more. His funeral was attended in the Universalist church on the following day, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a large congregation of relatives and friends, by the Rev. J. Chase, pastor of the society who worship in said church.—Com.

At McLean, February 27th, ADIN, son of Emily, and Rev. W. Bullard, aged four months and seven days.

"As the sweet flower which scents the morn,

But withers in the rising day,

Thus lovely seemed the infant's dawn,

Thus swiftly fled its life away."

* * * Trumpet please copy.

In Taberg, (Annsville), on the 12th of February, after an illness of only three days, Mrs. ELIZABETH HYDE, widow of the late Benjamin Hyde, Esq., in the 80th year of her age.

This very amiable and excellent mother in Israel, endured the loss of her partner, who preceded her only a few months, with truly Christian resignation, and enjoyed good health, (being able to attend our meetings,) until the Sunday previous to her decease. Beloved and revered by all who knew her, her decline into the autumn of life, was mild, gradual, and cheerful—and her departure is mourned with unaffected but hopeful sorrow, not only by her numerous descendants and relatives, but by her friends and acquaintances. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners on the 1st instant, by the writer.

A. B. G.

In Sauquoit, January 12th, EDWARD LICESTEF, son of Lawrence G. Wilson, aged 3 years 1 month and 24 days.

"It is a fearful thing to love

What death may touch."

In Litchfield, April 21st, 1839, widow PERSIS DOCKE, consort of Josiah Locke, Esq., deceased, aged 103 years, 5 months and 17 days; having had eight children, sixty-seven grand children, one hundred and forty-seven great grand children, and thirty-two great great grand children, having lived to see five generations. She was a member of the Presbyterian church in Winfield, and sustained a good moral character through life. She was interred on the 23d, in the burial ground at Cedarville—a discourse was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Holcomb, pastor of the church to which she belonged, from Genesis xv: 15.

In Lewiston, October 24th, 1839, Mr. LEMUEL COOK, aged 79 years. He was a pensioner for services rendered to his country, and one of the oldest and most respectable inhabitants in Lewiston. He died in the full faith of a world's salvation from sin and death, and manifested a perfect resignation in his last hours. His children rejoice in the same faith. Funeral on the 26th.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. VI.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people . . . . and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake."

"The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear" . . . . "The hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear."

"And I saw the souls of them which were beheaded for the witness of Jesus . . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."

In our last number, we examined certain passages of Scripture with reference to the question whether or not they teach as it is commonly supposed they do, two literal resurrections of mankind into the immortal state. We concluded they did not; and promised in the present number to give a brief exposition of their real meaning. For though we did not set about writing a commentary upon the Scriptures in general, we think it may not be labor lost to offer a few remarks upon the said passages, in reference to the time of their fulfilment especially.

The passage from Daniel xii, is introduced thus, verse 1: "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people." Daniel's people are obviously the Jews—Michael is thought to be the Messiah—the time of his standing up is to be gathered from what follows, rather than from what precedes it. (It is thought by some that this chapter has, by some means, been separated from its connection. But whether it was or not, is a matter of indifference as respects the exposition of this text.) The passage continues: "and there shall be a time of trouble, such as there never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." It will scarcely be disputed that this is the same as Jesus foretold in Matt. 24th chapter, and which he describes as "great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." And that Daniel and our Lord do refer to the same, will be more abundantly evident if we consider and remember that the Saviour, a few verses before he mentions this tribulation, mentions expressly "the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet," in this very chapter. (See verse 11.) And that this time of trouble or great tribulation was in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, appears not only from the whole tenor of our Lord's discourse, but also from what is said in Dan. xii: 7, that "when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, [that is, Daniel's people,] all these things shall be finished." The passage further continues, verses 1 and 2: "and at that time shall thy people be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them* that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Let it now be asked many of whom? Answer, many of Daniel's people; that is, just so many as should be asleep in the dust of the earth. When were these sleepers to awake? Answer, at, in, or during the time just specified. Whether, therefore, we are able to understand all about the passage or not, of one thing we may be confident, that thus far it had its fulfilment in this world.

But the passage goes on thus: "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever;" or as the Greek version of the Old Testament has it, "for ever and further," or as some render it in English, "for ever and longer." This part of the passage is doubtless not yet finished in fulfilment, nor indeed will it be while Christianity lasts, to say no more; but the apostles and their fellow-laborers in the Gospel, have for ages been shining in the Christian firmament as stars of the first magnitude.

Let us now consider John v: 28, 29, which speaks of "the resurrection of life," and "the resurrection of damnation." In verse 24, Jesus says, "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." Now this everlasting life which He here tells us the believer was then enjoying, is the same that it is said in Dan. xii: 2, that some shall awake to; and if awaking to everlasting life, is the same as coming to the resurrection of life, then it would seem to be perfectly clear that it is quite possible to come to the resurrection of life in this world.

He says again, verse 25, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." The dead were then hearing, that is, some of them were, and all that heard lived; but there were many of them that heard not; or to use the language of Daniel, there were many of his people that had fallen asleep in the dust of the earth, and were not yet awaked. Sleep is often used for death, either literal or figurative. But says our Lord, "the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear." To be in the grave, is to be dead, of course. Some of the dead of that people, that is some who were in the graves, sleeping in the dust of the earth, were hearing in Jesus' day—all of them were to hear before many years. It is said in Dan. xii: 10, "none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." The wise and the righteous, then, are here the same. Hence the Saviour says, "they that have done good, [that is, the righteous, shall come] to the resurrection of life;"—shall understand and believe the Gospel, and enjoy everlasting or spiritual life in the present tense. He adds, "and they that have done evil, [that is, the wicked, who shall not understand, shall come] to the resurrection of damnation"—that is, they shall experience the judgments of God for their wickedness and unbelief.

I consider Dan. xii: 2, and John v: 28, 29, to refer to the same events. In the view which I take of the subject, "many" in Daniel is equal to "all" in John. Daniel speaks of two classes of his people, each of which he designates by the term many. Jesus speaks of the first, and then of the second as all besides these. But these terms are not equivalent the one to the other, if the passages refer to our race in general. I believe these texts to have been fulfilled in about 40 years after our Saviour's death. The coming of some to the resurrection of life, I suppose to have taken up considerable time. Some came during our Saviour's ministry—more during the ministry of his apostles—all had come when the Christians left Judea. Then, as I understand it, the rest of the Jews came to the resurrection of damnation, or awoke to shame and everlasting contempt, in the overthrow of their city, the burning of their temple, the destruction of their hopes, the unparalleled distresses which they endured, and their dispersion for ages among the nations of the earth.

The passage in Rev. xx: 4—6, I must beg to be excused from offering many remarks upon, since so many have written on that book, each having an exposition of his own. I shall merely observe that "the first resurrection" seems to have embraced only the martyrs of the first age, and therefore that the hopes of modern Christians to share the first resurrection are vain and futile. "I saw," says John, "the souls of them that were beheaded" etc., "and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Verily, the prospect of Christians in the present day, for obtaining that high distinction, is small indeed.

BACKSLIDING.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

Our Orthodox, (alias, Limitarian) friends, tell much about backsliding. To use their own phraseology, a man is "brought out," "experiences religion," "obtains a hope," is "born again," and thus becomes a "child of God" and a "joint heir with Christ;" yet few of them stay so. The greater part of those "brought out," "get back into the world again," "lose their religion," and become "heirs of wrath," even as others. And thus they call backsliding. Thus many are converted and backslide; are converted and backslide again, for a dozen times or more in their life. But it looks strange to me, that a person can one day be born of the Spirit, and be a child of God; and the next lose this divine relation, and become a child of the devil. John saith, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." 1 John iii: 9. Not that all, or even any, who may pretend to have experienced this change, commit no sin afterward. Even the best of men, and the best of Christians, in this world, come far short of duty. Paul and John confessed themselves sinners, and so must all; for "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." 1 John, i: 8.

What then? "He that committeth sin is of the devil." And where is the person, even if his pretensions to sanctity are as great as those of the ancient Pharisees were, who never transgresses God's perfect law—who never thinks, speaks, or acts amiss, but always does all that duty requires to God and man? "Ye shall know them by their fruits." "He that committeth sin is of the devil," for "whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin."

What is this new birth? A change from wickedness to holiness, and from hatred to love. But the most wicked are not perfectly so: none are so bad but they might be worse. On the other hand, the most holy in this world are not without sin: none are so good but they might be better. None are totally depraved, nor absolutely perfect.

The worst of men do sometimes right, and it is written, that, "every one that doeth righteousness is born of God." 1 John ii: 29. The best of men have their failings, and it is written, "all unrighteousness is sin," and whoever "committeth sin is of the devil."

When will the religious world have learned that the new birth is a progressive work, which is but begun, and in no instance completed in the present life? When will they learn that it is not the work of an hour or a day, but that, through a whole life, they must "grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth," and will then only have approximated toward it? But it will be completed in the resurrection, when all shall be changed and made equal unto the angels of God in heaven—when all shall be the "children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

* If this verse were printed with a comma after them, and also after earth, the sense would be more apparent. "And many of them, that sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake," etc.

FOR THE SINNER.

BY E. R. CROCKER.

"I think I will pass over this article—it is not for me," says one. "For the sinner—ah! that is for my neighbor," says a second. "Well now, (says a third) that is a curious caption. Guess it's like some of our almanacs, 'calculated' to answer for the whole U. States—the whole world." You are right, brother. "There is not a just man on earth that liveth, and sinneth not." You are right. "For the sinner," is tantamount to "for all the world." "God be merciful to me a sinner!"—"I thank God I am not like other men." How opposite are these expressions. O! who can endure a Pharisee! There is more hope of a heathen than of him. An orthodox hell can not—nothing but the love of God can, convert a self righteous, boasting sinner. When a sinner—greater, sometimes, than an open, and fearless, and confessedly outrageous sinner—goes into the church of Jesus Christ, and "steals the ivory of heaven to serve the devil in," and issues forth like a prowling wolf among innocent, but unboasting sheep—the very pink of Phariseism—what hope is there of such an one? or what power short of Omnipotence can bend his stubborn heart to the practice or love of Christianity—that is, any farther than to attain his wicked ends, through the deceptive guise of sanctity? And yet, destitute as he is of one spark of the Christian spirit, what an ado he makes about religion! See his sanctimonious phiz; behold that upturned eye, toward heaven; hear that Pharisaical groan, and that God mocking prayer. But who is it that I behold yonder clothed in rags, intent upon this holy saint (as he would have the world believe.) Hark! I think her lips move—she will speak. Hark! "O you saint; how pious, how God-like—gave me my hard earnings, thou miserly saint! Will you let the widow and her little ones starve? Money that I have earned—may I not have my own—thou saint—shivering as I am with the cold, and my little ones starving? Oh! God of the widow and fatherless, is this the religion thou hast given man from heaven!"

No, no! poor widow; that man has the spirit of the evil one. All is not gold that shines—do not be deceived—this is the way infidels and skeptics are born into the world. They have given to them a counterfeit religion; it will not pass; it is good for nothing; it is worse than useless. It is cast aside, and the poor creatures actually conclude, that because there are counterfeits afloat, there can be no pure currency, when the truth is the reverse of this. For who ever attempted to counterfeit, or imitate that which never existed? The thing is impossible. Show me a counterfeit note, and I will prove from it, that there is a genuine note in existence, or has been; I could ask no better proof. So with regard to religion; no man would profess to be religious—steal the epithet—unless religion somewhere existed. So then take the case which way you will, in either we have the proof that genuine religion exists in the world.

But to the sinner. Why do you desire to be sinful? What do you expect to gain by such a course? What will sin, if you become his slave voluntarily—what will he reward to you? You have labored for him before, and what was your recompense therefor? Ah! I will tell you, death, death! "The wages of sin is death." Yes, death—death to innocence—death to a good character, (among all the good)—death to spiritual life—death to happiness, your "being's end and aim." Why submit to such a master? He is neither kind, benevolent, accommodating, neighborly, nor honest. He has no property but death, with which to reward his votaries. Hear the language of the poet, who had travelled the way of sin himself.

"Young people all, attention give.

While I address you in God's name:

Ye who in sin and folly live,

Come hear the counsel of a friend.

I've sought for bliss, in glittering toys,

I've ranged the luring scenes of vice;

But never found substantial joys,

Until I heard my Saviour's voice."

This address, I know, was to "young people;" but it will suit the case of many of the old. I can not see, for my part, why men can have inducements to sin, except they are deceived with its nature and fruits—promising much when it performs nothing, except to torment the possessor. It is a moral poison to the soul.

Man was evidently designed for happiness. True it is, that he is liable, through ignorance and inexperience, sometimes to step out of the road of enjoyment; but still, every faculty of his soul, proves the divine object of his creation—that he was made for happiness—to "glorify God and enjoy him forever." As truly as his hands, from their very construction, or his limbs, his eyes, his ears, his mouth, prove their design, so truly do the moral and intellectual faculties prove for what God created them. The mind—how capable of improvement in knowledge and understanding! How well calculated to enlarge and expand itself; to "look from nature up to nature's God;" to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The moral sentiments—how they may be cultivated! How acute may the conscience become by moral training! How capable are we of loving our fellow creatures and our God! But these things depend, in a great measure, upon our cultivation and opportunity. Like the vegetables which grow up around us, they require the careful hand of the husbandman, or they will run to waste, and be choked with noxious weeds.

Though I have seen but little of the world, yet always have I seen that the virtuous are happy, and the vicious miserable. A poor man, but a virtuous one, is ever cheerful and happy; but the rich, if they are immoral and debased, are poor indeed; they do not possess that which feeds the moral and intellectual nature. God has so ordered it—it is in the nature and fitness and adaptation of things—that the vicious will not, they can not—let them be however rich in this world's goods—they can not enjoy themselves; and it is well they can not. They must learn the road to true pleasure, and lasting happiness, by contrast—from those consequences which exist in, and grow out of, the practice of those things which are not convenient, but tormenting. It is the case with many, that before they are converted, they must drink deep to the very dregs of the cup of infamy, degradation and pain; they must partake largely of the sour, and the bitter, and the loathsome, before they will relish the pure, crystal waters, which flow from the fount of the great Eternal.

Oh! when will men—thoughtless, unreflecting, reckless men, learn and believe God's word, that "Wisdom's way is pleasant," but the "way of the transgressor is hard."

WISDOM'S WAYS.

BY REV. JAMES GALLAGHER.

"Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

There is no difficulty in perceiving the change which has taken place in the preaching of the so called Orthodox. It has been but a few years since it was earnestly contended that the path of virtue was hedged up with thorns and briars, that to walk in Wisdom's ways was to subject yourselves to numerous evils, and to endure a variety of afflictions and crosses to which the unrighteous were total strangers, and that to be religious, or to be a follower of the blessed Saviour, was to be bowed down like a bulrush before God, to appear gloomy and dejected, and to deprive yourselves of many enjoyments which might add to your present happiness. But with very few exceptions, and much to the credit of the believers in endless punishment, these sentiments are at the present day, by many of them, discarded. Yes, and they are heartily ashamed of them, and well they might be. It was an evil hour for Eve when the Serpent induced her to believe that she would not die in the day of transgression. It was equally so to Christianity, when this sentiment was introduced into the Church, and when those who should have been instructors and guides to the blind, became blind themselves, and led their people to destruction by preaching the pleasures of sin.

Pleasure in sin! Yes, there is a hellish joy, a fiendish delight experienced by every transgressor of God's laws. Vice may present many allurements, she may be seated on a dazzling throne, arrayed in all the glitter and splendor of this world, but if you approach her, you will find her touch to be pollution; embrace her, and you will find her to be a gilded sepulchre, and it takes but a short time to discover that she is like unto the "pestilence which walketh in darkness, and the destruction which wasteth at noonday." She may endeavor to make you believe that "stolen waters are sweet and bread eaten in secret is pleasant," but she knoweth that all who worship at her shrine are in the depths of hell. But Wisdom points to another road. She assures us that "her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." Does she speak the words of truth? Appeal, dear reader, to your own experience for the answer to this question, and I know you will acknowledge that "the soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy" has ever accompanied you in the performance of virtuous actions.

Go into that family circle where the laws of nature and Revelation are known, respected and obeyed. There you will find the ennobling principles of virtue reigning triumphant. Each member of that family is robed in the beautiful garments of righteousness, and decked with the heavenly graces of Faith, Hope and Charity. Mercy and Truth they have entwined around their hearts, and they are guided in all their actions by the Wisdom from above which is far more precious than rubies. And what have they gained? There you will see the smile of contentment, their countenances beaming with joy and gladness. They feed on the bounties of a kind Providence with grateful hearts, and experience that recompense of reward which is ever attendant upon an approved conscience. So true it is that Wisdom's ways "are ways of pleasantness." Yes, those, and those alone know what peace is, who love the law of God. And we rejoice in hearing that these sentiments are held and preached at the present day by most, if not all denominations of Christians. Would that they were more strongly insisted upon from every pulpit in the land! We would then have reason to believe that righteousness will run down our streets as a river, and cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

HUMAN LIFE.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

"That life is long which answers life's great end." O, that this sentiment was more forcibly impressed upon the human understanding, and more deeply engraved upon the hearts of our fellow men! Could we behold it inscribed upon the tablet of every soul, written upon the storied urn that marks the dwelling place of the slumbering dead, and sculptured upon the portals of every grave yard, we should teach our hearts to reverence themselves when no longer applauded by others, and conduct ourselves in such a manner as to be enabled to transmit to the world, the precious memento of a well spent life and a good name. And could this truth be realized, we should not see such a wide difference between the actions of men. We should not see party spirit seeking to enthrone itself upon the rights of others; we should not see so many evils which in ten thousand ways infect society, and poison the fountain of human happiness, and we should not see misrule laying waste the fairest portions of the earth, and hanging like a deadly incubus over the religious community and domestic circle, if the beautiful sentiment—"That life is long which answers life's great end"—was more deeply felt and realized. Then should we live so that, when death comes to call us away from earth, we could look back upon our past lives with complacency, and not wish to recall a moment of our existence, to blot out one stain upon the scroll of the past, to remove one thorn we have added to the bosom of sorrow, or revoke one harsh word we have breathed into the innocent and confiding heart. O, gentle reader, would you have the radiant light of heaven, and the smiles of an approving conscience, break forth upon the dark and sombre shades of the tomb? Then mark well the path you choose for your feet to follow. Or would you have a cold and unfeeling world write for your epitaph, a good and worthy person, upon the towering marble, that shall rear its head in ostentatious mockery of the devouring worm that feasts upon your body? Then let this subject sink deep into your heart, and be feelingly impressed upon your mind.

TO UNIVERSALISTS.

"There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men."—Ecc. vi. 1.

It is not my design at this time to enumerate the various evils that are "common among men," but to select one that is too common among us as a denomination, and endeavor to call the attention of my brethren and sisters, and affectionately entreat them to assist in overcoming it. Believing it to be one of the greatest hindrances in the progress of truth, I trust you will receive a few words from me, although it would be much more gratifying to my feelings to see the pens of the more talented and experienced engaged with the subject. The "evil" to which I allude, consists in absenting ourselves unnecessarily from the house of public worship.

It is a fact that many who are among us, and who profess the doctrine of the restitution, do frequently neglect this pleasing and profitable duty, when they might and should enjoy it! The evil effects caused by this practice we believe to be many and great.

How discouraging must it be to the preacher, when he has made an appointment, sacrificed time and labor in preparing his message of truth and love, and travelled perhaps several miles regardless of weather, to be greeted on his arrival with—empty seats instead of the countenances of those he expected to see! Brethren and sisters, did you ever reflect on this subject? Did you ever realize the anguish that must wring his heart, especially if he be young, and diffident of his abilities, and conscious of his inexperience, (and at such times the evil is generally most apparent,) and that you thus virtually tell him that no pains or sacrifices on his part are sufficient to induce you to take the trouble of going a few rods, or miles even, to cheer his heart in his labors, and encourage him to overcome his diffidence, and to persevere until he attains to that state of eminence which will command the respect and attention of all? Does such a practice show much love for the doctrine you profess, or desire for its progress? Where, allow me to ask, would have been the many talented heralds of the Gospel of life and salvation that are now the blessing of our land and delight of our hearts, if all had followed your example in the commencement of their labors in the ministry? They could not have preached if they were none to hear, and the generous feelings and emotions that glowed in their youthful bosoms, must have eternally remained there, instead of gushing forth in torrents of eloquence to instruct and improve mankind, by wiping the foul stains from the character of our Heavenly Father, and causing error to tremble in its strong holds. For one, I consider it more blame-worthy for individuals thus to disappoint their minister, than for a minister to disappoint a congregation.

But this is not all. The pernicious effects to yourselves are deserving of notice. To say nothing of the improvement of the morals and devotional feelings which the services of the sanctuary produce on yourselves and families, you deprive yourselves of that which, when rightly understood and practised, is a foretaste of the joys of Heaven. For we have reason to believe that the joys and pleasures which constitute the happiness of the ransomed throng, are derived, at least in part, from the glorious employment of worshipping the God and Father of the spirits of all flesh, in spirit and in truth. Why then—Oh! why will you continue in this practice to your own disadvantage, and the grief of those of your brethren who "delight to go to the house of God in company." Yes, my feelings are severely tried with you for this neglect of duty, and a desire to enforce conviction upon your minds that will work out reformation, has induced me to make this appeal to your consciences. "Believe me not your enemy because I tell you the truth;" for although we may listen with rapture to the words of the speaker, raise our hearts and voices in devotion and praise, and receive a blessing; still a gloom will come over us when we miss from their places, those who might and should be partakers of our happiness.

Such meetings forcibly remind me of the partialist's views of heaven, where he expects to look in vain for the faces of those he knew on earth, and to him perhaps such meetings may be profitable; but to us who believe that the happiness of individuals consists in the happiness of the whole, Oh! let us live according to the principles we profess; let us one and all unite to overcome this evil by performing our duty individually. Then will our meetings be indeed and in truth "a heaven begun below;" then will righteousness and truth flourish and triumph; then will the kingdom of God come with power, and all nations will flow into it. That this happy era may soon arrive, is the sincere prayer of

THE FARMER.

The farmer, of all men, is most in the way of useful learning and improvement, if it be true that

"This our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in every thing."

I thought of the happy influence of the scenes with which we are most familiar, to day, in consequence of my having to encourage and incite one of my young folks to perseverance, which I did by relating to him the story of the lesson which Tamerlane once received from an ant. We, who see the works of God every day, might be daily learning lessons equally profitable.

The anecdote referred to is this: Timur or Tamerlane, the conqueror of Tartary, Persia, Armenia, Syria, and indeed of almost all the Eastern world, commenced his enterprising career under rather discouraging circumstances. His patience and perseverance during his struggles, danger and distresses, were altogether as remarkable as his courage and sagacity. He was once forced to take shelter from his enemies in a ruined building, where he was condemned to sit for many hours alone. In this depressing and miserable condition, an ant arrested his attention and diverted his feelings from praying upon himself. The ant was carrying a grain of wheat, or some other kind of produce, larger than itself, up a high wall. Timur says he numbered the efforts which the poor animal made to accomplish its object: the grain fell sixty-nine times to the ground, but the insect persevered, and at the seventieth attempt, it reached the top of the wall with its troublesome prize. The sight gave him courage at the time, and he is reported to have frequently told the story, and to have added that he never forgot the lesson which this incident conveyed.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXII.

The Minor Prophets. The writings of these twelve prophets, being of small bulk have always been joined together in one book, and in the enumeration of the sacred books by Josephus they are no more than one. They have however no connection whatever, and relate to very different periods of time, some of them being prior, and others posterior to any of the larger prophets.

Hosea. This book was written by Hosea, the first of the minor prophets. He was in part contemporary with Amos and Isaiah.

Hosea ii: 2. See the chapter from verse 1 to 7.

The comparison of a revolt from the worship of God to the conduct of a woman who forsakes her lawful husband is common in the Scriptures. Hence idolatry is frequently denominated adultery, and Christ has allusion to this in Luke xvi: 18. It is again spoken of, Hosea v: 7.

Joel. This book was written by the prophet whose name it bears. At what time Joel prophesied is uncertain; he lived however in the kingdom of Judah and prophesied while the temple and temple worship existed. Calmet says, "he lived in the early part of the reign of Uzziah," and this opinion is held by many others. Priestly thinks he lived in the reign of Manassa, but this is not probable as he was an idolator and had abolished the temple service.

Joel ii: 28-32. The apostle Peter quotes this language of Joel, and says it was fulfilled at the time of the miraculous outpouring of God's spirit at the day of Pentecost. See Acts ii: 16.

Joel iii. The prophecy contained in this chapter is given in such highly figurative language as to render it difficult to determine what the prophet had in view. Priestly is of the opinion that it relates to the future restoration of the Jews, after their dispersion among the Gentiles, but we should be very likely to apply the second chapter in the same way if Peter had not applied it to his own times. But if the second chapter relates to something still future, then it follows that Peter was mistaken in his application of it, which Dr. Priestly more than intimates, but which I am not willing to allow. At the time Joel delivered this prophecy, the Jews were in captivity, and the ten tribes had revolted. This prophecy therefore might be a figurative description of their return and restoration, by the favor of Cyrus, king of Persia. Or the third chapter may be a prediction of the future restoration of the Jews.—There are some things in it which favor this idea. See verse 18, latter clause. "And a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord and shall water the valley of Shittim." That a new river shall rise in Jerusalem, and take its course towards the Red Sea is announced by Ezekiel and Zechariah. According to the latter, another river, or rather a branch of this, will run into the Mediterranean sea. See Ezekiel xlvii: 2, etc., and Zechariah xiv: 8.

Amos. Amos was the fourth of the minor prophets, and prophesied in the reign of Uzziah. He was born in Tekoa, in Judea. At what time he died is not known.

Amos ix: 2. "Though they dig into hell, thence shall my hand take them—though they climb up to heaven thence will I bring them down." Here we see the people were to be brought up from hell in order to be punished. This surely could not mean that God was to take them from a place of endless misery. But the meaning is that though they hid themselves in caves or dens, or in pits dug in the earth, the Lord would hunt them out.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION IV.

THE CONCEPTION AND EARLY LIFE OF THE SAVIOUR.

The jealousy of Joseph.

MATTHEW I.—18. Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost.

19 Then Joseph her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily.

20 But while he thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.

21 And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins.

22 Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us.

24 Then Joseph, being raised from sleep, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took unto him his wife:

25 And knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son: and he called his name JESUS.

Matt. I.—18 Espoused. Among the Jews, the marriage contract was considered so sacred, that a violation of the engagement before marriage, was regarded as equally criminal with such violation after the marriage had been consummated: so that Joseph in this case might have resorted to the law recorded in Dent. xxii: 23–27, and brought her to the punishment of her supposed crime, which might have been death, depending on certain circumstances specified in connection with the law.

19 Joseph being a just man. It is thought by some that the term here rendered just, should have been translated benevolent, or by some similar term. At least, it would seem that it was at the option of Joseph to bring Mary before the public tribunal, or not; and being mercifully disposed, he did not do it.

21 Jesus. This term means Saviour, as intimated in the language, “he shall save his people from their sins.” It is worthy of remark, that though Jesus is often spoken of, as saving people from their sins; yet he is never represented as saving them from hell. How different is modern theology from that of the Bible!

23 Behold a virgin, etc. The prophecy here referred to, is found in Isai. vii: 14, and was spoken under the following circumstances. While Ahaz was King of Judah, his kingdom was attacked by Resin, King of Syria, and Pekah, King of Israel, which produced a general sensation of fear among the subjects of King Ahaz. Isaiah was therefore sent to assure him that his enemies should not prevail against him, and that such a sign as he should require, would be given in confirmation of the divine promise. Ahaz, however, refused to ask any sign, as he would not tempt the Lord. It is then recorded, “Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign; Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings.” That this prophecy did not originally relate to the Saviour, is plain from the fact that the latter part of it, which is inseparable from the former part, can in no proper sense be considered as verified by him. The first part of the prophecy, however, might, by way of accommodation, be applied to the Saviour as Matthew has applied it. See concluding remarks.

Emmanuel. God with us is given as the explanation of the name Emmanuel, from which it has been inferred that the Saviour was the Supreme God. But this inference has probably arisen from ignorance of the design, and the attending circumstances of the prophecy, in which the term Emmanuel occurs. The child that was to be born, was to be called Emmanuel, or God with us, as significant of the prosperity of the kingdom of Judah, as we learn from many places in the Bible that God's being with a person or persons, is a common phrase to denote the prosperity and happiness of those concerning whom the remark is made. The term Emmanuel is applied to the Saviour, also, to denote that God would be with us, that is, would bless us through him. It might be inferred with as much propriety, that the child alluded to primarily, in the prophecy, would be the eternal God, as that Jesus was such to whom the passage is secondarily applied.

25 And knew her not till etc. Much argument has been employed by a certain class of Christians, to prove the perpetual virginity of the virgin Mary; but the word “till” in this verse, and the phrase “first born,” contain plain indications that such an opinion is erroneous.

AN ADMONITORY HINT.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

“Be ye not servants of men”—PAUL

The spirit of Christianity is a spirit of liberty; and he is but half Christianized who voluntarily and tamely submits to the popular tyranny of priests, creeds, and fashionable customs; particularly when his reason and conscience unite in declaring their influence arbitrary, and their authority unfounded and deleterious. And yet, inconsistent as it evidently is, there are thousands, and millions, who pursue precisely such a course in their religious career. They seem cheerfully to sacrifice their religious liberty, their right of conscience, their boasted independence, at the blood-stained altar of spiritual tyranny and popular opinion. Now, do such persons realize that there is a God—that he is omniscient and omnipresent—that all the motives of the human heart lie open and naked before him? If so, can they expect to escape the searching ordeal of a righteous retribution? They may flatter themselves that they are securing the approbation of their fellow slaves, and the applause of a proud, thoughtless, alienated and honor-hunting world. But they should remember that they are doing all this at the expense of truth, and common honesty; and that if they should succeed in gaining their object, which is extremely doubtful, it will prove not only worthless in the end, but also a fruitful source of regret, and misery; for the time will assuredly come with us all, and soon too, when such attainments; though never so great, will be looked upon by all as being infinitely less than nothing, and that too, when we shall need the comforting and supporting influence of a manly, virtuous and approving conscience.

Reader, if you are a believer in a God and a Saviour, act in this matter as though you felt yourself under the immediate inspection of the one, and solemnly and religiously bound to follow the examples of the other. Thus will you evince the dignity of your moral nature, and fully realize that, “Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.”

REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

It is frequently contended, that the righteous are to be rewarded in a future life for their good deeds in this. Now we admit that this reasoning is correct, but we think that the premises are wrong, and wrong premises always lead to wrong conclusions, however correctly we may reason. We admit that punishments will be inflicted, in the same state of being, that rewards are administered; but we do not admit that the righteous will be rewarded in another life for their good deeds in this. Here let me ask, do any ever merit all the blessings they enjoy in this life? This question we are confident will be answered in the negative. We are all unprofitable servants. If then we can not merit all the finite blessings of this life, how can we expect to merit the infinite joys of heaven? It is impossible! Heaven is a gift and not a reward. This our brethren must admit, unless they take the ground that the good works of the righteous deserve more pay than they get in this life. This they will not be likely to do, except when driven to it by argument. If then we do not merit all the blessings we receive in this life—if we get more than our reward in this world, we can not of course expect to be rewarded hereafter. What then becomes of the future punishment of the wicked? If the wicked are to be punished in the same state of being in which the righteous are to be rewarded, will they not be punished in this life? If the righteous receive more than their reward in this world, is it not reasonable to suppose that the wicked will at least receive a just punishment here also? What say the Scriptures? “Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth: much more the wicked and the sinner.” A. F.

RESTRAINT.

Mankind are capable of being acted upon to the discharge of important duties and obligations, from motives of love and fear. These same incitements may also serve to deter them from the wilful commission of vice, and an unrestrained indulgence in crime. And as the reasonable, reflecting portion of community invariably regard the virtuous man with respect and honor, they look with a degree of contempt upon him who rushes headlong into the vortex of vice, immorality, and ruin; and in view of these observations, and considering the numberless sects and denominations of Christians by which we are surrounded, it is a matter of no ordinary moment to ascertain which of the doctrines that we are invited to believe, produces the most powerful restraint on the minds and conduct of the children of men, although it may be very easily determined if we but exercise a spirit of candor, and consent to obey the affectionate invitation—“let us reason together.”

On the one hand, we are instructed that as a consequence of transgression, the God of heaven and earth inflicts no penalty on his disobedient and wayward offspring in this present life, but reserves the fury of his indignation to be poured upon them during the wasteless ages of eternity.—that should one be so exceedingly fortunate as to repent for the multitude of sin he may have committed during life, and derived much heart-felt joy and satisfaction from, he is made the worthy recipient of undying felicity, even if his confession of guilt and moral pollution is made with his last expiring breath. The sentiment is, that—“While the lamp holds out to burn,

The vilest sinner may return,” and that a sorrow and sincere repentance for sin is sufficient to remove all guilt which a life's transgression would acquire, and constitute one a member of the chosen family, who alone are to mingle their praises around the throne of God and the Lamb. Thus it is evident that all that can operate upon the mind of a believer in this doctrine, that would serve to deter him from the commission of the most daring outrages against God and man, is an unnecessary fear of that which may be escaped by a moment's repentance. It is merely a supposed restraint which has no foundation save in the disordered intellects of those whose greatest discernment, in some matters, is exhibited in following in the footsteps of their spiritual guides with undeviating exactness.

On the contrary, there is a sentiment to some extent prevalent in the minds of men, which teaches that the great moral Governor of the universe, in accordance with the unequivocal declaration of Holy Writ, makes the way of the transgressor hard, while the ways of wisdom are, indeed, pleasant and delightful—that a just punishment for the sins here committed is inevitable, and that the practice of virtue invariably secures peace, joy, and consolation. Which of the foregoing views of God's government and dealings with dependent, erring man, (upon which much more might be written,) is calculated to produce the greatest restraint on one's life and actions while journeying upon the tempestuous ocean of human existence? That which teaches mankind that the transgressor's deserved punishment, however great, may be averted by a death-bed repentance, and that sin affords a momentary enjoyment, thereby presenting an incentive to vice; or that which instructs us that the punishment of guilt is unavoidable—that the wicked are truly like a troubled sea whose waters cast up mire and dirt, and that "though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished?" A mind divested of all prejudices, and free from the corrupting influence of preconceived opinions, will experience no great degree of reluctance in deciding upon the latter. In view of these observations, how unwise appears the conduct of those who indulge in the delusive hope, that—

"They'll tread so lightly upon transgression's ground That slumbering justice will not be aroused."

THE SLANDERER EXPOSED.

Br. GOSH—It is known to you and the readers of the Magazine, that I left home in September last, on a tour to the far west, with a desire to visit my friends and proclaim the Gospel of life and salvation to the people in the western states. Accordingly, I left the places where I had labored for the last three years and a half, destitute of the preached word. After my departure, those that have more of dreams and experiences for their guide than they have of the word of God, took the advantage of my absence, and endeavored to destroy the peace and happiness of the people, by declaring God to possess such a nature as would destroy all confidence in him. And to prove, as it would seem, that the God they worshipped, was angry at Universalists, one of the preachers waxed hot, and in his fury, whilst classing infidels and Universalists together, and ridiculing their views, (or what he was pleased to call their views,) uttered the following libel upon my character. Speaking of repentance, he said, "they will say they repent, as Mr. Wilcox, (I dare not call him Reverend,) told me he repented every day; and then went off and played cards all night." On being called upon to give the time and place, when and where, I had been known to play cards all night, he denied saying that I played all night; and on being further interrogated, to know when I played at all, he said he would take back part of it—that he did not know that I played, but that he was told by a member of my society that I did play. And on being further interrogated to know who this member of my society was, and when it was, he refused to tell, saying that he had had a dispute with me, and he did not want anything more to do with me. In this way he made off, and I believe he has not shown himself in that place since. The people will judge for themselves whether this does not carry the marks of falsehood on the face of it. They will ask, whether he would not willingly give all needed information upon this subject if it was true, and thereby save himself from suspicion of falsehood, and let me suffer the due reward of my deeds? They will also ask the question, whether he is not a mean man who will resort to such means to injure a fellow-being, and that a mean cause that requires it?

By the following it will be seen that I have given my Methodist brethren the opportunity of calling this slanderer to an account, in the same place where his crime was committed. But as they have not done it, and have not answered my letter, I deem it proper to lay the case before the public, that they may know how to estimate their proceedings and slanderous reports in future. The author of this report has for some years past, been a resident of Hammond, St. Lawrence county, and was stationed on this circuit, I am told, by the presiding elder whom I addressed in my letter, which follows.

TO REV. MR. BOWDISH.

Fowler, January 13, 1840.

DEAR SIR—It is with feelings of regret that I am under the necessity of troubling you in relation to the conduct of one of your preachers upon this circuit. Yet as you have the power to say go, and those under you go; and to again reverse the saying, and they return, I deem it proper to inquire of you, whether you do countenance and support the Rev. Mr. Conley, said to have been stationed on this circuit by you; and if so, I wish to inquire whether you are not willing to call him to an account for a certain statement made in his meeting at Halesborough, by which statement my character as a Christian, and the interests of a large and respectable body of Christians is involved. The statement is this in substance, that I had played cards. What is required of you, is simply this—that you cause him to state in the same place, and to his congregation, how he came by his information, and when and where I have been known to play cards, that the public may know the truth or falsity of this report.

If this be done, it may save you and your brethren generally, from suspicion of wishing to countenance one of your preachers in belying and slandering a fellow being merely for an honest difference of opinion. An immediate answer to this will be expected and thankfully received.

Yours, with due respect,

O. WILCOX.

The above was written and forwarded nearly two months since, but no answer has been received—which further confirms me in the opinion that it is in vain for us poor heretics, (as we are termed) to seek or expect our rights of those that esteem themselves so much better than they do us; and that they will testify against us falsely, and condemn us to be cast down, down to the regions of woe, whilst they look on and laugh and shout for joy! But they should remember that if they do not tell nearer the truth than Mr. Conley has done in this case, I do not fear being convicted by their testimony. I will close, then, by saying that I hope even this man will be saved "so as by fire." Rebuke them sharply, that others may also fear."

THE BIBLE A UNIVERSALIST BOOK—PARTIALIST JUDGES.

A young man who was disposed to search the Scriptures and see whether they supported the popular doctrine of endless misery or the doctrine of God's impartial grace, after finding much within the blessed book to convince him of the truth of the latter, wished to read some of the passages to his parents, who are members of the Broad-street Baptist church in this city, and consequently are much opposed to this soul destroying heresy. Accordingly a few days ago, he was endeavoring to enlighten their minds and prove the truth of this glorious doctrine of the blessed God, by reading to them some passages from the Bible, one of which was 1 Tim ii: 4. "Who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." For reading this he was thus indignantly accosted by them. "Clear out with your Universalist stuff, we don't want to hear none of it. If you want to read it, you may go and live with the Universalists, for we will not have it read in our house."

This young man has often been told by them that he should not have a home in their house, if he did not stop arguing in support of such a damnable doctrine as Universalism. Being very anxious for the eternal welfare of their son, they went to their Pastor for advice in regard to him, and he (their Pastor) in great sympathy with them for the immortal soul of their ungodly and heretical son, gave them the following advice. First they were to forbid him talking any with a Universalist. And second, to strengthen their bigoted persecution against him, their Pastor told them that when his children got so they would not go to church where he wanted them to, they should no longer have a home in his house! Truly consistency, thou art a jewel. What a comment this on the faith and influence of Partialism! What proof of their superstition and ignorance—yes, when one of their professed ministers will encourage and even recommend such a base spirit of persecution as this. From such a minister and the influence of such a faith, good Lord deliver us.

MORAL IMPROVEMENT IN ROCHESTER ORTHODOXY.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

Since "Jacob Munchausen," descendant of the "old Baron," left this city, to the tune of "O dear, what can the matter be," last Spring, we have had very peaceable times. We have experienced no moral whirlwinds. Morality and religion have been gaining ground. Two weeks ago, a moderate and decent protracted meeting commenced in the 2d Baptist Church here, under the ministrations of one Elder Clark of Leroy. From the time of its commencement until now, not a word, as I can learn, has been uttered against Universalists or Universalism, or any slanders belched forth against any class of our citizens. Br. Clark attends to his own business—preaches his own sentiments in a very appropriate and feeling manner. In this he should receive the approbation of all republicans and Christians. This reformation in the spirit and efforts of our neighbors, has evidently resulted from the recklessness of "Munchausen."

TRUST IN THE MERCY OF GOD.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

To confide in the mercy of Almighty God—to lean with the confidence of a child on the arm of an infinitely merciful Parent, is not only the duty of every individual, but is actually necessary to his happiness and well being. When he is surrounded with the cares, and perplexities, and vanities of this lower world—when almost insurmountable obstacles and difficulties present themselves at every turn—when the darkness and gloom of adversity's hour gathers about him, and affliction is rolling its dark and bitter waters in upon his soul, what will support and give him peace, save a firm and unshaken trust in the mercy of God—a confidence that nothing can shake—a reliance upon the mercifulness an Almighty Friend, which no trials nor adversities can destroy.

FREE WILL.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

It is frequently objected to the salvation of all men that they are free agents, and will not accept the offers of mercy held out to them in the Gospel—that though God has set before them the bread of life and the waters of salvation, and earnestly pleads with them to eat, drink, and live—still men are so very free that many will not accede to his solicitation; and as God will not force men to heaven against their wills, he is obliged to let them eternally perish! Now is this correct? Is it reasonable?

Let us suppose a case. A man is left destitute of food and drink, as many have been, till reduced to the last extremity of hunger and thirst. Then suppose a table to be spread before him, covered with the most sumptuous victuals—with the richest viands, and the most pleasant drinks—in short, with every thing that can satisfy the appetite and delight the palate; and the hungry man be invited to freely partake thereof—to eat and drink in welcome. Think you, would he be free to refuse the invitation? Would it require compulsion to prevent him from starving? Would it be necessary to force him to eat? Oh, no, no, friends; this man's free agency will not hurt him, if he don't eat too much!

Notwithstanding the obstinacy and opposition of men, God is able to bow their wills to his command, and make even the most rebellious come to Zion's feast with rejoicings, and crowd his gates with thankful songs.

DEATH.

I know not how it may seem to others, but to me there is a melancholy sweetness in the thought that I must die—that I am not forever to dwell in this clayey tenement, but am one day to soar away, away, away. The earth never was made for man's everlasting abiding place—for his eternal home; and he who clings to it as such, has never permitted his thoughts to roam heavenward. No. There is an elevation of mind to which he is a stranger, and a sublimity of soul of which he has no knowledge. He has thought of little else besides himself, and can hardly be said to have gone far beyond himself. To me there is an inspiration in affliction, and a divinity in death. And if I can feel that there is a God, it is when disease is at work in my vitals and winding its serpentine folds around every thing pertaining to vitality or life. Then it is that I feel my divinity; but when the pulse begins to weaken, the breath begins to shorten, and the lamp burns blue, then it is that I see it. To me affliction has a soothing sweetness, and death bears me away from earth to heaven. The one comes like an angel of mercy to a lone wanderer on the bosom of earth; the other like a messenger of deliverance to the tempest-beat and tempest-tost mariner in the hour of despair. The one weans me from the earth and makes death desirable; the other lifts me to my God and makes me long for heaven. The one tells me that I am mortal, the other that I am immortal. The one is a messenger of mercy on a mission of death, the other is a legate of goodness on an errand of life. In the one I behold a merciful Father, and in the other a benignant God.

Two individuals stand upon the Jordan of death. The one is ignorant of, the other is acquainted with, the scheme of divine Providence. The one will fear and tremble and the other will be calm and serene; the one will have gloomy forebodings and tormenting doubts; the other will have his countenance brightened with an immortal smile, and his eyes fixed on heaven; the one will cling to this world as his only hope, the other will sink into the tomb as the weary pilgrim sinks upon his nightly couch; the one is going—he knows not where, to do—he knows not what; the other is going to his Father's house, to repose in the bosom of glory.

Reader, one of these conditions is ere long to be ours; it is for us to say which it shall be.

THE EVIL EYE.

I have before referred to the parable of the laborers in the vineyard. The disposition evinced by one portion of the laborers, was to find fault, because they had not received as much as they imagined they merited, or to complain because others had been showed the same favor with themselves. They had an evil eye, (or disposition, if you please,) and the moment it witnessed the prosperity of others, they manifested it by their complaints. Their reward was in being made last when they supposed they should be first. They received pay for their labor, whereas those of whom they complained, received a reward for their labor, and also for their confidence in their employer. The latter were properly rewarded for qualities which the former did not possess. And we think as it has been, so this parable will continue to point its reproof at the self-righteousness, envy, and jealousy of mankind. There is no doubt it was a close rebuke to the Pharisees, of old. And wherever phariseism has been indulged, it has its loudest censures, whether in the temple at Jerusalem, on the plains of Judea, in the ecclesiastical council, the synod of priests, or the modern presbytery whether in the intercourse of man with man, his schemes and plans, or even his thoughts.

The Jews had experienced the especial favor of God in various ways. The divine Being, who was pleased to select them as his peculiar people, visited them with national prosperity, and spiritual favor, and promised their father Abraham that in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed. And they became a proud people—even the goodness of God was viewed by them as a license to sin—they lost sight of the nature of those blessings which they were continually enjoying, and supposed that they belonged to them by right of inheritance. And when the Saviour, after he had made his appearance on the earth, turned to the Gentiles, they reviled him for associating with sinners, and they hated him, as they appeared to hate the Gentiles, worse because he was good to them. They were professedly the holy people; they were, in their own estimation the only people who deserved a Saviour, and therefore would not consent to receive a Redeemer who came to teach the impartial goodness of God, and to save the whole world. They were enviously affected towards him and all the objects of his goodness, because he was good. They had an evil eye.

In the dark ages, many of the corruptions of the church proceeded from those favors and concessions which were made to it through the ignorance of the age, and which it afterwards claimed as a sacred right. As the power of the Pope, for instance. This arose gradually from small beginnings. At first, it appears, they were nothing more than bishops who, for the peace of the church, were invested with authority to decide all disputes relating to religious matters; but this power was not looked upon as an inherent qualification of these officers. From this small beginning, their influence increased, until they were called upon to notice all the persecutions, and requisitions, and quarrels of laymen and clergy. The people having thus made themselves dependent upon the authority and decisions of the bishop in power, he assumed the right of deciding all disputes and all matters of opinion. Next he might be seen assuming the name of Pope. He was to be Pope of Rome, merely in honor of the imperial city, because they considered that city the first in rank and grandeur. Then the Pope of Rome assumed, for the same reason, the right of superiority over all the subordinate officers of the church, throughout the world: and lastly he usurped to himself absolute and supreme power, not for the honor of Rome, but because, (professedly,) he was descended from the apostle Peter, and had in possession, the keys of heaven and hell. Thus he trampled upon the yielding passiveness of the Christian world until his evil eye was permitted to look upon millions bowing in slavish fear before his dreaded power.

The same evil dispositions which flash in the glance of an evil eye, have come down to the present generation. Although I rejoice that they are fast vanishing from the mind of man, having already lost the countenance of wise men who have felt the power of that truth which searcheth the heart and trieth the reins of men, yet that evil eye is still occasionally among men, jealously watching over, and paralyzing, with its serpent gaze, the best feelings of their nature. We wish every one, instead of watching the amount of pay which his neighbor receives, would rest content with being dealt justly by himself. It is more than probable in this case, that when a man finds himself disposed to envy, jealousy, fraud, or self righteousness, he would find an evil eye to cure for himself. There are those of all these failings who need to be reprov'd. They have looked out of the evil eye too long; it is time now that they opened the other. It can not be denied that there are those who are never satisfied with being dealt justly by, but if they find one disposed to be good to them, will exact, and extort, and oppress, just as long as they think he will put up with it; and when he has submitted to all, they will complain that he has not yielded half enough. Their eye is evil because he is good.

Some men exhibit an evil eye, when told that God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth, by objecting to that doctrine; because, they say, they could not bear the company of sinners. As much as though they were the only specimens of a change from sin to grace, and considered that their righteousness entitled them to the bliss of heaven; but if those wicked sinners who are so much worse than they are, can go to heaven too, they had rather not go there. Their company is not good enough for the righteous. So thought the Jews, of the Gentiles; and I venture to say that it is now as it was of old; the fullness of the Gentiles must come before even these modern Jews can be saved. They forget that while they are boasting of their own superiority, the voice of revelation proclaims the sentence, "the last shall be first, and the first last." To such we would say, is thine eye evil because God is good? Because God is as merciful to others as he has been to you, are you therefore to complain by saying, "These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal to us which have borne the heat and burden of the day?" Can you complain that you do not now receive all you deserve? Is not eternal life the "gift of God," and is it not lawful for him to do what he will with his own? Vain, foolish man! "take thine and go thy way." "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee; it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire."

RUMORS CORRECTED.

The Rev. Charles Lester, pastor of the Second Presbyterian church in this city, having been charged with, and having denied, holding what are called Restorationist sentiments, and denying the doctrine of the Trinity, a committee of the church called upon Br. Cook, who, accompanied by the writer, met them in conference with Mr. Lester, on the 19th ult. Mr. Lester unequivocally and repeatedly denied the truth of the reports and charges, and declared that he was and is a believer in the doctrine of endless sin and misery, and in the uncreated deity of Jesus Christ. In opposition to these declarations, Br. Cook and myself related various conversations had with Mr. Lester, generally before several individuals whom we named, in which Mr. Lester declared his belief in the entire conquest of holiness or goodness over all sin or evil—in the destruction of sin and the devil, in opposition to the common belief of their continued existence and confinement in hell throughout eternity—in the views of Br. Skinner, and more especially of Elhanan Winchester, in opposition to the views of Calvinists and "ultra Universalists"—in successive periods of human probation, and divine judgment, in this and future worlds—in God as the only proper object of prayer, and in Jesus Christ as the first created spirit, by whom God made the worlds—in the final salvation of the devil, etc., etc. Some of these declarations Mr. Lester positively denied—others he professed himself unable to remember—others still he attempted so to explain as to make them mean something different from what we understood them. His denials and explanations were met by offers of proving them on our part, (excepting one case, wherein he and Br. Cook were alone when the declaration was made, viz., the salvation of the devil,) and the names of the witnesses present, some six or eight in number, were named—and by statements of the circumstances under and in which Mr. Lester made the declarations, which circumstances to our minds absolutely preclude the possibility of misunderstanding him, or of his remarks referring to any other subjects than those to which we refer them.

Thus matters stood at issue between us before the committee. No proof was called on either side—none was proffered or named on his part save a manuscript sermon, in preaching which many understood him to avow a belief in ultimate universal holiness—and even that sermon was not produced.

The next day I called upon one of the committee, and stated that if they could charitably suppose (though I did not see how they could so suppose) that Br. Cook, myself, and the several persons we named as witnesses, had honestly misunderstood Mr. Lester, I had no more to say. But if they had the least doubt of our veracity in the matter, (and in my opinion there was a question of veracity between Mr. Lester and us,) then I asked as an act of common justice, an opportunity to introduce our witnesses that those doubts might be removed, and our veracity be sustained. He admitted the correctness of the view I took of the matter and the reasonableness of my request, and promised his influence to have it granted if necessary.

Since then, report says that the affair has been laid before the church, and that a majority have acquitted Mr. Lester, and agreed to continue him as their pastor. They heard the mere report of our testimony from the committee—they called not on us for any further statements, nor on any of the persons named by us, for their testimony in the matter. And though a few are dissatisfied with this summary mode of clearing their pastor, when there is so much testimony yet unheard, yet the majority have declared themselves satisfied with Mr. Lester's word alone, in opposition to the testimony of some eight or ten persons which can be adduced if they require it. This is implicit faith with a vengeance! It is a pity they did not take the bare word of the accused, at the first, and so save the trouble of calling witnesses, and unpleasantness of the conference.

This very brief statement of facts will hardly be denied by the committee or Mr. Lester, (so far as they are acquainted with them,) and is deemed necessary in the circumstances of the case, and also sufficient to rebut any imputations that may be thrown out against the witnesses, by a court which will acquit a defendant on his own assertions, without further examination! The terms will also be changed to three dollars per annum, or three dollars and fifty cents if not paid in advance. We hope these changes will lead to an increase of its usefulness in spreading the knowledge of the truth in the South.

The union house in Wallingford, Vt., more than one-half of which is owned by Universalists, was dedicated on March 5th. Sermon by Br. Gifford. The house is 48 by 96 feet.

Br. J. F. Dyar, has removed to Hingham; Br. E. Patridge to Watertown; and Br. R. S. Pope, from Sterling to Hardwick, Mass. Br. H. G. Smith, has removed to Berlin, Conn. and is to be ordained as the pastor of that society on the 22d inst.

There are 900 pupils in the Universalist Sunday schools in Boston alone—in the city and immediate vicinity, about 1500.

Br. L. F. W. Andrews says in the last Nazarene, that Br. Whittemore's Guide to Universalism is an infringement on the copy right of the Two Opinions. Br. W. having adopted the plan of Br. A's work as the plan of the Guide, to such an extent as to supersede the Two Opinions. If so, we hope that the affair will be settled peaceably, to the satisfaction of the injured party. Book makers must look out as well as machinists.

Rev. M. H. Smith, pastor of the Universalist society in Salem, Mass., who sometime since resigned his letter of fellowship to the Massachusetts Convention, on the plea of opposition to the discipline of ecclesiastical bodies, has notified his society that he could not associate with Universalists any longer as such, having no sympathy with them as a denomination, and that he could no longer preach to that society as a Universalist society. The society in return voted that they could not abandon their profession and name, and consequently Mr. Smith is at liberty to go!

The corner stone of the First Universalist meeting house in Newburyport, Mass., was to be laid last Monday with appropriate services.

Br. Nathaniel Holder, of Lynn, Mass, was ordained on March 15th. Sermon by Br. J. M. Austin. Br. Holder takes the pastoral charge of the society in Washington, N. H. A. B. G.

REV. S. W. FULLER.

It was with astonishment and grief that we heard of the mortal sickness of this most excellent and talented brother, whom only in our last number, we supposed (according to the statement in the last Nazarene) to be recovering. But a letter from Philadelphia has dashed these hopes to the dust. Br. Fuller has been subject to bleeding at the lungs for several years—during which he has sometimes been reduced very low, but as often recovered. Since December last, he has been confined to the house with one or more attacks, and the debility caused thereby; but it was supposed he was recovering therefrom. Instead of which, it appears by this letter, that himself, his physician, and friends, have no hopes of his recovery. Had I even suspected this, the light, joking remarks respecting him, in our last, would never have seen the light—would hardly have entered my mind. I regret them exceedingly; but more, much more the circumstances which cause me to regret their publication.

Br. F. is well known in this region, and wherever well known is deeply and ardently beloved for the goodness of his heart—respected for the uprightness of his deportment, and admired for his talents. We feel as if we could not spare so good and useful a fellow-laborer in the Master's cause, but if God sees proper to call him from his earthly toils to heavenly enjoyment and repose, it must be best, and most right, and wise; and we must submit to our loss, remembering that, for him, most emphatically are the words of the departed Hanscom true—"TO DIE IS TO GO HOME." #### CHARITY.

This term in the Scriptures, is not used in the modern sense, which is generally understood to be manifested by almsgiving—nor yet does it denote any restricted, exclusive affection, as filial, parental, conjugal or brotherly love, or love to God. It is the most extensive love of man for man—universal love—or as it is termed in phrenology, benevolence. But it is never,theless true, that although strictly universal in its desires for the well being of man, it fastens most tenaciously on those objects around it, which, while they seem least deserving of it, need it most. The miserable denizen of a cell, richly earned by his iniquities—the outcast from society on account of his ignorance, and poverty, and crime—the wretched impure who shivers at the corners of the streets as she lingers long in the deep hours of the night, waiting for some guilty one whom she may secure in her toils, to supply her necessities—all these, the most guilty of their kind, if not of the humane race, are the special objects for whom heaven-born charity heaves the sigh of pity, or pours the prayer to God, or extends the relieving hand. While her purity shrinks in abhorrence at their depravity and guilt, (as abhorrence the greater, because it is by them the miserable beings are reduced to what they are,) her compassion nevertheless draws nigh to them, to weep over and to bless the victim.

Let not the proud Pharisee condemn this office of charity—let not the sordid and sensual suspect its purity, because it draws nigh to such depravity—but may they turn their eyes to Jesus of Nazareth, and behold it exemplified in his life and actions, whose existence was holiness and his deeds goodness. For the vilest, the chief of sinners, he toiled, and taught, and died to commend God's love to them—for God does love such depraved and guilty wretches. And since there are none so vile, that God can cease to love them—since none are so depraved, as to be excluded from the objects of Christ's mission—let it not be said that any can become so vile and so depraved, that the Christian should not love them also. Indeed, the more sunken any become in guilt and crime, the greater their need for our charity—the less deserving they are of our aid, the greater the obligation will true charity feel to yearn over them with its compassions—the greater will be its desires to restore them to holiness and bliss—for "charity never faileth"—ever hopeth—always endureth—and rejoiceth more over the restoration of the fallen than over the steadfastness of the righteous. Such is the charity of Jesus—such the charity, or universal benevolence of his true followers. A. B. G.

NEW BOOKS.

Br. Hutchinson is now in New York, procuring a supply of books for district schools, and private libraries. Br. Whittemore gives notice in the Trumpet that he has sent him a large supply of the Guide, for subscribers and purchasers in this region. Br. Thayer's new Bible class and Sunday school book, Br. Chapin's Lectures, Br. J. G. Adams' two works, Br. Williamson's Exposition and Defence of Universalism—pronounced by Br. Price to be one of the author's best efforts, and "an interesting manual of the great leading arguments for our faith in a cheap and convenient form"—all these, and some others, will undoubtedly be received by Br. H. as soon as the canal opens—perhaps sooner.

In addition to these, the continuations of the Massachusetts School libraries are now on their way hither, and will be here also as soon as means of conveyance are provided. We hear that the Erie canal is to be opened by the 15th inst.—others say the 20th. But orders may be sent in advance of that time, and then, as soon as the books arrive, they will be attended to. We hope our friends, West, North, and South, will see the great importance of sustaining Br. H.'s bookstore, and will give him the preference in all their purchases of books and stationery, in all cases, when he can supply them on as low terms as they can be supplied elsewhere—which it is believed he can do in all cases. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. Gross, in Bridgewater—by Br. N. Brown, in Mottsville.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst. by Br. S. J. Gibcox, at the White Store, and the second and fourth Sundays in each month during the year—Br. J. Chamberlain in Collinsville.

LINES

To the memory of Mrs. BETSY BERRY, wife of DAVID F. BERRY, of Malone, N. Y.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

'Mid eve's pensile blossoms the light winds are playing,
To waken soft tones from the flowers' tiny bells;
Sweet echoes along the hush'd bowers are straying,
And moonlight is weaving her magical spells.
But ah, that sad group! all this beauty unheeding,
They weep round the couch where the lov'd one is laid—
From whose azure eye, life's rich light is receding,
O'er whose spirit is stealing oblivion's shade.

Kind hearted and beautiful!—fond hearts deplore thee,
And friends by thy life's gentle tenor endear'd;
The grief-stricken forms of thy parents bend o'er thee,
And he whom the light of thy loveliness cheer'd.
How wearisome now is life's pathway before him,
Companionless, sorrowful, cheerless and lone;
How gloomy and frowning the grief-cloud hangs o'er him,
Since thou, his bright star of existence, art gone!

Sweet vision of loveliness!—calmly thou'rt sleeping,
Like frail blossoms bow'd by the frost spirit's breath,
Though grief o'er thy rest her sad vigil is keeping;
Alas! is this stillness the slumber of death?
Pale, pale as a snow wreath by winter winds driven,
Are thy cheeks, lately blooming with health's rosy tinge;
And veil'd are those orbs, that, like starlight at even,
'Neath silver clouds, shone through the lid's silken fringe.

They've wrapp'd the light robes of the sepulchre round her,
Whose whiteness excels not her ivory brow;
And with the dark grave's chilling coronet crown'd her,
While affection is waking the wild dirge of woe.
How oft when the grey wand of twilight is weaving
Her mystical spells over mountain and plain,
In mem'ry's fond mirror, the crush'd spirit, grieving,
In seraph-like beauty shall see her again.

Alas! how our soul's cherished treasurez are flying,
One by one they depart from our sin-stricken bowers,
The wail of the mourner, the groan of the dying,
Strangely blend with the numbers of mirth's glad some hours.
The shroud and the coffin-lid darkly enclosing
Those diamonds that shine in love's circle so bright,
Remind of the hour when in silence reposing,
We shall rest 'neath the mantle of Death's rayless night.

But list to the song of the Seraphim, telling
Of glory's bright mansions beyond the lone grave,
And Love's lofty chorus symphoniously swelling,
Sweetly breaks through the gloom, o'er oblivion's wave.
And lo, through the flower-border'd vistas, bright shining,
See the heavenly Zion's rich portals unfold;
And purple wing'd harpers 'neath life trees reclining,
Sing the songs of the Lamb, to their lyres of gold.

There mercy's soft breezes o'er verdant plains blowing,
Are bearing sweet perfumes and odors divine;
O'er emerald sands the glad fountains are flowing,
That in the bright radiance of truth ever shine.
In bowers of anaranth, fadelessly blooming,
The lov'd one is learning the songs of the blest;
And heaven's own light the soft eye is illuming,
And Cherubim plumes fan the spirit to rest.

No more shall she wander where sorrow-mists darkling,
Cast a shadow of gloom o'er the loveliest scene;
She soars where the high arch of heaven is sparkling
With glory's bright spangles, all pure and serene.
She quenches her thirst where the glad river gushing
Proceeds from the throne of Omnipotent Love;
In whose glorious presence the pure throng are blushing,
While mercy's broad rainbow is bending above.

Then why should we mourn? since the spirit is winging
Through gardens where bloom the perennial flowers;
Where harp strings unnumber'd their music is ringing—
Sweet strains never heard in Time's shadowy bowers.
To the deep-rolling anthems her rapt lyre is sounding,
As she stands on the crystal sea mingled with fire;
Whose billows transparent the echoes resounding,
Seem the loud organ-peal of the Cherubic choir.

In Canton, February 26th, by the same, Mr. ALBERT C. NASH to Miss CAROLINE SANDERSON, both of Canton.

In Marshall, March 10th, by Rev. Geo. W. Gage, Mr. DAN P. BUCKINGHAM to Miss HARRIET L. TITUS, daughter of Mr. Charles Titus, of that place.

In Howard, Steuben Co., January 23d, by Rev. S. Barnes, Mr. GEORGE ALLEY to Miss ABBY ANN GRAVES, both of Howard.

In Mottsville, Sunday, March 1st, by Rev. N. Brown, Mr. LEWIS C. PENDLETON to Miss HARRIET JANE COLLINS, both of Mottsville.

In Pitcairn, St. Lawrence Co., March 11th, by Rev. J. H. Whelpley, Mr. GEORGE W. FREEMAN of Wilna, to Miss AUDELIA E. HARRIS, of the former place.

On the 3d of March, Mr. ETHAN S. JOHNSON to Miss JANE WHIPPLE, both of Ionia.

At Union Falls, (Marcellus) March 19th, by Rev. Levi Parsons, Mr. HENRY A. STEEL to Miss MELISSA A., daughter of Col. Dan Pierce, all of that place.

In the Universalist Church at Watertown, on Sunday evening, March 8th, by the Rev. H. L. Hayward, Mr. GEORGE ANDERSON to Miss EMELINE PORTER, both of Watertown.

DEATHS.

In Auburn, February 26th, of scarlet fever, ELIZA DICKINSON LEONARD, aged 4 years, 6 months. Thus was this interesting child cut down in the morning of life. She bloomed too early for the frosts of life, and had her wish, so often expressed, to go to heaven and be with her mother; there, in the presence of God and the Lamb, to be happy forever. May the rich consolations of truth be enjoyed by the mourners. G. W. M.

In New Hartford, March 4th, infant son of Sylvester E. and Patty Butler, aged 3 months. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners and neighbors, in a very feeling and appropriate manner, by Rev. Mr. Searles. C. M.

In Lockport, Jeff. Co., on Thursday night, March 5th, after an illness of only about two weeks, Mrs. LYDIA wife of William K. Butterfield, Esq., aged 38 years. In the sudden death of this truly amiable lady, not only are a good husband and numerous children called to mourn the loss of an affectionate companion and tender mother, but the community in which she resided has lost one of its most valuable members, and the denomination to which she belonged, one of its brightest ornaments. She was a Universalist in deed and in practice. The pure principles of the gospel of unlimited grace, were deeply and firmly implanted in her heart. She leaned in confidence and faith upon the "rod and staff" of her divine Shepherd—while she looked triumphantly forward to a period when "there shall be no more death" neither sorrow nor sighing. Seldom indeed do we find a brighter exemplification of the Christian virtues, and of the sustaining power of Universalism, than was displayed in the virtuous life, and peaceful and triumphant death of Sister Butterfield. Peace to her ashes. Her funeral was attended on the 7th, and a discourse delivered in presence of an overflowing congregation, by H. L. HAYWARD.

In Smithville, Dec. 27th, Mrs. CLARISSA POTTER, aged 72 years. The deceased was a Methodist for many years, but some time previous to her departure she embraced the soul-cheering doctrine of universal grace and love, and died in the triumphs of the same. She has gone, but she has left behind her a good name, as a memento that she has not lived in vain. Funeral on the 29th. Sermon by J. T. G.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered at the Dedication of the New Universalist Church in Homer, Cortland Co., N. Y., on Tuesday, December 24, 1839.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

[Published by request.]

CHRISTIAN AUDITORS AND FRIENDS—We have assembled this morning for the purpose of solemnly dedicating this neat and beautiful temple of praise, to the worship of Him who dwelleth in a temple not made with hands. And to many it is undoubtedly an occasion of joy and rejoicing. To those who have unweariedly toiled for the prosperity of Zion in this part of our Master's heritage, and who have put forth their best and most powerful exertions in behalf of that cause so dear to every benevolent heart, even when the prospect before them was cheerless and dark—to those, this occasion must be one of joy, and must awaken feelings of gratitude and thankfulness too big for utterance. Their labors have been crowned with abundant success—they have beheld the cause of God and humanity prospering around them; and, by the auspicious smiles of Divine Providence, they have now a house of worship in which they may present their vows and offerings unto the Lord, and in which the Gospel may be preached in its fulness of love divine.

And to all those who have embraced the doctrine of the unlimited and impartial grace of God, and who desire to see it prevail, praying that it may finally triumph—to all such, this is an interesting and joyful occasion. To know that the pure principles of the Gospel are prevailing—that their light is breaking in upon long prevailing darkness—that the influences of eternal truth are bursting open the prison doors of error, and setting many weary captives free; and that the triumphs of the cross are being extended far and wide, even to distant lands beyond the dark Atlantic wave—to know all this, must certainly gladden the heart of every true and faithful follower of a world's Redeemer!

To the herald of the cross, this is an occasion of joy. Here, in the contemplation of the prosperity of our common cause of truth, and of pure and undefiled religion, he forgets his cares, his toils and his fatigue; and when he leaves, he returns to the field of his labor with a stout heart, and a nerved frame, and with a determination to toil more unweariedly than he ever has done for the salvation of his race!

To know that the cause in which we are engaged is prevailing, refreshes and gladdens the soul of your speaker. It is but a few years since, that the tidings of universal redemption and salvation were first proclaimed in the "Empire State." There were no temples then dedicated to the worship of a God of impartial grace and love, and but few laborers toiling in the vineyard of their Lord and Master. But how is it now! Cast your eyes abroad over our green hills and smiling valleys—over our growing towns, our beautiful villages, our thickly crowded cities, and mark the change! Churches have been erected in which a God of love might be worshipped, and to which thousands flock to hear preached the gospel of a world's salvation! And the benevolent system of faith we have embraced shall continue to prevail—its conquests shall extend further, and wider, and wider still, until all the ends of the earth shall see of the salvation of God! In view of these things—in view of the past and present prosperity of our cause, and of the success that has attended our efforts for the upbuilding of Zion in this place, let us enter into the gates of the Lord with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise!

As we have assembled for the purpose of setting apart this sanctuary for the service of the Most High, and of solemnly dedicating the same to his worship, it seems fit and proper that we should, on this occasion, speak of this worship—of its nature and benefits—making it the subject of our discourse. As an appropriate motto, we have selected the 6th verse of the 95th Psalm:—

"O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our Maker."

That man is naturally a religious being, can not well be denied. Wherever we behold him—whether wandering over the frozen regions of the North, or parching beneath the burning influence of a Southern sky—whether roaming abroad through the wild and gloomy forests of the western world, or dwelling amidst the proud monuments of art, civilization and intellectual refinement—in all countries, and in all climes, we behold him seeking a divinity to worship—in the language of an eloquent divine, "we behold the child looking around for the father!"

Man's nature craves worship—he will have some being, or some divinity, which he acknowledges superior to himself, before whom he may kneel and pay divine homage. And the nature of his worship corresponds with the real or imaginary character of the being he worships. If he believe him to be cruel and revengeful, he will strive by costly rites and bloody sacrifices to obtain his smiles and his favor. Hence it is that we see human beings immolated upon the altars of heathen superstition—the votaries of an idolatrous worship casting themselves beneath the ponderous wheels of Juggernaut—the burning of widows on the funeral piles of their husbands, and the plunging of infants beneath the waves of the Ganges!

It seems proper, then, that we, in the first place, speak of the nature and character of that Being whom we are called upon to worship, and before whom we are to kneel in humble adoration and prayer.

THE NATURE AND CHARACTER OF GOD.

God is a Being of infinite and unchanging love. The sun of his benevolence shines on all his works, and beams all over the wideness of the moral world. All that his creative hand has formed, he has pronounced good; and his kind and protecting care is extended over all that he hath made. He is not the enemy of man. He does not hate him because he has sinned, and come short of his glory; no—but he loves man—loves him notwithstanding he has transgressed his holy laws, and turned a deaf ear to a Saviour's pleadings, and slighted the invitations of his mercy.

The character of God is paternal in its nature. "He is infinite in power, wisdom, goodness, justice, mercy and truth, and all these harmonize in his government, and conspire to render that government truly parental. In order to constitute a man a good parent, he must have power, and wisdom, and goodness, and justice, and love, and mercy, and truth. But all these are parts of one and the same character. You may say, if you please, that a man has power and wisdom to govern, guide and defend his children. He has goodness to bless, mercy to pity, truth to teach, and justice to reward their virtues and punish their vices; but when you have said that he is a father, you have comprehended it all in one word. So of God—you may say that he is powerful and wise, just, merciful, good and true; but when you say he is a Father, you have told the whole story. It is all comprehended and embraced in that word. This is what we mean by the paternal character of God. He is at all times a Father; and whether he sweetly invites and allures by the tenderness of love and mercy, or in the stern features of justice smites in the equity of judgment, it makes no difference. He is a Father still, and guided in all his ways by the fullness of a Father's love."

But how many there are, who have such dark and erroneous conceptions of the Divine Character, that their every thought of God causes them to shudder—the cheek to blanch—the lip to tremble, and the eye to roll with horror! How many thousands surround us, who look upon God as the enemy of man—who are hopeless and despairing, because they deem the Great Parent of the Universe passionate and changeable in his nature—in a state of continual trembling and anxiety, lest they may fall under his Almighty displeasure and wrath, and be cast off from a participation in the joys of heaven, with millions and millions of his intelligent creation! But how far away in the darkness of error are such, my friends! Their mental vision is closed to the glorious sunlight of divine truth. They are wandering afar off in a land of perpetual gloom—a howling wilderness—a desert waste, where spectres roam, and horrid phantoms affright the soul! They have no just nor due conceptions of the perfection and harmony of the divine attributes—no correct knowledge of the nature and character of their Creator. For such we have the most heart-cheering and soul-rejoicing news—the glad tidings that God is the unchangeable Friend and Father of all—that his bounties and favors are co-extensive with the wants and rational desires of his creatures, and that his loving kindness shall never depart, nor the rivers of his goodness ever fail!

God will ever be, what he ever has been, the kind Preserver and the bountiful Benefactor of the children of men. He will ever be the affectionate Father of the universe—the smiles of his benignity will ever surround the erring sons and daughters of humanity—he will watch over them in the perilous voyage of human life, and at last take them to a better home than this!

And do we not feel and know that God is our Father! Do not the numerous blessings that are showered down upon us from his munificent hand, conspire to tell us this truth! Do not the thousand tokens of his love, that are being continually presented to us cause our hearts to feel that an almighty Friend watches over us for good! And what comfort and consolation there is in the thought that God is our Father—that he careth for us as his frail and dependent children, and will never forget us—and, that in the darkest moments of our being, when sorrow has corroded every joy and embittered every pleasure, God is with us the same as when the sun shines brightly on our paths, and peace and gladness fill the soul!

Could the fond father who, perchance, is weeping over the grave of him who was his pride and his joy—his grey hairs ready to descend in sorrow to the grave—uncomforted and comfortless, because he doubts that God can be as kind as an earthly parent—could he be made to believe that God is an affectionate Father, who loves all his children, how soon would his tears be dried, and every sigh of sorrow hushed!

Could the affectionate mother, who refuses to be comforted because her child is not, and who has no hope that she shall ever see the rose which death plucked from her bosom blooming in heaven, be made to know that the Creator of the universe is love—love as boundless as his own works, and as unfathomable as Eternity! and that he has created but to happy and bless—could she be made to know all this, how soon would sorrow be banished from her heart, and the days of her mourning be ended!

Could the wife weeping at the bier of her husband, or the husband mourning at the grave of her whom he had sworn to love and cherish, with no prospect before them that they shall ever again be united to the dear departed one—could they be brought to realize that God is a Father who will never fail nor desert his children, how soon would they be freed from tormenting doubts and apprehensions, and their hearts filled with a peace that passeth all understanding!

That God is the Father and Friend of the human race—that he loves all his children, can not be successfully denied. His love for a sinful world shines forth in those precious promises of salvation recorded in his Word—it is displayed in his holy will and purposes relative to the ultimate destiny of his rational offspring—it is revealed on every page of the everlasting Gospel—yes, free, unpurchased, impartial and universal love, is the theme of that gospel which is glad tidings and cheering news of peace, pardon, redemption and salvation through the great Redeemer! How often did the Saviour speak of the love of his Father, for his wayward and sinful children! "By faith we have followed him through his earthly career, and from his lips there fell not one word against the parental character of God; in all his discourses, and in many of his beautiful parables, he set forth the Supreme as possessing the tender and forgiving feelings of a Father toward the sinner, ever ready, like the parent of the returning prodigal, to meet him a great way off, and bring him to his compassionate embrace—to the peace that holiness gives."

And this is the Being whom we are commanded to worship—a Being of unbounded and impartial benevolence—a Being who commended his great love toward us, by sending his only begotten Son to die for a sinful and alienated world; and who will at last bring a ransomed universe to sit down to the "feast of fat things," with angels, at the great day of rejoicing!

THE NATURE OF TRUE AND ACCEPTABLE WORSHIP.

God being the Father of all Earth's children—the unfailing Friend of a sinful and depraved world, and loving, as he does, every intelligent creature whom he has made, can require nothing save the hearts of his rational offspring—the love, and gratitude, and thankfulness of the soul.

He requires no one to bow before him in base and servile fear. This fear can not enter into the composition of true and acceptable worship. It is not pleasing in the sight of Heaven. It is true, that our heavenly Father requires us to fear him—not with a slavish, but with filial fear. This fear being the offspring of love, is an essential ingredient in the composition of that worship which we are commanded to render unto God. But the fear that is possessed by the crushed and down-trodden slave, or by the debased and degraded worshipper at the shrine of idolatry, is no part nor portion of the service that God requires; and the man, or the woman, who bows down at the altar of prayer, under the influence of this passion, does not, and can not worship God acceptably.

True and acceptable worship is spiritual in its nature; for God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. Mere outward forms and ceremonies will never do—if there be no spirituality—no feelings of reverence, gratitude and love in the heart, when we kneel before the Lord our Maker, our worship is all a mockery, and is neither pleasing nor acceptable in the sight of God. He requires the heart and its affections—the sincere homage of the soul. This is the service which we are required and commanded to render unto our Creator:

If the soul, then, be filled with love—if our affections are placed upon the great God of love, we can truly and acceptably worship him at all times; not only in his holy sanctuary and on the Sabbath, but in any place, and at all times and all seasons. In the closet, as well as in the temple of the living God—in the cultivated field and the mighty and trackless forest—when the sun is shedding upon us the brightness and glory of his countenance, and when the darkness and gloom of midnight are around and about us, the pure and simple breathings of worship may go up acceptably before Him who is a Spirit!

But for the public worship of God, it is proper and necessary, that a house be set apart expressly for this purpose. Still, when we are assembled on the Sabbath for the public exercises of devotion, the same spiritual worship is required of us—the homage of the heart and the affections. We are to come up to the Sanctuary on the Sabbath, with hearts bursting with gratitude and love. We are to enter into the earthly courts of the Lord with joy, feeling that he has abundantly blessed us in the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty. We are to come up to the temple of the Most High with minds filled with hope and heavenly assurance, and leaning on the gracious promises of Almighty God. If we do this, the service we render unto our Maker will be acceptable; and we shall worship Him who is a Spirit, in spirit and in truth.

THE DUTY AND IMPORTANCE OF WORSHIPPING GOD.

That it is our duty to worship him who has thus far conducted us on our journey through life, and who has been our unfailing Friend when other friends have failed, is a fact made plain and enforced in the Scriptures of divine truth. And indeed we are under the most weighty and solemn obligations to render unto God the homage of the heart and the affections—a spiritual and divine worship. We are bound to do this by the regard, the veneration, and the love which we owe to the Father of our spirits.

As the pious and sacred feelings and emotions of the soul are the glory of humanity, so a decent and manly avowal of these feelings and emotions "before the world, is a tribute which we owe to God, as well as to man." And how can this avowal be more fitly and strikingly made, than by joining in the solemn and delightful exercises of public devotion!

If, my friends, we really and sincerely believe that there is an all-pervading Spirit in the universe—that there is a God who rules and reigns on high, and who is the Father, and Friend, and Benefactor of the human race—we should show our faith by our works, not by an observance of vain and absurd rites; not by a pharisaical display of self-righteousness; but by a strict adherence to the good old practice of worshipping God in the beauty of holiness, and rendering unto him the love, gratitude and obedience of dutiful children.

"If a principle of rational and scriptural piety be established in our hearts, it will be generous, ardent and diffusive; we shall feel that our own solitary homage is too small a tribute to the Being whom we adore; we shall wish to kindle the same devout flame in every creature around us; and, like the fervent Psalmist, we shall call on the earth and heavens, on angels and men, to unite in swelling the song of praise to God and the Lamb!

In worshipping God there is great reward. The soul of the humble and devout worshipper is filled with a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory. He who has given his heart to his Father in heaven, and who delights to join in the public and private exercises of devotion, is in the enjoyment of that rest which the worldling knows not of. He is lifted far above the world and its vanities—his trust and his confidence is in Him whose love many waters can not quench, nor floods drown; and he is in possession of a peace that mocks the power and the influence of the storms and tempests of this mortal existence.

It were impossible for us at this time to enumerate all the benefits which flow from the worship of our heavenly Father. It is a mean which God has appointed for carrying on the great work of moral regeneration and salvation in our world, and for enabling his offspring to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

Let the institutions of divine worship be uprooted and overturned—let the temples of praise be deserted and destroyed—and what would become of the freedom, and the intelligence, and the refinement, and the virtue of the American people? Go, visit those places where the Sabbath is disregarded, and the worship of almighty God neglected, and what do you find the state of society? "All who are acquainted with such places, know very well that Sunday is made a day of business, or pleasure, or dissipation—that the education of the rising generation is grossly neglected—that poverty is gaining ground, and that open immorality is increasing with rapid strides." And should the time ever come when our sanctuaries shall be deserted or demolished, and when the pure and spiritual worship of Jehovah shall be looked upon as the invention of priests, and a relic of darker ages, that time will find us an ignorant, degraded and enslaved people. Oh, then, let us be regular in an attendance at the house of God! Let us come up to his sanctuary on each returning Sabbath; and there let us worship and bow down, and there pay our vows and offerings unto the Lord.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

I can not, without doing violence to my feelings, take leave of this congregation without addressing a few words to the friends by whom this house of worship has been prepared. As your pastor, I have known your anxieties, your toils, your privations, and the sacrifices you have made. By the blessing of God you have done nobly—your labors have been crowned with success—you have now a sanctuary in which the prayer of faith may be offered—in which the herald of the cross may lift up his voice in proclamation and defence of the doctrine of free and universal salvation—in which your mourning and bereaved may be comforted by the words of everlasting life, and in which you may all be taught those truths which pour a flood-tide of divine light in upon the darkened soul—which loosen the fetters from the limbs of the sin-bound captive, and fill the hearts of the mourning with peace and gladness. May you be encouraged by this, to press onward in the good work which is so well begun, and you shall be brought off conquerors, and more than conquerors, through him that loved us and gave himself for us.

The congregation at large have our thanks for their attendance on this interesting and joyful occasion. We are glad to see you here, my friends, and to be able to speak to you of our prosperity. And may you, from what you have here seen and heard, be induced to do more than you ever yet have done for the welfare and prosperity of our common cause.

To those who have kindly met with us on this occasion, and have united their hearts and voices in singing to the praise of Him before whom angels tune their golden harps, we tender our warmest thanks. You have added largely, my friends, to the interest and joyfulness of our meeting, and by the eloquence of your music, have inspired our hearts with a deep devotional fervor. We again thank you, and commend you to God in the full assurance of faith, that when you have ceased on earth to chant the honors of your Father's name, you, together with a ransomed universe, will be brought to unite with angels, in a holier clime, in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb!

PIG AND PUPPY.

ANECDOTE.

Brother C., of Ohio, held a debate with three Campbellite preachers. At one moment, they would assume a position, and the next deny it. They were so unreasonable and inconsistent that brother C. became rather impatient, and thought he would illustrate the predicament they were in by a simple anecdote. Says he, "A layman thought he would send his preacher a Christmas present, so he killed a fine pig, dressed it very nicely, put it in a bag, and sent his boy with it to the Pastor. The boy called at a grocery, perhaps to speak of the generosity of his father. When he arrived at the house of the preacher, he told the priest that his father had sent him a fine roaster, and if he would tell him where to put it, he would empty it out of the bag. The priest thanked him very kindly, and was happy to receive the pig; but when the bag was opened, out came a puppy! The preacher considered himself imposed upon, and the boy was perfectly astonished. "Why," says he, "it was a pig when we put it in there, for I saw father when he put it in the bag, and I know it was a pig." The puppy was again deposited in the bag, and the boy started home to tell the story to his Father. The circumstance was so curious that the boy called at the grocery again to tell it to his companions. While there, the little rogues, unperceived by the boy, took out the puppy, and put the pig again into the bag. The boy went home and told his father that the pig was a puppy. The father said that it could not be, for he put it up himself, and he knew that it certainly was a pig. The boy, in order to convince the old man, said he would open the bag. He did so, and behold, the pig fell out. Now, the boy was still more astonished, and somewhat amazed—"Why, father," he exclaimed, "it will be a pig when it's a mind to, and a puppy when it's a mind to!" And now, says Br. C., if you will either be pig or puppy, I will continue the discussion!" The reader may imagine the mortification of the preachers, and the smiles of the audience.

THE WAY TO ENJOY A NEWSPAPER.

Br. GOSH—You know some men, when beginning to be advanced in years, are not only very fond of hearing, but also sometimes quite fond of telling stories. One has lately come into my mind which, considering "matters and things" as they now stand, it may not be improper to relate to you.

"When I was young," (as old men are apt to begin,) I was engaged in teaching school in the neighborhood of Deacon George B. The deacon was a member of the Baptist church, and much respected by his brethren. Unlike too many Baptists of the present day, he was a very charitable man. If one of his neighbors, whether a professor or not, had done wrong, the Deacon would say, "The tempter happened to come across him in an evil hour;" or, "that was his weak side; but, on the whole, he is a very good man." Once on his return from a conference meeting, where the hearts of those present happened to be more warmed with the fire of love than that of endless misery, the deacon said to me—"Sometimes when I get to thinking of the goodness of God to poor frail man, I almost believe the period may yet arrive when our blessed Heavenly Father will bring all in; and O, if the last soul should come in, what a shouting there would then be among the angelic hosts!" But I must be in haste.

I was boarding with Deacon B. His wife, one of the old fashioned, neat, kind-hearted women, after washing and putting away all the supper dishes, came and placed a stand between the deacon and myself, with a candle and newspaper upon it. It was in the time of the last war, and the paper was the old Columbian Gazette, published in Utica by Thomas Walker, of Republican memory. The deacon sat for a short time without speaking, and his face grew longer and longer. At length he rose, and taking the paper, placed it in a little book case over the fire; sat down again, and began to converse as usual. Every drop of my blood, as well as the deacon's, being Republican, and the news very interesting in those days, I was much vexed at his conduct. I sat in silence, but the wife exclaimed—"Why George! Why don't you read the paper? Have you lost all your love for your country? Don't you care what the news is? This is the third paper you have served just so!" "Neither of these, my love," said the deacon, "but the paper is not paid for—it is not mine! My conscience will never suffer me to read a paper in peace, that is not paid for, while perhaps the publisher is racking his brains a thousand ways, and put to his very wit's ends to obtain paper to print the next on. And I must say, Mary, that I envy neither the head nor the heart, nor the conscience of that man, (if he can be called a man,) who can read a paper from month to month, and perhaps from year to year, without paying for it. It is nothing but fashionable poaching at best, and none the less criminal because fashionable. The hardest trial I have to encounter now a days, is to commune with Brother M****, who is now reading his paper the second year on credit." "Bless your honest old soul," said the wife, "if that is the reason, you may read quick as you please; I paid for your paper this afternoon! I sold some butter to day, and while the money was yet in my hand, the post rider called; I thought I could not do better with it than to pay for my husband's paper."

A tear trembled in the deacon's eye. "I have," said he, "many times blessed God for so good a wife." He took down the papers, and, taking turns, we read aloud till the clock struck twelve.

Now, Brother Gosh, I am in this respect much of the opinion of Deacon B., and must say as he did, that I envy not the head, heart or conscience of that man, (especially of that Universalist,) who can read a paper from year to year without paying for it, when he knows the publisher is in great want.

GENEROSITY.

What trait is there in the human character so necessary to the promotion of individual and social happiness, as generosity? And yet how often is the generous soul suffered to faint and droop for the want of sympathy, or become changed to gall and wormwood, by being taken advantage of by the selfish and unfeeling?

This is not as it should be. We all stand in need of its heavenly influence, and he who would ridicule or take advantage of it in a fellow being, but plunges a dagger into his own bosom. Society may be compared to an expansive lake supplied by ten thousand little rills from every direction; as is the water in these rills, such will be the body, and he who would aid to corrupt one of them, but poisons the body of which he is a part, and must feel the blighting effects.

We all admire a kind, generous hearted friend, yet how many there are who have trampled on such feelings, until they bring a continual frown on the once open brow, and turn to stoics and misanthropes those who, with different treatment, would have been ornaments to the domestic and social circle! Such instances frequently happen, and those who desire, on earth, a foretaste of those heavenly joys where all is peace and serenity, should be particularly careful to cherish all the good feelings which their fellow beings possess.

Let true generosity take the place of the low grovelling selfishness and false pride that is at present so fashionable in the world, and what a happy change would appear in society! The silken robe of charity would cover ten thousand faults that our selfish feelings now magnify into mountains, and the strong ties of friendship would link our souls into one bond cemented by the purest of fraternal affections.

But how can all this change be effected? Why 'tis the easiest thing in the world. Let us cherish every generous feeling in our own breasts, and encourage the same feelings in others, and thus purifying the rills, the whole body will become pure.

OBITUARY.

Died, in the village of Champion, Jefferson county, on the evening of Monday, March 2d, 1840, a Protracted Meeting, after an illness of only two weeks. It would undoubtedly be quite a curious operation to give a carefully detailed account of the various stages of the disease, which put a period to the existence of this meeting; but inasmuch as I am unacquainted with the medical phrases and technical expressions "in such cases made and provided," I shall leave this task to some one else.

During the progress of the fatal disorder, there were many plain indications of insanity. In fact, I have been credibly informed, that during most of the time, both day and night, before its dissolution, it was in a complete state of "distraction." It was evidently a species of religious insanity, for there were times when nothing could be heard but groans, and shrieks, and cries—unmeaning expressions about the "wrath of an angry God"—the "awful horrors of an endless hell"—the "winding sheet of God's wrath," etc. Whether this last mentioned "sheet," is especially prepared for hiding the nakedness of "impenitent sinners," at the great and awful day of accounts, I have not as yet been informed. It is however, I am confident, an article entirely of modern invention. Presume the "rich man in hell" never heard of one!

We do not often allow ourselves to express joy at that which causes our fellow beings sorrow—but without meaning any disrespect to his numerous relatives, we beg leave to say, that we are sincerely glad to hear of the death of our noisy neighbor, "Protracted Meeting."

DEDICATION.

Br. GOSH—I have the pleasure of announcing to you the onward progress of illimitable grace in this county. Our friends at Schuyler's Lake have, with the Freewill Baptists and Methodists, erected a union house of stone, 48 by 38 feet, surmounted by a steeple, and finished in a plain but neat and convenient manner. The house was dedicated on the 18th of March, in the following order. 1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading select portions of Scripture, by Elder Hunt, (Baptist.) 3. Dedicatory prayer, by Rev. Mr. Bristol, (Methodist.) 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon by Elder Hunt. 6. Concluding prayer and Benediction by the same. Afternoon services—prayer by Br. Belding; sermon by Br. J. Potter, (Universalist,) followed by a sermon by Rev. Mr. Bristol—concluding prayer by Rev. Mr. Soule, (Methodist.) Notwithstanding the travelling was bad, yet the house was filled almost to suffocation, forenoon and afternoon, and from one hundred and fifty to two hundred were unable to gain admittance in the former and latter services, which were listened to with deep interest; and we trust the season will long be remembered, with profit, and to the upbuilding and spread of the truth in that portion of the Redeemer's heritage.

Cooperstown, March, 1840.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. VII.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"Now is the judgment of this world.""For judgment am I come into this world.""Whose judgment now for a long time lingereth not."

Another doctrine almost universally received in the Christian world, and which I deem erroneous, is, that the resurrection is to be attended with what is usually termed "the general judgment"—that one chief circumstance respecting the resurrection, is, that by means of it, all our race, from Adam to the last of his posterity, are to be assembled together, for the purpose of being severally adjudged either to happiness or to misery. Some few of the many reasons which, in my mind, lie against the doctrine, I shall here give, as follows:

1. In the last sixteen verses of the 25th chapter of Matthew, wherein is given by far the most extended account which the Bible contains of what is commonly called the last or final judgment, not one word is said, or even intimated, that the judgment there described, is to be attendant on the resurrection. On the contrary, the time of the judgment is set forth to be at the occurrence of quite another event, namely, the coming of the Son of man in his glory; which coming of our Lord, with its accompanying events, he had himself declared, but a few minutes before, in the 24th chapter, should happen in that generation. See also Matt. xvi: 27, 28, where we read, "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

2. In the 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians, which, as I have remarked in a previous number, is a professed dissertation on the subject of the resurrection, by an inspired apostle, who declares that he received his doctrine by a revelation from Jesus Christ, it is not once said, or even hinted, that the resurrection is to be accompanied or followed by a general judgment, in the ordinary sense of that expression. And this omission is not because the apostle forbears to speak respecting the final destiny of our race, for this destiny he sets forth in the clearest manner.

It should be observed, here, that there are mentioned in the Scriptures, two different comings of Christ, over and above his first appearance in the world; and these at very different periods, and widely distant from each other. The one was to be at the close of the Jewish age or dispensation, about 40 years after his crucifixion; the other at the close of the Christian age, or as Paul would express it, at "the end" of the Saviour's reign, which period it is superfluous to observe, is still future. In connection with the former of these comings, the judgment is often mentioned, but never the resurrection, at least in a literal sense; in connection with the latter, the resurrection is usually mentioned, but never the judgment. The passages in John 5th and Rev. 20th, which speak of two resurrections, have indeed a judgment connected with them; but as we have seen in the last two numbers, that neither of these resurrections is a rising to immortality, so we may now see that the judgment mentioned in John, and described in Revelation, belongs to this world. We say then,

3. In all the scriptures, the resurrection and the judgment are not in any instance that I know of, described as accompanying events. But if they really are to happen simultaneously, would not some of the scripture writers have mentioned the fact?

There is a passage in John xii: 48, which may probably be thought to teach the contrary of this last statement, as our Lord there says, "He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." Here, by assuming that "the last day" is the time when all our race shall have put on immortality, it does certainly seem as if the text teaches the common doctrine respecting the judgment. But if by the last day, as here used, we understand the close of the Jewish age, at which time there certainly was to be a judgment, the whole aspect of the passage is changed. And now observe. On the day of Pentecost, when the apostles had received the gift of tongues, Peter declared respecting it, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, 'And it shall come to pass in the last days,' said God, 'I will pour out of my Spirit' etc. In Hebrews, first two verses, we are told that "God . . . hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." At the last day and in the last days, are indeed somewhat different expressions; and it is freely admitted that there is a slight difference in their meaning. Thus, "In the last days," signifies near the close of the Jewish age; but "At the last day," means at its close. Jesus appeared near the close of the Jewish age, or in the last days of it, and spoke the word which at the close of that age, or at the last day of the same, was to judge or condemn those who rejected him.

It may also be thought that the statement referred to in the commencement of the last paragraph, is incorrect, seeing that in Heb. vi: 2, the apostle speaks, in the same verse, respecting the "resurrection of the dead, and of [as our translators make him say] eternal judgment." But it should be observed here, that the apostle does not speak of these in the character of events, to happen together, or near each other; but he places them together merely as portions of Christian doctrine, or as some of what he calls "the principles of the doctrine of Christ." We say some of the principles, for he also speaks of "repentance from dead works, and of faith towards God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands." And the fact that the doctrine of judgment and the doctrine of the resurrection are mentioned together, no more proves that people are to be judged at the resurrection, than the fact that those other points of doctrine are mentioned, proves that men will repent, and believe, and be baptized, etc., at that time.

The phrase "eternal judgment," being a manifest solecism, is evidently a mistranslation. No intelligent writer would be likely to put forth such an expression as his own. In a translation, however, an author is sometimes made to use strange expressions, from the fact that the translator follows some rule which is imperfect. The word eternal properly signifies "without beginning or end;" how then, can it be properly applied to judgment, even though it should be taken in only the latter half of its signification? Let the reader then understand that the word which the apostle here uses, and which the translators of King James's version render eternal, is an adjective derived from a Greek noun, which noun, as is agreed on all hands, sometimes signifies an age; hence it can not but be evident that the adjective may mean of the age, or pertaining to the age; which idea, can not, in English, be expressed by a single word, we having no adjective derived from age in this sense, as the word agical, which was suggested some years ago, though legitimately formed, has never become current, owing probably to the fact that it happened to be coined at an unpopular mint.

I consider, then, that the judgment which the apostle had in his mind when writing Heb. vi: 2, was that which was to happen at the close of the Jewish age, when Jesus was to come in his glory, concerning which coming, it is said in this same epistle, "For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." Heb. x: 37. Note. The epistle to the Hebrews was written but "a little while" before the destruction of Jerusalem. The same may be said of the epistle of James, in which it is declared that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." And in view of this, it is added, in the next verse, "Behold the JUDGE standeth before the door."

There is one passage more which, in the absence of stronger proof, is sometimes adduced to show that the judgment is all future, and is to follow the resurrection. In Acts xvii: 31, we read that God "hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." Here, we are sometimes gravely told, that the judgment of the world is set forth as connected with the resurrection from the dead. But how connected? Why the fact of Christ's resurrection gives assurance to all, that by him God will judge the world. But when? Answer, in that day which he hath appointed. But does the passage teach that that day will not come till all shall be raised from the dead? Not it, nor any thing like it. And the contrary was taught by our Lord in the days of his mortality. He then said, "Now is the judgment of this world." John xiii: 31.

An apostle testifies that "the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." And Jesus himself says, "I came . . . to save the world." Yet we know that the world is not yet saved, hence that in some sense this salvation is yet future. The evangelical prophet, so called, mentions a time, in which he says that the Lord "will swallow up death in victory," which "saying," Paul instructs us, "shall be brought to pass" at the consummation of the resurrection. He then adds, "And it shall be said in that day, Lo this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us." Isa. xlv: 8, 9. But we are not hence to conclude that the work of salvation is not now going on; for aside from the experience of every true Christian, St. Paul has said, "Now is the day of salvation." And Christian teachers from that time to the present, have applied this text each to his own age, and still no one doubts that even now is the day of salvation. So God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world by Jesus Christ; and yet it was true 1800 years ago, and we think is still as true as ever, that now is the judgment of this world. We thus conclude that judgment is progressing, and that the day mentioned in Acts xvii: 31, is the whole period of Messiah's reign.

We close this number with the following general remarks.

1. The words judgment, and to judge, are used in a great variety of senses, some of which are the following:—punishment, condemnation, judicial decision, the act of ruling; to punish, to condemn, to decide upon, to rule.

2. In some passages the judgment is general, as in the passage from Acts, just considered. In others, the judgment relates to a particular event, as in those which speak of Christ's coming. See particularly, Matt. xvi: 27, 28. See, also, Gen. xv: 14, and Acts vii: 7, where we are told that the Lord informed Abraham respecting the future bondage and affliction of his posterity in Egypt, and added, "And also that nation whom they shall serve, will I judge, and afterward shall they come out," etc.

3. As to judge, in the Scriptures, sometimes signifies to rule or govern, the first rulers of Israel being called judges, who are said respectively to have judged Israel each his own term of years, it may probably be true that in this sense the judgment and the resurrection are connected; since Christ is not to deliver up his kingdom to God until mankind universally are raised from the dead. More, perhaps, on this last particular, in some future number.

ANECDOTE NO. II.

BY REV. N. BROWN.

A few months since the following conversation in substance took place between a Universalist and a Presbyterian. The Presbyterian accused the Universalist of advocating a licentious doctrine—no punishment for sin, etc. The Universalist promptly denied the charge as follows:

U. I believe, Sir, as the Bible teaches, that though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished; that God "will by no means clear the guilty," that the guilty shall positively receive "just recompense of reward."

P. Ah, but you held that this recompense is to be received here, in this world, when the Bible says it is to be received in eternity.

U. I deny, Sir, that the Bible says any such thing. Now if the Bible says that the righteous and the wicked shall be recompensed in eternity, I am bound to admit the evidence, but if on the contrary it says, they shall be recompensed in this world, you will be willing to admit that evidence will you not?

P. O certainly; but I don't believe the wicked are recompensed in any way in this world; this is only a probationary state. You have no Bible evidence for your strange and licentious doctrine of a recompense in this life.

U. Listen to the language of Solomon, a wiser man than either you or I. "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner. Prov. ii: 33.

P. [Makes a long pause and seems much confused.] Well—well—I believe that in Solomon's times—or rather in the Old Testament times—under the old dispensation, the wicked were recompensed in this life; but Christ you know introduced a new dispensation; since the old one has passed away, the wicked are recompensed in a future world!

U. According to your theory, our Saviour, instead of bringing "life and immortality to light," brought damnation—endless damnation to light in a future world! Was this Sir, the new and better covenant? Do you think that the doctrine of future endless recompense—endless misery—is a better doctrine than that taught by Solomon? Was this the more excellent ministry spoken of by Paul?

P. Good day, Sir, I will answer your questions some other time. Exit.

A SIMULTANEOUS AND UNIVERSAL RESURRECTION. BY E. R. CROCKER.

"Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." 1 Cor. xv: 51, 52.

I am well aware that a diversity of opinions exists in the Universalist denomination, relative to the subject of the resurrection—some believing it to be of a gradual and progressive nature, and others that it is instantaneous and universal. Many, no doubt, disagree with the writer upon the subject; but still he does not know but that he has as good a right to express his opinions as others, and if his views should be proved false, he does not know that the circumstance will injure him, unless he loves the truth less than error.

As our caption indicates, we favor the doctrine of a simultaneous and universal resurrection. We think—it may be a mistake, an error in judgment—but we think, the Scriptures when consistently and harmoniously interpreted, (though we lay no claim to superior ability in this line,) favor the doctrine above expressed. Take, for instance, the language which heads this article. "We shall not all sleep, [die] but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." How many are to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye? The answer is "all," and the language is Paul's. If the language was, "each shall be changed in a moment, though at different intervals, till all are changed," as I have heard some interpret it, then that would alter the case; and I think in order to make out this case "clear as the sun at unclouded noon day," a little would have to be added to the Word—and then, oh, those "curses," written in "The Book!"

Let us now compare the language of Paul in 1 Cor. xv: 51, with his also in 1 Thess. iv: 14, 15. Cor. "We shall not all sleep"—die. Thess. "For if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so them also, which sleep [are dead] in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you, by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent, [anticipate, or go before] them which are asleep. [dead.] I do not know what this language can mean, unless it is, that some men will be alive on the earth, when the resurrection takes place. What else in reason can it mean? Certainly, the language can not refer to a moral resurrection.

Again, 1 Thess. iv: 16, agrees with 1 Cor. xv: 52, both of which we judge, must have allusion to a literal resurrection of the dead. "For the Lord himself, shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the arch-angel, and with the trump of God." Now Corinthians. "For, the trumpet shall sound." Again Thessalonians, "and the dead in Christ, shall rise first." Now Corinthians. "And the dead shall be raised incorruptible." All agree that the apostle's language in Corinthians, has allusion to the literal resurrection; then certainly, his language to the Thessalonians must have the same construction for what we can see to the contrary.

Again; if we examine the contexts of the above quoted scriptures, it will be seen, we apprehend, that the human family are spoken of as being in two conditions or states. "For this corruptible [those who are dead, and corrupted] must put on incorruption, and this mortal [those who will be alive remaining on the earth] must put on immortality. So when this corruptible, shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, [both classes mentioned again as above,] then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory." 1 Cor. xv. Now turn to 1 Thess. iv. "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain **** shall not prevent [go before] them which are asleep." [dead.]—Again, same chapter, "and the dead in Christ shall rise first." Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them, [i. e. the dead in Christ] in the clouds, [in cohorts, rather,] to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we be ever with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." What! "comfort one another with these words," when, as some tell us, there will be at this time, an eternal separation of the human family? No, the apostle knew nothing about a separation of the human family at this time; these ideas were left for the wiser heads of the "dark ages" to search into, and bring into the world as the spurious offspring of a cruel and corrupted imagination. No. Wherever the literal resurrection is treated upon, in the pages of inspiration, damnation or misery is entirely omitted; "all are made alive in Christ;" and to be "in Christ" we are told, is to be "a new creature;" "old things," such as death, sin, mortality, misery, and all the tormenting and impure things of earth—"are passed away, and—BEHOLD! all things are become new"!!

We remarked that our faith took hold of a future existence for all mankind; in other words, that we believe in a universal resurrection. The doctrine of the destruction of all who die unrepentant, is to be sure, preferable to their unceasing misery in the regions of hopeless anguish; but still it seems reasonable—and we feel fully assured the Scriptures bear us out in the position—that a God all powerful, wise and good, might and will reclaim the ungodly, rather than cast them away to eternal perdition. Most certainly he will adopt the alternative of salvation, so that his creatures may have reason to praise him forever, rather than be compelled to curse their Creator, and their own existence, while they and God exist. Paul says, "there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." Acts xxiv: 15. "Of the just and unjust." Are they to come forth from the tomb as "the just and unjust?" or do these characters attach to them, as they were when they died? Evidently as they were when they died. For unless this be so, the apostle's language contradicts the Saviour's. "But they who shall be accounted worthy [who shall be honored," new translation,] to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx: 35, 36. Well then, since there will be a resurrection "both of the just and unjust," (there can be no more than these; all are just or unjust,) and as they are to be "equal to the angels"—"children of God, being the children of the resurrection," therefore the resurrection is universal. And we believe it was before proved that the resurrection is to be instantaneous, and when some will be alive on the earth.

While man exists on the earth subject to imperfection, one generation succeeding another, it is more than probable, unless miracles are wrought and human nature thereby changed, that sin will continue, and while sin lives and breathes, misery will be brought forth, and universal salvation only in theory exist.

"But," says the reader, "serious difficulties exist in the doctrine you have advanced." Well, what if it is so? I can not help it. Is it (the doctrine advanced above) supported by revelation? That in our opinion should be the first question to be settled? What has God said through his Word? Almost any man could shape a theory to suit himself upon this head; yet perhaps he might desire to "revise" and "correct" his theory, as he saw in after time, the demands of the public taste, to lean this way or that, as their ever-restless, and never-satisfied fancies are exceedingly apt to do. For one I had rather trust to the wisdom and goodness of God to do as seemeth him good.

WHERE DOES IT LEAD TO?

A traveller entering on an unknown road, very naturally makes the above inquiry of any person he may chance to meet, and stranger as his informant is, if informed that the road ends in a desert or a mire, he will pause, if not turn back, to seek a more promising route. This is the dictate of common sense—of a prudence few are devoid of, and none presume to ridicule in its possessor.

Yet how differently most men act in moral and religious concerns! They will not altogether disregard the voice of experience, nor weigh lightly the information of a stranger, concerning whose veracity they know nothing, when given against their pursuit of a road that is leading them to a disagreeable termination; but they will pursue a course in morals or religion, against which conscience utters her warning entreaties, and which affectionate friends are beseeching him to abandon. Why is this? Why is the man prudent in all worldly affairs, so foolish, so reckless in what pertains to his greater and more important interests? Can any one answer? Allow all that you can to the influence of a fallen nature and a depraved constitution, still, utter selfishness, the principal characteristic of wickedness, would seem to forbid such a disregard of his own welfare as is thus manifested. Besides, the depravity is not total, so long as conscience continues faithful; nor reason utterly corrupted, so long as it truly declares his course to be contrary to wisdom. Nor can I allow false teachings to be always in fault; for frequently are those who are theoretically correct, practically wrong. And yet, in many such cases, it must be that the theory is only nominal, not real—that it is viewed as an abstract tion, and not brought down and applied to the active business of life. In such cases, an early error, banished from the understanding, must have seized on the heart with the death grapple of a drowning man, and so drag down the feelings into the abyss, from whence the head is, all the time, devising some mode of escape. The song of the serpent—of the carnal mind, continually varying its disguises so as to elude the detection of its frequently deceived victim—must still gain the credence of the feelings, even though the mind utters its decided negative, and “thou shalt not surely die” becomes the meteor glare, that leads astray, until sunk in mire, or lost in desert wild, the unhappy wanderer finds too late that it shone only to deceive, and lured but to betray.

Let us then consider whether we may not form within us some principle or habit of unsleeping vigilance, which shall lead us timously to ask the question, “Where does it lead to?” when any strong impulse points out a path for us to walk in, away from the plain road of virtue and integrity. And, to assail the tempter in his strongest hold, let us look his unblushing falsehood directly in the face. “Thou shalt not surely die.” Cunningly expressed, yet full contradiction of the divine assertion, “Thou shalt surely die.” If but the absolute certainty of consequences can be shaken in the mind, the wily tempter well knows that strong desire will begot hope, and hope will grow into an almost assurance of escape. “Thou shalt not die,” would be too great a step to be made at once—it would assault the well-built citadel of confidence in the assertion of God and conscience, and the inevitable rebound would be fatal to success. But “thou shalt not surely die,” cautiously disarms outright and immediate resistance—undermines the wall it can not batter down—insinuates itself by degrees into the very citadel—and then, like the wooden horse in ancient Troy, when all seems security, and even triumph, the lie disgorges its inherent powers, and the whole fortress is manned by the enemy.

Depend upon it, this is the process by which the strongly virtuous have so often been deceived and conquered—by which the pure became corrupt, and the elevated were cast down and ruined. And scarcely a day passes, that the seducer does not look in upon us, and see whether the time has not come when he may whisper, “ye shall not surely die,” with a prospect of being believed. It becomes us, then, as wise and prudent persons—as persons awake to a sense of our own interests, ever to be on our guard—to exert some lively, ever active principle, which shall lead us to ask, “Where does it lead to?”

THE LIMITATION OF SIN.

After all that has been said and done about man's social and political conditions, in various ages of the world, about his gradual advancement from barbarism, to civilization, and from civilization to refinement; about the causes which have promoted that advancement, and the obstacles which have kept, and are still keeping it back from the lofty height to which it might have attained, we can not deny that the public estimation has been too often formed upon a superficial view of the subject. And yet, superficial as the view may be, we can not see how it can be maintained that any portion of the evil of this world will be evil in a series of eternally continued consequences. Morally speaking, such a theory is not consistent with facts. In spite of all the obstacles, man has advanced in goodness just in proportion as the truth has been made to bear upon his condition. And if in the application of truth to the vices of one condition, the increase of general knowledge affords him facilities which he did not previously possess, for the perpetration of vices which were unknown to him before, yet the truth is also a correction of these, and will exterminate them as soon as man sees them by its light, and man is in the mean time taking a step upward to holiness. Thus; the Pagan may worship his wooden god with a zeal and a fervor that would do honor to a Christian worshipper bowing at the altar of eternal love. But a Saul of Tarsus, with his knowledge of the true God, as imperfect as it was, would have found it impossible to worship stocks and stones. He might have been the advocate of a partial creed; he might have hated and persecuted those who did not worship with the same form that he did; he might even have venerated that form, the symbolical beauties and the typical virtues of which, never entered the thoughts, or came within the comprehension of the poor ignorant Hindoo who prostrates himself before the car of Jugger-naut, but he venerates his form of worship with a better understanding and with less servility. The light of truth has given him a higher object for his worship and a holier purpose in his devotions. And though he may venerate the mode to an extent that renders it pernicious, he has not that deep motive of abject fear, he has not that unthinking devotion to it which characterizes the idolator. His mind has been lifted upward toward holy worship, and it will be impossible to bow his moral powers to dagon, or compel him to do reverence to the Heathen's god. Why is it? The reason is, that though the truth may not yet have placed him beyond the reach of folly, it has given him knowledge of a higher object to worship, and imparted holier motives for the service; and when that truth comes to bear upon his present manner of worship, the converted Paul will be prepared to worship in spirit, thinking as little of the previous ceremonies, as Saul of Tarsus did of the ancient gods of the Amorites.

It is certain, then, that every impression which the truth of God makes upon the human understanding, destroys some error, and eradicates some vice—while there is vice connected with it—and leaves the man better. We know that the mind sometimes abandons one error to take up its opposite. But the same truth which drove it from skepticism, for instance, will if faithfully attended to, dissipate its bigotry, and cause it to settle down upon the strong foundation of consistent faith and Christian integrity. None but a very weak mind will travel over the ground of opposite extremes twice—clinging to both it can not.

The advance of mankind, then, in knowledge and consistency demonstrates not only the power and utility of moral science upon the condition of the human family, but the fact also, that mind is not capacious enough to retain, at once, all and severally, the vices and errors which have been in the world. When one is embraced, another is abandoned, and we have seen that, on the whole, the embracing of one, to the abandonment of another which truth teaches us is wrong, is an advance movement, the latter situation being less heinous than the former. This we mean, when an understanding of the truth, partial or limited though it may be, is concerned in producing the change. We say, then, that the human mind is not capacious enough to harbor, at once, all the evil that has disgraced the world of mankind. And yet we are confident that if the evil of this world is to be eternally evil in its consequences, we might justly look to one individual for an accumulation of all the iniquity which the different ages of the world have felt, or different minds have indulged in. One individual, in the process of time, and under the perpetual influences of sin, eternally accumulating in enormity, might arise, who would be skeptical and idolatrous, bigoted and stoical, vacillating and stubborn, relentless and effeminate, meddling and inactive. The impossibility of the one proves the untruth of the other.

A. R. B.

VALUE OF OUR FAITH.

I am fully satisfied, my Universalist brethren and sisters, that we do not sufficiently value—that we do not adequately appreciate the faith we profess—that we lose sight of its great advantages, its superior enjoyments, and of the incalculable privileges it confers on us every moment of our lives. Like the pure healthy air we breathe every minute, and which refreshes our lungs, reddens our vital blood, and sends it coursing anew through our frames, filling them with warmth, and life, and sweet enjoyment—so is our freedom from the spirit of fear and bondage, a blessing so constant and so common, that we forget to thank God for it—yea, we even forget that we possess it. Hence it is, that so many Universalists, educated in that faith, or by long continuance in it, forgetful of the early joys it yielded, have become joyless, indifferent, cold and careless respecting its teachings, its sanctuary services, and its spread among others. But the true, the lively believer in God's impartial grace and salvation can not be thus cold and cheerless. He must see the Giver in all the gifts he receives, and recognize that Giver as the all-affectionate and lovely Father of all spirits.

You all know what it is to value a gift for the giver's sake. Let but the departing parent bequeath a ring, a portrait, or a mere ribbon as a token of his love to a child, and oh, how will that dear, dear gift be regarded and cherished. Though in itself a trifle scarcely worth the trouble of picking up in the streets, yet as the gift the sacred memento of a dear parent's love and goodness, it will be invaluable and sacred to the child—it will be looked on in privacy with a swelling heart and a moistened eye, and kissed with a trembling lip whenever it brings up the dear giver before the mind. Thus should—thus frequently will the true Universalist see God in his gifts—gifts most precious in themselves, but oh, how incalculably dear to the soul when recognized as mementoes of a heavenly Father's wisdom, providence and love!

Take your faith of universal and endless goodness, then—take your cheering views of your Father's character and government, and, as a visual medium look at creation through them—see God in all his works and providences—and do they not appear to you touchingly and inexpressibly great, and grand, and bright, and beautiful, and good? Every where you hear benign and loving sounds—every where pleasing harmonies and agreeable contrasts in colors, meet your eyes—every where the beamings of love touch your hearts with warmth—and every where displayed wisdom wakes your understanding to lively exercise in accordance with the purest emotions of your souls. Seeing the Giver in the gifts, the air becomes more balmy, the sunshine more glorious, the waters more bright, the earth more fair, and the heaven's more majestic and beautiful. All that is harsh and grating, is resolved into the general harmony as a mere occasional discord—all that is glaring, is blended in with the general softness of the bright and beautiful—and all that is evil, is seen but as the produce or the heightener of the succeeding good to which it must ultimately give place.

And thus, as seasons roll around, and years follow years, God is seen in all works and events, “from seeming evil still educing good”; until the full heart, glowing with love, and gladness, and praise, feel, that, indeed, “the rolling year,” the swelling tide of events, the vast universe itself, is full of God. A. B. G.

THE SERMON.

It is due to all concerned, to say, that the sermon by Br. Barry, which we publish to-day, was noticed by us on its reception, and promised a place as soon as we could find room for it consistently with prior engagements. We heard no dissatisfaction expressed by the author, and received no orders to pursue any different course. After we had prepared it for the press, and a great part was in type, we learned that Br. Barry had sent a copy to the Union, (which we do not receive in exchange, Br. Price sending us the Messenger,) and that the sermon was published in that paper some time since! We regret this publication of a sermon as original in two different papers, especially when it subjected the author to the labor of writing out two copies, two publishers, each, to postage, (and ours was a little extra,) to the labor of preparing the copy for press, and to setting up the type from manuscript, (whereas one could have had printed copy,) as well as subjecting the one publishing it last, to the risk of being accused of giving as original what had already appeared in the other's paper! Had Br. Barry but said that he did not approve of our necessary delay, and ordered us to send the sermon to Br. Price, we would at once have done so—and cheerfully—for we now give it place, to the exclusion of some waiting articles which our readers who also read the Union, would sooner see. Again, therefore, do I say that I regret the circumstance, and hope that a similar one will not again occur. If we are favored with an article which has been already published, or has been sent at the same time to a brother publisher, we wish to know that fact, and hope our correspondents will so far oblige us as to inform us of it, and so save us and others some disagreeable feelings.

It is but just, also, for me to say, that we do not believe Br. Barry intended any offence or injury to any one by what he has done in the matter—I therefore notice it only as an apology to Br. Price for calling it original in this paper, and as an occasion for caution to others who might thus inconsiderately take and give where single trouble will answer far better. A. B. G.

"Double, double toil and trouble,"

MORAL PRINCIPLE.

God is the source and fountain of all power and all true excellence. But when we descend from the fountain and look for the most important power which is delegated to man, we shall find it identified with his moral existence. Intellect may point out to him the joy and the brightness and the beauty which lie in his prospective pathway, but moral principle must give energy or he faints by the way. Moral principle resists the temptation that would lead astray. Moral principle finds proper employment for the attainments of the intellect. It approves the integrity of the righteous, and condemns the sacrifice of licentiousness. It sweetens the toils of the present, and smiles upon the hopes of the future. He therefore, who is a slave to vice, deserves not even the name of a freeman, for the best part of the man is in bondage. He who debases his moral powers, lives only in imagination—himself is dead. A. R. B.

A NEW PERIODICAL.

We feel some reluctance in asking support for another periodical in these hard times; but having contemplated it for a year, and been frequently urged to undertake it, we make our proposals, and if the public do not feel able and willing to accept them, "there is no harm done." But as there is really a want in our denomination which this work will supply, and as we ask only 650 good subscribers to insure success, we believe the proposals will be accepted, and the work go on.

Hear then, why it is started. Our preachers are frequently urged to preach sermons which particularly pleased their hearers. I have a number, the publication of which has thus been requested. But neither editors nor readers of our weekly papers desire them occupied with so many sermons, to the exclusion of shorter articles. Consequently, those who desire to see these sermons in print, frequently can not be gratified for the want of just such a periodical as we propose to publish.

A few words on the style and terms.—It is well known that similar periodicals started in this State, have been printed in very ordinary style, on cheap paper, and the matter transferred from, or into, another paper to lessen the expense—and even then were not completed as promised! Ours, if begun at all, will be completed, and in a style as creditable to the denomination as we can make it. The sermons (except, perhaps, in a very few particular cases) will appear in no other periodical of ours—though we reserve the right of afterwards publishing them in book form, if we think proper. Now, to publish an original work in good style, without loss, we must ask a fair cash price. We have carefully counted the cost and probable support, and fixed our terms accordingly. By adhering to them, neither publishers nor subscribers will run any risk. The one will receive his money's worth within the year, because the other has a certain sufficient support to finish what he begins.

To secure a supply of good sermons, we will allow for each sermon published in the work, (if sent to us free of cost, and well prepared for the press,) six copies of the volume (or if preferred, 75 copies of the number) containing it. If such sermon requires corrections, we shall make what we deem a fair deduction from this compensation. At least one-fourth of the sermons will be from my pen, and if no others can be procured, I will fill one volume with my own, such as they are, sooner than fail in the undertaking. But this threat, none need fear greatly!

And now, after this long apology and explanation, please read the brief prospectus, and if you approve, send us as many good subscribers as you can procure for the work. A. B. G.

N. B.—This new publication will not alter in the least our present plan of publishing sermons in the Magazine and Advocate occasionally—i. e., as we can find room for them. A. B. G.

PROPOSALS

For publishing in Utica, N. Y., a monthly periodical, containing original Universalist Sermons, to be called,

THE UNIVERSALIST PULPIT.

A. B. GROSH, EDITOR.

There is now no such periodical in our denomination. From our inability to publish in the Magazine and Advocate all the sermons we are requested to publish, we know that one is needed. We will strive to supply that want with a variety of original sermons, of the best literary character, (preferring the doctrinal and practical combined, to the controversial) published in a style creditable to all concerned. To do so, we ask 650 subscribers, on the following terms, which must be rigidly adhered to in all cases.

We think we shall be enabled to issue the first number in June next—but to do this, all who want the work must subscribe soon, and pay in advance when notified; for we will not commence until 650 copies are subscribed for, and will then limit the edition to the demand, and will supply paying subscribers only. ☞ None need fear paying on subscribing, for even should the Pulpit not be published, the money will be refunded, or applied as they may order.

Utica, April 3d, 1840.

A. B. & C. C. P. GROSH.

CONDITIONS.—1. The Universalist Pulpit will be published early in each month, on good white paper, with new long primer type, in large 12mo. form, neatly folded and stitched in handsome, printed covers.

2. Each volume will contain at least 26 original sermons, (by adding an extra number with the title page and index at the close of the year,) thus making a volume suitable for binding, of 312 pages per annum.

3. It will be afforded to single subscribers at one dollar per annum;—but when six copies are ordered in one package to be directed to a single address, they will be furnished for five dollars per annum—or thirteen copies for ten dollars per annum—always payable in advance, and all discount and postage to be paid by those ordering the work.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

Rev. Mr. Breckenridge, of Baltimore, has escaped conviction for libel in his late trial, by the disagreement of the jury.

After a season of considerable suspense, Br. Gurley announces that the Sentinel and Star in the West will be continued.

Br. Gerard Bushnell, of Norwich city, Conn., has commenced preaching. He is a man of superior education, good talents and irreproachable character.

Br. Abram Page has removed to West Brattleboro', Vt. Br. J. C. Baldwin from Sharon to Berkshire, Vt. Br. G. Hastings to Swansey village, Mass. Br. F. Hitchcock to Westport, Conn.

The Universalist Society in Albany, has sold pews to the amount of four thousand dollars, since Elder Welsh endorsed Elder Knapp's stories, abuse, and revival conduct. In Baltimore the Elder revived an almost perished Universalist society, and in New York his labors are leading (qr. driving?) many to the Universalist meetings, and thus increasing converts to the truth. Surely, "the wrath of man shall praise thee, and the remainder of wrath thou wilt restrain." So be it, O Lord!

Br. Price will find Elder Knapp's converting dream contradicted in the old Boston Universalist Magazine, told of Br. H. Ballou of Boston, that it converted him and his whole congregation to Partialism! When the Elder told it here, he had a witness ready, who certified to the congregation that he knew a man who had read the story in print, and was acquainted with some of the people who lived in the town—or something as irrelevant to the purpose, but calculated to deceive an excited audience into the belief that it was direct testimony.

A. B. G.

I am rather sorry to see such extensive circulation gravely given to the pretended "death warrant of Jesus Christ." There are marks of improbability, if not of spuriousness, in the document itself. The sentence of death could only be pronounced by a Roman Governor, under the Roman laws; yet the death warrant is said to have been in the Hebrew instead of the Latin language; and to have been sent one copy to each of the Jewish tribes, to whom the Governor was in no wise responsible. Its being engraved on a copper plate, instead of written on parchment, would seem also too great a departure from convenience and common custom, especially where so much haste was made to carry the whole into execution, to gain credence. What new thing will come up next to test the gullibility of editors and readers?—a great toe nail of Isaiah? A. B. G.

An Editor's duties may be ranked as follows—placing the easiest first—to read newspapers—to write editorial—to read well written communications—to make and condense selections—to read proof—and to decipher and prepare for the press articles of some merit, but written in a hand and clothed in a style, which causes him more groans to read and correct, than they will give pleasure to the reader when published. The first and the last cost most time, and yield, probably, the least amount of lasting improvement; for the constant practice of reading many newspapers begets a careless habit of reading, and a distaste for more solid studies—just as constant eating of cakes and candies may cause a distaste for wholesome bread and roast beef!

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

Where'er abroad our eyes we turn,
From all we see, a God we learn.
Each leaf that quivers in the breeze,
Each drop that forms the liquid seas,
The herbs that in the vallies grow,
Each ray that gilds the mountain's brow,
Proclaim a God that reigns above
In glory, in majesty and love.

The murmur'ing and the rippling stream
That in the sun's refreshing beam
So gaily sparkles as it leaps,
And plunges down the rocky steeps,
Thence onward to the ocean rolls,
The being of a God unfolds.

The flow'ry field and shady grove,
The birds that in the blue vault rove,
The lonely lake, that gently sleeps,
Beneath the sky that o'er it weeps;
The vallies clothed in verdure green,
Where scattered flocks are grazing seen;
The woods, the hills, and clouds that drift,
Above the lofty mountains cliff,
With one united voice proclaim,
"There is a God that rules the same."

We read it in the twinkling stars,
In Venus and in fiery Mars;
We see it stamped upon the sun,
And all the worlds that round it run.

Almighty and Eternal God!
We see Thee in the stormy cloud;
We hear Thee in the tempest's blast,
When warring winds are sweeping past;
We see Thee in the lightning's flash,
And hear Thee in the thunder's crash;
We hear Thee when the whirlwinds roar
And billows roll from shore to shore.

"Through earth, and air, and sea, and skies,"
The proofs of God's existence rise;
In blazing letters we may read,
There is a God that rules indeed.

WEALTH AND VIRTUE.

BY THE HON. JOHN SERGEANT.

I appeal only to human judgment, and ask you whether mankind themselves do not accurately discriminate, by a sort of instinct, between wealth and virtue. They honor the virtuous man—they honor the rich man's riches. Should he transfer them to another (as he may do,) he transfers his honor along with them. He will be fortunate if, like Lear, when he had parted with his kingdom, he have one faithful follower to do him reverence. But his virtues—these are inalienable. They are part of himself. If you would prove this instinctive judgment, go stand by the grave, not to moralize, but simply to let your feelings take their natural course. Where are the riches that belonged to its inhabitant? They remain upon earth. Perhaps you may coldly inquire who has got them; but that is all;—you know that they have not gone. Where are his virtues? They quitted the earth when he left it. They have gone down with him into the grave. They accompany him whither he has gone. The blessings they have conferred remain, but the virtues themselves have departed forever; for they were inseparable from him to whom they belonged. This, then, is the judgment of the world itself. No one can stand by a good man's grave without emotion, in which is mingled regret for his loss!

We must ascend still higher, if we would know the full worth of integrity. We must lay aside all other judgments, and each for himself conscientiously consult his own, first endeavoring earnestly to enlighten it. What will it tell him? Man is a portion of eternity; not a fragment, broken off, and thrown upon this earth, here to begin and end; but an abiding portion of eternity. The links which bind him to it he can not break. They are his virtues or his vices. These, with right exertions, he can control. He can not, by any efforts of his own, excel in intellectual power—he can not acquire riches—he can not achieve greatness; therefore he is not accountable for the want of them. But he can be good or bad; and upon this capacity it is that his accountability rests, and according to it is to be his destiny.

TO YOUNG MEN.

There is no moral object so beautiful to me as a conscientious young man. I watch him as I do a star in the heavens; clouds may be before him, but we know his light is behind him, and will beam again; the blaze of other's popularity may outshine him, but we know that though unknown he illumines his own true sphere. He resists temptation, not without a struggle, for that is not virtue; but he does resist and conquer; he hears the sarcasm of the profligate, and it stings him, for that is the trial of virtue, but he heals the wound with his own pure touch. He heeds not the watchword of fashion if it leads him to sin; the atheist, who says not only in his heart but always with his lips, "there is no God!" controls him not; he sees the hand of a creating God, and rejoices in it. Woman is sheltered by fond arms and loving counsel, old age is protected by its experience, and manhood by its strength, but the young man stands amid the temptations of the world, like a self-balanced tower; happy he who gains the prop of morality. Onward, then, conscientious youth—raise thy standard and nerve thyself for goodness. If God has given thee intellectual power, awaken it in that cause; never let it be said of thee, "he helped swell the tide of sin, by pouring his influence into its channels." If thou art feeble in mental strength, throw not that drop into a polluted current. Awake, arise, young man! assume the beautiful garb of virtue. It is fearfully easy to sin; it is difficult to be pure and holy. Put on thy strength, then! let thy chivalry be roused against error! Let Truth be the lady of thy love—defend her.

NO WORK AFTER SUPPER.—Do you remember the anecdote I once told you of the great Miss G——, who undertook the management of some of her land? She thought herself clever enough to manage John Chawbacon and the rest of them!—so one day she stood by when John was at his dinner—and he did not make the worse dinner for that. Now, knowing John's stomach, as he was rising to his work, she said, "John, it would save time of coming and going if you would sit down again and take your supper." "No objection in the world," said John, and down he sits and instant despatches another pound or two, and drink in proportion, ending with her ladyship's health and many thanks. "Now, then, John," quoth the lady Bountiful, "you may go to your work." "Work, madam!" said John, with a grin, "I never works after supper," and so he threw himself down and in three minutes snored like a pig. Blackwood.

EFFECTS OF LAUGHTER ON HEALTH.—"Laughter, says Hufeland, is one of the greatest helps to digestion with which I am acquainted; and the custom prevalent among our forefathers of exciting it at the table by jesters and buffoons, was founded on true medical principles. In a word, endeavor to have cheerful and merry companions at your meals; what nourishment one receives amidst mirth and jollity will produce good and light blood.—Curtis.

CROUP.—Cut onions into thin slices; between and over them put brown sugar—when the sugar is dissolved, a teaspoonful of the syrup will produce almost instantaneous relief. This simple and effectual remedy for this distressing malady should be known to all having the care of small children.

We have known the most happy results from the above remedy through many years. Where great haste is required, as is often the case in this "distressing malady," the process may be expedited by strong pressure, bruising, and squeezing through a cloth;—the syrup can be produced in a very few minutes.—Ed. Gos. Mess.

Sorrow, says Johnson, is a rust of the soul, such as every new idea by which it is traversed, contributes in its passage to scour away.

MARRIAGES.

In Forrestville, March 2d, Mr. HENRY RUMRILL, to Miss AUGUSTA E. CUMMINGS, both of Buffalo.

June 23d, 1839, by Rev. J. S. Flagler, Mr. FRANCIS M. STONE, to Miss CAROLINE CARTER, both of Darien. By the same, November 13th, 1839, Mr. LUTHER STODLEY, of Byron, to Miss LUCY ANN MAIN, of Bennington.

By Rev. S. A. Skeele, February 6th, Gen. WILLIAM C. TANNER, of Ridgeway, Orleans county, to Miss JULIA ANN, daughter of Rev. J. S. Flagler, of Darien.

In Minden, February 20th, by Rev. H. B. Soule, Mr. JAMES G. SNYDER, of Starkville, to Miss PEGGY HOKE, of the former place.

In New-Hartford, March 25th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. ELIAS BREWSTER, of Richfield, Otsego county, to Miss CORDELIA E., daughter of James Crandel, of Brookfield, Madison county.

DEATHS.

In New-Hartford, March 4th, infant son of Sylvester B. and Patty Butler, aged 3 months. The consultations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners and neighbors, in a very feeling and appropriate manner, by Rev. Mr. Searles. C. M.

In Lassellsville, March 13th, of scarlet fever, ALBERT, youngest son of Daniel and Emeline J. Lassells, aged two years. Funeral on the 15th, and sermon by the writer. J. D. Hicks.

In this city, on the 7th inst., MAURICE THOMAS, son of Thomas M. and Sarah Owens, aged 1 year, 6 months, and 5 days.

"Cease here longer to detain me,
Fondest mother, drowned in woe;
Now thy kind caresses pain me;
Morn advances—let me go.

"See you orient streak appearing!
Harbinger of endless day:
Hark! a voice sad nature cheering,
Calls my new-born soul away!

"Lately launched, a trembling stranger,
On the world's wide boisterous flood,
Pierced with sorrows, tossed with danger,
Gladly I return to God.

"Now my cries will cease to grieve thee,
Now my trembling heart finds rest—
Kinder arms than thine receive me,
Softer pillow than thy breast."

UNIVERSALIST'S GUIDE.

To be published by subscription, a work entitled THE UNIVERSALIST'S GUIDE—by Thomas Whittemore. This work will consist of at least 460 pages, and will be handsomely bound; and it will be furnished to subscribers at the low price of ONE DOLLAR per copy.

The object of this work may be inferred from its title. It will be a GUIDE both to Universalists and those who are seeking a knowledge of Universalism.

I. It will show who are Universalists.
II. It will give a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.
III. It will clearly and particularly set forth the sentiments of Universalists.

IV. It will give the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it will be infallibly proved that it is the doctrine of the Bible.

V. It will explain all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of one hundred and thirty, in which all the different subjects will be discussed, whereon light is so much needed—such as the words rendered "hell," the "lake of fire," the "furnace of fire," "unquenchable fire," "everlasting fire," "everlasting destruction," "eternal judgment," "coming forth from the graves to condemnation," the "sin against the Holy Ghost," "day of judgment," "destruction of the soul," "kingdom of heaven," etc., etc., etc., etc.

VI. It will point out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VII. It will furnish a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation of the same; also directions in regard to the formation of Churches.

VIII. It will give Scriptural views of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper.

IX. It will also treat on other subjects, highly interesting to Universalists.

The work will be put to press as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained.

All those friendly to Universalism, who are desirous to see the doctrine better understood by its opponents, and adorned and honored more and more by the exemplary lives of its friends, are requested to use their exertions to obtain subscribers for this work. Any person who is willing to render such aid, can copy this prospectus, and obtain signatures thereto.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION V.

Birth of Jesus.

LUKE II. 1 And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed. 2 (And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.) 3 And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city.

4 And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, in to Judea, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, (because he was of the house and lineage of David.) 5 To be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great with child.

6 And so it was, that while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. 7 And she brought forth her first born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn.

[REMARK.—That the early Christians regarded the Logos as an attribute of the Deity personified, and not the self-existent and eternal God, is plain from numerous quotations that might be made from their writings. I will here introduce one or two, reserving several others for the concluding remarks.

Origen says, that "by the second God, we mean only a virtue or a reason, which comprehends all other reasons, and that this reason (Logos) is particularly attached to the soul of Christ." Contra Celsus, B. 5, p. 259.

Tertullian says, "Before all things God was alone; but not absolutely alone, for he had with him his own reason; since God is a rational being. This reason the Greeks call Logos." See Priestley's "Corruptions."

LUKE I. Cæsar Augustus. He was emperor of Rome when the Saviour was born, and continued so for several years afterwards.

All the world. This may denote either the whole of the Roman Empire, or it may be restricted to the land of Judea. In the former sense it seems to be used in Acts xi: 28, xix: 27, and in the latter in Luke xxi: 26. The same term is applied by Isaiah to the empire of Babylon, ch. xiii: 11, xiv: 17, and to that of Syria, xxiv: 4. It is also used in a similar manner, by Polybius, Plutarch and Josephus. See Parkhurst on the word oikoumene.

2. And this taxing was first made, etc. In this verse there is a chronological difficulty; and several hypotheses have been adopted to remove it. The difficulty is this—Cyrenius was not governor of Syria till ten or twelve years after the birth of the Saviour; whereas this verse, as it now stands in the present version, makes him governor of Syria at the same time that the Saviour was born. The following rendering, adopted and defended by Dr. George Campbell, in his Notes, in loco, best removes the difficulty of any exposition that has ever yet been offered, and is so well sustained as to admit of but little doubt of its correctness. "This first register took effect when Cyrenius was president of Syria." The term here rendered taxing, means a register, containing the names, estates, etc., of such as were liable to be taxed: and the verb rendered to be taxed, in the preceding and following verses, means to be registered.

The decree of Augustus was not designed to secure an immediate tax, but to obtain the register by which the tax could be made out at a subsequent period. This register was obtained at the time of the Saviour's birth, but it did not take effect, that is, the tax was not obtained, till Cyrenius was governor of Syria, some ten or twelve years after the register was made. That ginomai, here rendered was made, may denote to take effect, is proved by several passages, where it must have a similar meaning. For example, Matt. vi: 10. "Thy will be done." That God's will may be recorded at one time, and be done or take effect at a subsequent period is an obvious truth. Matt. v: 18. Our Saviour here affirms that all the law should be fulfilled. Between the giving of the law and its fulfilment hundreds of years elapsed. 1 Cor. xv: 54. Here Paul speaks of a certain saying recorded in Isaiah xxv, that would be fulfilled at the resurrection. In all these instances, ginomai occurs, and must be understood as Dr. Campbell supposes it means in the passage under consideration.

5. To be taxed, read to be registered.

With Mary. It was not necessary that Mary should accompany Joseph to Bethlehem to accomplish the object of his journey; but it was necessary for the fulfilment of a prophecy relating to the birth place of the Saviour. See Micah v: 2.

7. Manger. Read stable; for the word denotes the whole stable, as well as the part called the manger. It is said that the ancient Fathers of the church regarded the place of the Saviour's birth, as a natural cave, and not an artificial stable. The natives of Bethlehem, at the present day point out the place, where, as they affirm, Jesus was born. See Parkhurst on the word phatne.

JOHN I. 1. In the beginning. This expression is itself very indefinite. Sometimes it refers to the beginning of time. Gen. i: 1; Prov. viii: 22. Sometimes to the beginning of the Gospel. John xvi: 4; Acts xi: 15. Sometimes to the beginning of the Jewish dispensation. Isaiah i: 26. And not unfrequently it refers to other things. Some have supposed that the phrase here denotes the beginning of the Gospel; but we prefer the opinion that it relates to the beginning of time, as most in accordance with the connection in which it occurs.

The Word. It is a common opinion that the Word here denotes the Saviour, and hence what is affirmed of the Word is considered as belonging to him—but this we deem to be a mistake. The Word does not properly denote the Saviour; but it more properly represents the Saviour. In some instances, (and the present is one,) it becomes a matter of importance to distinguish between the figure and the thing represented: for though there must necessarily be a resemblance in certain particulars between them, yet it will not do to suppose that all that is affirmed of the one, can be in truth, affirmed of the other. For more on this subject, see concluding remarks.

The Word was with God. It is remarkable that what is here said of the Word is said of Wisdom in Proverbs viii. There wisdom is represented as saying, "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old." "Then I was by him as one brought up with him, and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him."

The Word was God. This seems to denote merely that God is a wise or reasonable being: for the term Logos here rendered Word, means wisdom or reason, as we shall show in our concluding remarks, which the reader will consult. The author of this language, in his epistles several times asserts that God is love, meaning thereby to express, in the strongest possible manner, the benevolence of the divine Being. In the present passage he uses a similar expression to denote the wisdom of God, for according to the form of the original it should read, not the Word was God; but God was the word—or merely God was wisdom.

3. All things were made by him. This, too, is virtually said of wisdom in Prov. iii. "When he prepared the heavens I was there: when he sat a compass upon the face of the deep.—When he established the clouds above: when he strengthened the fountains of the deep. When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment; when he appointed the foundations of the earth." This language seems evidently intended to express the sentiment, that all these works of creation were performed in accordance with wisdom—the same is, of course, true of other works of creation not here specified. All things were made by wisdom, or in accordance with that principle of the Divine nature. By him, is thought by some to denote that "the Word" was the original agent in making all things; but it seems most consistent to regard the Word as the instrument or means by which the work was done. Hence Wisdom says, Prov. viii: 15, "By me kings reign, and princes decree justice;" kings and princes being the original agent and Wisdom the means or instrument.

4. In him was life. Or as Wisdom says, "Whoso findeth me findeth life." The same sentiment is expressed in a great number of places.

The Light. The figure is now changed, and light is used to represent the same thing as the word, in the previous verses. And though the Saviour is represented by both, yet while he is familiarly called "the Word," as though the term were a proper name, he is never in the same manner called the Light, though the latter would be equally proper.

5. The Light shineth in darkness. Jesus represents the Jews as blind, and this was the reason, doubtless, why they could not comprehend the Light when it shined among them. Thatalambano, here rendered comprehend, is however differently understood by some.

9. That was the true light, etc. The Saviour came into the world for the purpose of disclosing to men important truths, and the disclosure was ultimately to be made to all, though at the time the language was spoken, there were many whose eyes were blinded that they could not see or comprehend the Light.

11. He came unto his own. The Saviour came to his own people, the Jews; but they would not acknowledge him as the Messiah.

14. The Word was made flesh. That is, the wisdom of God became manifested in the person of the Saviour.

THE INFERIORITY OF CHRIST.

BY REV. A. C. BARRY.

Christ ever spoke of himself as being inferior to the Father. In discoursing to his disciples concerning the awful and tremendous judgments that were about to be poured out upon the Jewish nation, he says—"But of that day and hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." Again, he said on another occasion to his disciples—"I go unto my Father, for my Father is greater than I." And again he said—"I can of mine own self do nothing; as I hear, I judge, and my judgment is just, because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me."

It is true that Christ was possessed of much power, but it was all given him by his Father. The apostle tells us, that "by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, and that he is before all things, and by him all things consist," and for the very reason, that "it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things to himself, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven." Col. i: 16-20.

It will be seen from this testimony, that the power by which Christ created all things in earth and in heaven, was given him by his Father, and all that fulness by which he was to be enabled to reconcile all things to God.

It was literally true, as he said, that of himself he could do nothing. If he brought up the slumbering dead from the tomb to the light of conscious being, it was by the power of the Father working through him. If he healed the sicknesses and the infirmities of men at a word, it was because he was clothed upon with a divine influence from heaven. If he triumphed over the powers of darkness—over sin, death, and hell, it was because the might of a Father's arm was with him—it was because he was clothed with power from on high—it was because God gave the victory through him, and enabled him to prevail over the enemies of man!

A LICENTIOUS DOCTRINE EXAMINED.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Judging others by myself, I conclude the following may not only prove interesting to many of the readers of your valuable periodical, but be the means of eliciting inquiry on the subject of "Punishment and Forgiveness," the result of which may satisfy the sinner that punishment is the sure reward for crime, and that "God will by no means clear the guilty," and thereby bring into disrepute the Devil's doctrine, "Thou shalt not surely die"—and therefore lead many from sin, the wages of which is death. Sometime about the 16th of January, I learned that a discussion was to take place on the following Saturday eve, (the 18th) in the flouring mill of Messrs. Dubois and Delamatter, in the village of Jefferson, Jackson County, Mich., between the Rev. Mr. Gurney, Presbyterian, and Rev. Mr. Gage, Universalist, on some "Theological point." Accordingly, accompanied by several neighbors, I repaired to the scene of debate. At early candle light a numerous concourse had collected, and more were constantly pressing in, until the building was perfectly crammed with anxiety in the shape of men, women and children, to the number of about 1,000, as computed by good judges. By and by Mr. Gurney entered and took his seat by the table. Soon after, Z. Platt, Esq., was announced as Chairman, and seated himself. Now where is Mr. Gage? asked many. Some answered that he would not come—others, he had no doubt got sick of the bargain, etc., while others affirmed with confidence that he would surely be there, if alive. And the last class spoke the truth, for, about a quarter past six o'clock, Mr. Gage made his appearance, and after much fatigue succeeded in reaching the table. All eyes were now turned to the speakers, with anxiety, amounting almost to impatience, for the onset. After passing salutations, the Chairman arose, called the meeting to order, and said that "in order that all might understand the cause which had called them together, and the object designed by the meeting, he would read the following correspondence, which he then held in his hand, being a letter from Mr. Gage to Mr. Gurney, and Mr. Gurney's answer to it, which were as follows:

Columbia, December 18th, 1839.

MR. GURNEY,

Sir—I listened to your discourse the other evening at the head of "Clark's Lake." Your text, "the wages of sin is death, etc." In your exposition of the attribute of Mercy, I understood you to say that Mercy would pardon when Justice would execute. This, Sir, to me is a new idea, and if tenable, then the doctrine of Universalism is false. I therefore propose that a meeting be appointed at the same school house, on the evening of Saturday previous to the third Sabbath in January next, in which you shall bring forward your proof texts in support of such a sentiment, and if proved, then I agree, and pledge myself, in a public manner to renounce my faith and embrace yours. The question in order to be definite shall stand thus. "Is justly deserved punishment ever remitted, in any case, according to Scripture?" And that there be no chance for cavil, I hereby agree that every violation of God's moral law, justly deserves punishment. After you have produced your proof texts, which need not exceed four or five, or even one will answer, then I will have the privilege to remark upon them and show that they do not prove the point, or else to acknowledge that I have ever been in an error. An answer to this is solicited.

E. GAGE.

ANSWER.

Brooklyn, December 25th, 1839.

MR. GAGE,

Sir—With pleasure I accept the proposition you have made in your communication of the 18th, for the discussion of the doctrine of forgiveness of sin. With slight alterations in the conditions—1st, I will meet you at the school house in Jefferson, the evening you propose. My reasons for preferring this place is simply this. As the discussion is to take place Saturday evening, it will be necessary for me to return the same night, to be prepared for the Sabbath, and therefore it is but reasonable you should meet me half way. 2d. A moderator shall be agreed upon, and it shall be his duty to preserve order, see that the parties do not wander from the question you have proposed; in short, he shall conduct the discussion in a parliamentary manner. 3d. The disputants shall occupy thirty minutes each, alternately, until the discussion close. With deep interest for the welfare of your immortal soul, but far greater for your influence, while engaged (as I believe) in preaching another doctrine than that which Paul preached, and thus exerting an influence that the Apostle said would expose an angel from heaven to the withering curse of Almighty God, I remain your friend and well wisher, and by the grace of God will ever pray that you may turn to God by timely repentance, that you perish not, for "if you die in your sins, where Christ is you can not come."

C. W. GURNEY.

P. S. Should you accept the conditions as altered, you will please inform the bearer.

C. W. G.

Hearing the foregoing correspondence read, was the first intimation that I had of the question in dispute, and I must confess my surprise that a man like Mr. Gurney should consent and agree to discuss the question proposed by Mr. Gage, to wit, the remission of punishment, and then in the start call it (as he did in his letter, as well as debate,) the forgiveness of sin. But so it was; Mr. Gurney arose, having prepared a brief, and being supplied with two bibles, and a kind friend at his right, by the name of Rand, to turn to the proof texts in one bible, while Mr. G. should read from the other, and so change alternately; which shewed a disposition strong in the start to drown Mr. Gage in a quantity of proof upon an undisputed point, i. e. the forgiveness of sin. Having expressed his self-satisfaction by his "look about," he sat down in his glory, calling for surrender, when up rose Mr. Gage, who had the effrontery to tell all the people that he had agreed to renounce his principles when it should be proved that punishment due for transgression was ever remitted, and still felt bound so to do. But he said that in all which the gentleman had read, not one text came to the point. He then produced many texts to prove the negative, that "God will by no means clear the guilty"—"though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished," and many others equally relevant, and then challenged the gentleman to produce one "Thus saith the Lord" to support the affirmation. There appeared to be much fear that the doctrine preached to Mother Eve by the serpent, would be proved faulty by a Universalist, and from the bible. But a father in the Church by the name of Cotton, who is apt in the use of Scripture to prove the dogmas of men, handed across the table a scrip of paper containing (I supposed) some text to the point. Mr. Gage stopped and said he supposed he had come there to discuss the question with Mr. Gurney, and not with the whole congregation. Some explanation was attempted. They all felt the rebuke, for Mr. Gage had not spoken to a man of his faith, or asked aid of any man, after taking his seat; nor did he need any. He depended on holy writ, and was well sustained with proof. But strange to tell, he never attempted to prove that men may go on in sin and iniquity, lie, steal, murder, etc., and go to heaven and be as happy as the best and holiest Christian, as our orthodox neighbors say the Universalists preach.

About a year ago, I was told this same Mr. Gurney stated, "if you will show me a Universalist, I will show you one who will lie, steal, cheat and rob," etc.; and now, to see him stand and advocate the doctrine that men may go on and sin and not be punished, struck me with astonishment. But why did he not prove the point? Do not you think he could have proved it by three fourths of the orthodox community underath o? What say you to these things?

MORAL CULTURE.

It is a gratifying reflection that so much attention is at the present day paid to the subject of education. Indeed it has become so fashionable, that for fashion's sake, if no other, almost every man, woman, and child, must have a smattering of some two or three different languages, whether our own is understood or not.

I do not, however, object to the study of the languages, or any other branch of education which is calculated to cultivate the intellectual faculties. Still I seriously question whether there is not an undue proportion of the time of our youth spent in acquiring the fashionable or ornamental, to the neglect of the more solid and useful branches of education—especially that most important of all, morality.

Certain it is, that young men of brilliant talents have acquired almost all other branches taught in our schools with wonderful success, and when their studies have been pronounced "finished," have gone out into the world deficient in this most essential acquirement, and with all their splendid advantages and fair prospects, have sunk down willing victims to base passions that their parents and teachers ought, first of all, to have subdued. This leads me to the conclusion, either that ther-was an unpardonable deficiency in the qualifications of their instructors, or that the principles of morality were considered of too little consequence to be taught at all; for the scholar that can be induced to admire the beautiful in nature, may, if rightly taught, be made to comprehend, admire, and love the moral beauty and sublimity of the laws with which our heavenly Father governs his creatures.

It is not in the nature of things that the young, whose habits are not already formed, if clearly shewn that their happiness through life depends on the strict compliance with laws that were formed for no other purpose than the promotion of their happiness, and that every violation has a fixed and certain penalty, would wilfully transgress. It is his ignorance that first induces him to form bad habits, and these habits often become too firmly rooted to how in submission to a more enlightened mind. We have too long been taught that sin is a sweet morsel, and virtue a rugged way; it is time that those who better understand the laws of nature and nature's God, had the direction of the youthful mind. The principles of morality should no longer be sought in an antiquated creed book, but at the pure fount of a philosophical religion—such a religion as displays the harmony of nature and revelation, and teaches the difference between a cheerful, enlivening piety, and a cold, sad, long-faced, heartless pretension.

But all does not depend on the instruction of the teacher. This is a reading age. A powerful engine is now in operation in the shape of a SCHOOL LIBRARY SYSTEM. Let parents and guardians look well to the moral tendency of the books they purchase for these libraries; let them recollect that they are at liberty to select such books as they please, and let them recollect also that moral as well as intellectual improvement is an object to which the libraries ought to be devoted. If they do not select for themselves, sectarian bigots will select for them, and the great number of sectarian books that have already been palmed off to school districts, should put them on their guard.

We talk a great deal about this being an age of improvement, but can there not be a greater moral improvement in society? We have a great many talented young men coming upon the stage of action; but what will splendid genius or eloquence avail without those stern inflexible principles of morality, on which the whole fabric of individual, social, and national prosperity rests, but which some of our politicians at least appear to have lost sight of?

Let moral improvement be our watchword, until this land of boasted freedom becomes free indeed—free from the contaminating influence of vice and intemperance in every form—free from political corruption and partial legislation, and above all, free from spiritual despotism and mental slavery.

REPLY TO J. K.

Br. K.—In the Magazine and Advocate of the 13th inst., I find some comments of yours on a portion of an article published by me, under the head of "Theological Gleanings," etc., to which I propose now to make a brief reply.

In your article, you accuse me of making use of atheistical arguments, and although you do not charge me with having a leaning towards atheism, yet what you did say, might lead many to suppose that this was actually the case. As you evidently labor under a misapprehension in regard to my opinions, and as what you have written may lead others into the same, it is proper that I should set both you and the readers of the Magazine and Advocate right on that point.

Before I do this, however, it may be proper for me to remark, that the quotation which you made from my article was mostly original with me, especially that part of it which seems to have given you so much offence.

Now, my dear Br., I put the question to your own judgment, and to your own conscience, does it necessarily follow, because I have made use of an argument to prove that man has no conscious existence after death until the resurrection, and against the present immortality of the soul, that therefore, I am not a believer in a future state of existence, nor in the existence of a God? If you think this a necessary inference or conclusion, I ask by what kind of logic do you prove it? Allow me the use of the same kind of logic, and I can easily prove you to be an infidel, a deist, and an atheist—as I shall presently show. Again—admitting my argument to be sound, and my opinion in regard to the condition of man after death, correct, does it follow, because man's consciousness is destroyed by death, that therefore there is no God? You know better than this, Br. K. Why then say, as you do, that I have made use of the "strongest argument that can be adduced in support of atheism"?

From your article, I infer that it is your opinion that Jesus Christ is the only person who ever did or ever will experience a resurrection from the state of death. Consequently you must reject the various accounts contained in the Bible, of persons having been raised from the dead. Hence you say of the "lad" raised by Elisha, that his resurrection was only from "supposed literal death," and of Lazarus, that his was only in "appearance." It follows from this, that Christ was an imposter, or that his disciples have not correctly reported him; or else that the disciples were deceived and mistaken! Now this is precisely what atheists, deists, and every class of infidels believe about it. It hence follows that you are all that I said I could, by your own logic, prove you to be. But I am far from believing this of you, Br. K. I shall be the last man to charge you with infidelity, simply because you happen to agree with infidels on some particular points. The question ought not to be, Is this or that opinion an infidel opinion?—is this or that argument an infidel argument?—but, Is the opinion correct—is the argument sound?

You ask, "How can it be said that Jesus was the first raised from the dead, if others had been raised before him?" I answer, Jesus was the first raised from the state of death to immortal life. All who had been raised before him, were only raised to mortal life; consequently, were not placed beyond the reach of death; but Jesus was raised to a life of incorruptibility and immortality. This fact I think abundantly sufficient to "answer the Scripture meaning of the matter."

To my question, "If the doctrine of the soul's immortality be true, what necessity for the resurrection?" you answer—"none at all, except that of Jesus." In this you are more consistent than any man I ever saw, who believed in the immortality of the soul, and, at the same time, professed to believe in Christianity. What I contend for, is, that both these doctrines can not be true, and that one or the other ought to be abandoned. You have abandoned the one, I the other. The one you have embraced, I consider anti-scriptural and anti-christian—a doctrine borrowed from the heathen philosophers. Perhaps you think just so of the one which I have embraced. If so, I do not differ from you any more than you differ from me.

We are agreed in the opinion that "we shall all be changed". We only differ in regard to the time when, and the manner and mode. I am as far from believing that our spiritual bodies in heaven, will be composed of the same materials which compose our earthly bodies, as you. In other words, I am not a believer in the resurrection of the natural body. At some future time I may illustrate and explain my belief on this subject.

At the close of your article, you speak of the "quagmires of materialism". I shall only remark that it is the easiest thing in the world to call materialism, a "quagmire," but you will find it a very different thing to prove materialism false.

Walton, March, 1840.

TO OUR AGENTS.

You are hereby authorized and requested to put all our accounts which are in your hands, of more than one year standing in an immediate train for collection unless settled by the first of May next, excepting such cases of poverty or misfortune as would render such measures severe and cruel. Our object is not to oppress, but to collect of such as are able to pay, and thereby relieve ourselves from embarrassments brought on by the heedlessness—we had almost said heartlessness of those who are able, but do not pay us. The testimony of the Post Master or deputies where the papers are delivered, is sufficient in this State, and we presume is in other States. Agents will please manage as if the case were their own.

All money now collected by agents, we hope will be forwarded immediately, by mail if no other safe opportunity offers. Do not wait for the Convention, but send it now. A little risk is better for us than delay.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

A meeting of the Trustees and Executive Committee of the Clinton Liberal Institute will be held at Clinton, on Monday, the 27th instant, at 1 o'clock, P. M.

D. PIXLEY, Clerk.

CORRECTION.

In our list of agents published in number 12, we gave the name of J. Y. Kennedy, as agent for Marcellus. It should be J. H. Kennedy.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday instant, by Br. BELDING in Eatonville—by Br. GROSH, in Bridge-water—Br. G. W. GAGE in Litchfield—Br. BARTLETT in Vernon.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. GIBSON at the White Store, and on the second and fourth Sundays in each month during the year—Br. G. W. GAGE in Alder Creek—Br. BARTLETT in New Hartford.

A Conference of the Chautauque Association will be held in the Baptist meeting house in Stockton, the first Tuesday and Wednesday, 5th and 6th of May next. Br. Pickering, who is about to remove from Buffalo to Fredonia, is expected to be with us at that time. Ministering brethren and others are cordially invited to attend. Those from a distance will call at the public house, where they will receive further directions.

T. C. EATON, Clerk.

UNIVERSALIST STATE CONVENTION.

A THEOLOGICAL TYRO IN ANDOVER.

"You may drive nature from its bed, nevertheless it will certainly run back again."

It will be recollected that I closed my former article with a determinate resolve to get religion. Reader, another week had rolled into oblivion. I had spent day after day, and night after night, in endeavoring to carry out this resolution. But alas! for me. Trouble piled upon trouble, vexation heaped upon vexation, and darkness rendered ten times more dark, were the sums total of all my undertakings. Every thing seemed to go wrong. I could find no foundation, no starting point, no place to commence, no where to begin. I was in a state of nature. Man in a state of nature is incapable of understanding a good argument; therefore I could not reason: he is incapable of thinking a good thought; therefore I could not think: he is incapable of doing a good act; therefore, I could not act: and, Lord bless me, here I was, stepping up and down in mid air, trying to stand without any thing to stand on.

While I thus hung buoyant in empty space, and was grasping at vacancy, a protracted meeting was announced, and, of course, I resolved to attend. The time arrived, and at an early hour I was in the church, with my head bowed down like a bulrush. Every thing around seemed to wear an awful solemnity. Some were heaving deep, heavy sighs, as if their very souls were sad. Others were groaning as if the weight of ten thousand worlds was upon them. O, how I longed to be a Christian! Already I began to feel sad, ay, sadly sad. But still I was in an awful condition. I felt that I needed help, yet I durst not ask for it—indeed I almost feared to breathe, lest I should breathe wrong! But when the preacher arose and commenced, I was in a dilemma still more sad than ever. I at first thought I must listen attentively; but a deeper consideration pronounced that—even that, wrong. Nor was this all. The very act of coming there, was nothing but the prompting of a depraved nature. Must I listen? My heart said I must; but my heart was a totally depraved one. Did I desire to become a Christian? Every principle of my nature—every faculty of my soul, seemed in harmony with such a desire, yet I was totally depraved; and not only these feelings, but every act of my life, thus far, had been sinful—wholly, totally, and absolutely sinful. I saw, if I obeyed the impulses of my depraved nature once, I must again and again. And then where should I land! This same heart would direct me to read and investigate for myself, but I had long since learned that such a course was unsafe. Thus I mused, and heard not a word of the sermon, till I was roused from my reverie by the stentorian voice of the speaker. He had already well advanced in his discourse, and had begun to come down upon the sinners in thundering tones. He continued for a few moments, and then closed with one of the most horrid and frightful appeals that I ever heard. Hell seemed to be uncapped, and the whole infernal world to be boiling beneath me. He had scarcely seated himself when a tall, meagre looking individual arose and requested all such as desired the prayers of Christians, to come forward to the anxious seats. He said we could do nothing of ourselves, but must throw ourselves entirely upon the Saviour.

This last intelligence seemed to be the only hope that remained for me. I took the anxious seat, and resolved no longer to be an active agent, but a passive one. I could do nothing of myself while in a depraved state, without doing it wrong; and hence all my hope of salvation rested in having something done for me. I therefore endeavored to close my eyes, stop up my ears, and stagnate my intellectual powers. I felt that I must cease to think, cease to will, and cease to reason, or be irretrievably lost. And for the first time in my life, I resolved to submit myself entirely to the moulding operations of other men—to be fashioned or made just as they were pleased to make me. But scarcely had I come to this determinate resolve, when I was told, by the same individual, who, but a moment before, had said that "we could do nothing of ourselves," to "kneel down," to "pray," to "beseech God to deliver me from an awful burning hell." Here again my depraved nature took possession of my mind. How could I reconcile this with what had just been stated? I must not do, and I must do; I must not wish, and I must wish; I must do nothing for myself, and I must do something for myself. Strange reasoning this, thought I, not recollecting that this was the reasoning of a child of grace. However, I soon recollected myself, and brought my thoughts back from their wild and ungovernable career. I felt that I could see nothing in its true light. Yet if ever a man tried to make black appear white it was myself. Whatever I was told to do, I did; whatever I was told to say, I said; and whatever I was told to be, I was, and all this I did through the meeting. But all in vain. For me there was no hope, no light—all was dark as Erebus! I had closed my eyes, deafened my ears, and stopped the whole machinery of my mind, and what was the result? Why, here I was sinking, sinking! sinking!! And how came I here, said I, almost in despair? Who made me and placed me over this awful malstrom of eternity? Did I make myself? Am I blamable for not standing, when I can find nothing upon which to place a foot? But I must escape—escape? How can I? Am I not fettered, handcuffed, bound hand and foot by the depravity of my nature? I can not move—I can not even think, and yet I am called upon to escape! I can not think a good thought or do a good act, yet I must, or be eternally lost! Born with a halter round my neck, yet blamed for being hung! Alas! where am I? What am I? For what purpose was I made? Am I a man? No, I am an infant—a helpless, powerless, and friendless infant; begotten totally depraved, born a malefactor, and executed thousands and thousands of years before I was born! Here once more I recollected myself. I saw that my nature was so perverse, that my thoughts would run in their natural course—in the course of depravity, in spite of all my efforts to stagnate them or to turn them from their natural channel. I chid myself for thinking so irreverently as I had. I felt that I must be wholly made over again—have another constitution—be recreated and formed anew, before I could see any beauty or harmony in this system. And yet I knew there must be, else why should so many great and learned men, of all ages, have believed it? And unless there had been both beauty and symmetry, wisdom and benignity, about it, it never would have been one of the pillars upon which the Theological Seminary of Andover rests. That institution was founded by the greatest and wisest of men, and it is not very likely that such men would build without knowing upon what they built.

In this state of mind I returned again to my room, and once more sought relief in the work of Prof. Woods. I felt that to me the book was a sealed book; yet the thought that if I persisted there might be something found therein that would finally open my mind to its latent beauties and enable me to feast upon its sublime and incomprehensible contents, caused me to linger upon its pages with a sort of intense anxiety. The particular portion of this great work, that attracted my attention at this time, was the 8th and 9th chapters, where the different views of "Orthodox writers of all ages," relative to the state of the infant mind, its holiness, want of holiness, and total depravity, are most mysteriously harmonized and made to agree. I dwelt with much intensity upon the following expression, which I thought contained something entirely new, and of which none but a very learned man would ever have thought. Speaking of the point at issue between the opinion of Dr. John Taylor and that of Pres. Edwards, one or the other of which is the opinion "generally held by Orthodox divines," he says,

"Man, at the commencement of his existence, is, according to one view characterized from his disposition, and is regarded as a sinner as soon as he is born, on account of his invariable propensity to sin. But according to the other view, this propensity to sin is inseparably connected with sinful emotion, and is soon followed by it, if not in every instance before death, doubtless immediately after." Here then the whole secret of the justice of infant damnation was laid before me. If they had not committed any sin in time, they "doubtless" had in eternity: inasmuch as they possessed, "doubtless," a propensity to sin inseparably connected with sinful emotion; and if the infants' propensities in and of themselves have not justly consigned them to eternal wretchedness, they have, "doubtless," prompted to actual sin, if not in every instance before death, "doubtless" immediately after. Consequently, their damnation has "doubtless" been just. Here then the matter was all perfectly plain. If infants, idiots, or heathen, do not deserve unending woe in this life, they "doubtless" will in the next; and hence there can no objection be predicated of them against the common doctrine of total depravity. It is true he quotes no scripture to prove that whether infants violate a known law here or not, they "doubtless" will in eternity; nevertheless, "Orthodox divines of all ages have believed in total depravity," and it has been the "united opinion" of the great body of Christian commentators and divines, from the Reformation to the present time, that men come into the world in a state of moral pollution." Besides all this, there is "Dr. Dwight maintains that all men are 'born sinners'" and "with him agree Smalley, Hart, Backus, and a whole body of ministers and Christians in Connecticut." And there is "Dr. Nathaniel Taylor," too, who has published it as his belief that "men are totally depraved." And "doubtless" some of the "Orthodox Fathers" and the "Wesleyan Methodists," and a great many more pious and learned men, in "Europe and America,"* had some serious thoughts upon this subject; and therefore, it is beyond all doubt true, whether the Scripture says any thing about it or not, that "all men are born sinners," and that if they do not commit any actual transgression of a known law "before death, they doubtless will immediately after."

Here then was one point that I could understand. This was encouraging. For once I had succeeded in turning my mind from its natural channel; and hence I was firmly resolved to breast the whole current of my depraved nature, and force it from its bed. Thus resolved I commenced the work anew. I now brought the whole powers of my mind to bear upon its profound truths. And such was my success for two days, that I, being naturally self conceited and pedantic, even then began to indulge the hope of yet being learned and great. This served only to nerve me to more vigorous efforts, and all the energies of my soul were now aroused to action. I felt that my mind was expanding, and that I should ere long be able to comprehend the most profound thoughts, and understand the most incomprehensible truth. I plunged deeper and deeper into the unfathomable work before me, and actually buried myself in its grand mysteries, truths, and sublime considerations. I knew, if I could dive to the depths of this work, and examine the foundation upon which it all rested, I should find no more difficulties to encounter; for this work was unparalleled, and was the fundamental truth upon which orthodoxy was founded. Thus laboring and thus thinking, and wearied, perhaps, with the mighty efforts I was making, I fell asleep in my chair. But though asleep, the chain of my thoughts continued unbroken. I thought that I never would give up the work till I understood it. And such was my success, that I even began to be inflated with my own greatness, and to swell with my own importance. I could think of nothing but of being as great as the author I was reading. I felt that every faculty of my soul should now be stretched to its utmost tension. And so foolish and so blind was I, that I did not even heed the melancholy warning of the frog in the fable, which in swelling to the size of an ox, burst himself in his third attempt, but still more unwise than he, I pursued a similar course and met with a similar fate, right in the face and eyes of this unfortunate example! I awoke a different man. The first impression I had was that I was all over the floor. But on discovering that it was not a stubborn reality, but a dream, I soon recovered myself; not, however, without taking warning of this sad event. I felt that the dream was an awful premonitory warning of the reality which would follow, should I continue my investigations; and hence my only safety lay in abandoning my undertaking, and contenting myself with suffering my mind to run on in its own course—obeying the promptings of my own heart, and following the dictates of my own conscience. And to tell the plain truth, I have sometimes thought, that whether this is the pious or learned way or not, it is about as good a way as any.

Such, gentle and patient reader, was the result of all my attempts to be made over anew—to turn my mind from its natural channel, and such, too, the result of all my attempts to become instantaneously pious, learned and wise. The whole affair seems like a dream, and many times in reviewing this part of my life, I have almost doubted whether I really was an actor in it, or only dreamed I was. However this may be, one thing is certain; it has had not a little effect upon my mind, and I feel truly grateful that one part of it at least was a dream, and that the event is no more fatal than I have really found it to be. And now,

"Where'er this tale of truth shall read,
Each man and mother's son take heed;
When to great men you feel inclined,
And mighty thoughts run through your mind,
Think, O think, with thoughts most fervent,
Of your indebted, humble servant."

Andover, Mass. 1840.

LA MARGUERITE..... No. III.

To the Young Ladies of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

Dear Girls—Let us never forget that in every situation in which we can be placed, we have something to do—something necessary to the development of that moral and intellectual nature, which it should be our happiness, as well as our boast, to possess. It will be equally useful for us to remember, that our energies may be misapplied. That, though it be in our power to engage in pursuits which must impart elevation and purity to our thoughts, dignity and worth to our characters; we may be disposed to give our time and attention to other things, and thus lose both the virtue, and the influence, consequent upon a nobler course of conduct. The different periods into which life is divided, have usually some leading duty; and the tendency of a faithful performance of this duty, will be to regulate and improve the general character. But if we neglect what belongs to a particular period, we are sure to derange and injure, if we do not indeed render useless; all the others.

Is it not, then, to your apprehensions, highly important that we ask ourselves often, and particularly upon every change of circumstances, what is our most imperative duty? Let me press the inquiry upon you. At the present brief but interesting period of your lives, what is yours?

In my last number, I mentioned among your duties as members of an Institution of learning, a quiet and devoted attention to school pursuits. I might have made it your most necessary duty as individuals; for that attention can not well be a quiet one, without an exercise of the heart's best graces; nor can it be a devoted one, without insuring all, that I wish to insist upon, as the subject of this evening,—that in the character of school-girls, the attainment of knowledge should be the leading object of your pursuit.

Perhaps you will smile at the idea, that I should insist upon what you have no inclination to deny. You know that schools are instituted for the purpose of affording to the young, more time and better facilities for studying the sciences, than they can usually find among the necessary employments, the varieties, and the interruptions of life at home. You know that in this country of moderate fortunes, neither wealth nor time is often expended without the expectation of an equivalent in return. You who are now absent from your earlier friends, know that the sacrifice by the home affections, which that absence requires, would not have been made, but in the prospect of a rich and lasting benefit to yourselves. These things are so often made the subjects of admonition, that probably most of those who commence a course of school study, do it with a resolution to make the acquisition of knowledge the principal object of their ambition. Yet few even of those who do thus commence, make all the improvement in their power, and simply, because the object has been suffered to lose its interest, or has been wholly abandoned for some other. Perhaps frivolities occupy the time which should be devoted to reading and thought. Perhaps a previously formed habit of indolence returns to paralyze every effort. Perhaps those real difficulties, which every student must meet, have thrown the mind upon its own resources, and it has declared its inability or its unwillingness to overcome the obstacles in its way. Alas! young Ladies, there is no commoner case than this. The question is perplexing, and the thought wanders from it to a lighter subject. The problem is a difficult one, and it is abandoned. Yet I have no reason, and certainly no wish to blame the constitution of the female mind. The cause is not so much the want of power, as the want of motive. It is a common opinion among young ladies, that those solid mental acquirements which would give them clear, comprehensive, and scientific views of general subjects, are something; valuable it may be, but certainly not of the first importance to them—something which they can do very well without. This feeling is by no means universal with female students, but it is far too general. Many would not hesitate to avow such sentiments, and many more, who would not wish to acknowledge them, are yet secretly under their influence. I do not intend this as a reproach upon that class of society to which you belong, for I do not consider young ladies, as a class, sufficiently independent in thought and feeling, to hold opinions different from those of the rest of the world. The cause then of this ill formed opinion, must be traced to habits of thought imposed by long established customs and prejudices, which you have imbibed, rather than adopted, and it becomes you as the injured party, to do all in your power to release yourselves and others, from the influence of this injurious state of feeling.

The love of admiration is thought an almost universal characteristic of the female sex. We are charged with being very much given to the low vices of gossiping and scandal. Those moods of feeling denominated peevishness, discontent and melancholy, are considered particularly feminine. If all this be true, there is nothing which may be so reasonably assigned for the cause, as the want of mental culture; either as allowing the commission of follies which bring with them irritating consequences, or as leaving a vacuity of mind to be filled with caprice and ill-humor, or a love of low and trifling gratifications. In supposing an insufficient mental cultivation, the cause of what is most unlovely in the female character, we are not to consider it in its present and immediate effects upon individuals, alone. We are to recollect that it has so long existed as a cause, that its very consequences have become causes. Long after the mighty printing press had commenced its enlightening labors—when Government had harmonised its discordant principles, and Religion was free; still the shadow of the dark ages lingered upon the female mind, and society in its continually improving condition has endeavored rather to adapt itself to the want of knowledge in the mind of woman, than to rouse that mind to a sense and an exercise of its own free powers. I will ask you to listen to but one illustration of the truth of this remark. That delicate physical organization which gives to you the hue and the contour of beauty, requires for its health and happiness, the comforts, if not the luxuries, so largely provided for it. Your ardent social affections ask for their enjoyment, objects upon which to lavish their overflowing fulness. And these things, rich indeed as the gifts of Heaven, but still perishing and changeable in themselves, have been made to constitute, in the female world, the sum of earthly felicity. Romance and poetry have dressed them, not in their own simple beauty alone, but in false and seductive charms; and society has clustered around them its graces and its refinements, till thousands such as you, have been led to forget, or entirely to disregard the truth, that there exists within the same mysterious being a mental sense, capable of thrilling to every touch of nature, through all the rich variations of grandeur and beauty;—an intellect strong enough to trace the operations of the Eternal Mind in his works—to follow the rapid wanderings of thought, to combine, and reason, and believe. But be not you so deceived. Life is full of varieties, and possibly among its thousand deceitful forms, ignorance may sometimes wear the garb of loveliness, and even vice may appear happy. But "if there be any virtue," if there be any happiness, attainable in human life; their highest excellences must depend upon a proper exercise of our highest powers.

It was my intention when I commenced this paper, to give you some thoughts, and it may be some advice, upon a subject, the proper understanding of which, must exert an important influence upon your early progress in knowledge; but I fear I have already wearied you, and will defer them until another time.

Return with me, now, a few moments, to the simple proposition with which I commenced—in the character of school girls, the attainment of knowledge should be the leading object of your pursuit. It is the fitting time and the fitting opportunity, not to finish your education as is sometimes absurdly said, but to obtain that acquaintance with the systems of science, which will render the acquisitions of your future lives easy and profitable.

The present age is an interesting one in regard to female education. You may perceive the errors and prejudices of the past, in the scanty time usually allowed you at school—in the less liberal endowments made for your benefit, than for that of the other sex; and in the very common wish to make mere personal accomplishments, and the appearance of learning, a substitute for the graces of the mind, and the actual treasures of knowledge. Yet the privileges of the present are beyond all former precedent. The mind is not shackled as in other years, yet not so free but that every woman may become a philanthropist for her sex, if she will; and merely by calling into exercise those holy gifts which shall regulate the whole character, and enable her to exhibit in its purity, and perfectness, not the sentient and the social only, but the intellectual, and the immortal being.

MICHIGAN.

BR. GROSH—I saw an article in the fifth number of the Magazine and Advocate, current volume, from the pen of Br. S. S. Curtis, in which he says he ventures to send a chapter for publication, as articles from Michigan are very scarce, and therefore thinks you will not on that account decline publishing his.

Br. Curtis has somehow fallen into a wonderful error with respect to the state of our cause in western Michigan. In his sixth paragraph he says, "It is all important that something should be done by the friends of liberal Christianity to establish our Redeemer's cause in the central and western parts of Michigan. While every place and corner is swarmed with brimstone Doctors, there is not so much as one herald of the cross sustained in the Gospel field west of Ann Arbor."

Now if Br. Curtis had been as well advised as to the state of our cause west of Ann Arbor, before he penned the article alluded to, as he probably is now, he then would have known that in the town of Columbia and its vicinity, in Jackson county, there is a large regularly organized church, who attend regularly to the Christian ordinances, and who support within the bounds of the church preaching all the time, and that our meetings in general are well attended. And if Br. C. will take the trouble, like a good Samaritan, to journey this way, I will introduce him to some as good friends in the cause as can be found in Michigan, and who possess as warm hearts as ever beat in human bosoms.

There is also another church organized in this county, in the town of Hanover, where I labored a fourth of the time the year past, but my time being required in this vicinity, they are now destitute of the preached word. Preachers might also be sustained in the villages of Jackson and Michigan Centre, if they would but take the trouble to pay the friends a visit and call them together. Preachers, however, must not expect to come to Michigan and find the people all prepared to settle preachers, with churches and societies all organized. It is yet but a new country, and the moral vineyard is in a rude uncultivated state, and needs the skilful hand of the pruner to prepare it for yielding fruit. When that is done, our cause will then flourish and take its rank along side, or in advance, of other orders.

AN OBJECTION TO UNIVERSALISM.

It is a well known fact that there is no doctrine held by the evangelical denominations, that is so violently and steadily opposed by the Universalist portion of community, as the doctrine of eternal punishment. Opposition to this doctrine constitutes a large portion of the labors of Universalist clergymen. The doctrine of eternal punishment for sin, say Universalists, is a stain upon the character of God, and the advocacy or inculcation of it, constituted no part of the labors of Christ and his apostles, nor of the advocates of Christianity in the early ages of the Church. Now if Universalists are correct in their views of this subject, the course pursued by our Lord and his disciples while on earth, seems to me to have been remarkably strange. It is a fact I believe denied by none, that the Jews in the days of our Saviour were, as they now are, believers in the doctrine of endless punishment. Prideaux says, in speaking of their views of the destiny of the wicked, that they believed "that their souls, as soon as separated from their bodies, were transmitted into a state of everlasting woe, there to suffer the punishment of their sins to all eternity." Josephus was not only himself a believer in this doctrine, but we have his authority that such was the belief in general of the Jews in his day. He says, "They (the Pharisees) believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that there will be rewards and punishments according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life, and that the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison"—"that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment." Now, if the doctrine of eternal punishment is as false as Universalists contend it is, as derogatory to the character of God, and as much opposed to his attributes, as they would have us believe it is, is it not remarkably strange that in the whole history of the labors, of the sayings and doings of Jesus and his apostles, we have not so much as one word against it? Is there the least evidence, even so much as a hint, that the blessed Jesus condemned or disavowed it? No! If our Saviour, who was the way, the truth and the life, viewed the doctrine adverted to in the light that Universalists do, who does not know that when warning his disciples against the leaven, the doctrine of the Pharisees, he would have plainly, definitely and positively condemned it? Here, then, we have the fact staring us in the face, of the Jews holding to a doctrine involving the most awful consequences, a doctrine which according to Universalists, represents God as a being of infinite malignity, and insatiable revenge, and our Saviour in the whole course of his ministry never so much as intimating but that it was true! How shall we account for it? Come, Messrs. Editors of the Magazine and Advocate, ye men of war, tell us what ye think concerning this matter.

Utica, March 16, 1840.

The argument of this plausible objection, we arrange in the following manner for convenience and method in our reply.—1. Universalists feel bound, as Christians, to oppose the doctrine of endless misery, (for we suppose R. W. means endless misery when he applies to it the word eternal or everlasting,) as the principal error of modern theology. 2. If they follow Christ, he, too, would have directed his principal efforts to demolish that doctrine, had it had a place in the theology of that day. 3. Endless misery had a place in the theology of the Pharisees in the days of Jesus. 4. But Jesus did not say aught against endless misery, though he plainly rebuked the errors of the Pharisees. 5. Hence, either Jesus did not view that doctrine as an error; or, according to the standard of action laid down by Universalists, the Saviour was remiss in his duty to God and man. I think R. W. will admit that I have not weakened his objection by putting it into this logical form—and, at all events, my answer will cover the whole ground, even as he has laid it out before us in his communication.

And here permit me to observe, that I do not like the spirit of that communication. With true "orthodox" sang froid it arrogates to Partialism the exclusive evangelical (good news) character, and uses the word eternal as if it was a conceded point that it meant endless. And then, to crown all, it closes in a bullying, braggadocio tone, illy accordant with the subject, or the character of an inquirer after divine truth. Had we claimed to be "men of war," or had our general course as Editors been such as to warrant such an appellation, there might be some excuse for R. W.—but as we can not excuse him, we will for once pass by the offensive portion of his article, and attend to what in it is really worth attention, for its own sake—the argument—the truly plausible objection. I will follow the order above designated, in doing so.

1. It is true that we deem the character of our Heavenly Father, (which is involved in the destiny of man,) of more importance than the mode of his existence, the method of baptism, and the other thousand and one topics on which Partialists at the present day choose to differ and divide. But, the importance of any point in theology may depend on its prevalence, its effects or the general, firmly held opinions of community. If mankind around us were drugged to insanity and death with Trinitarianism, and the doctrine of endless misery ceased to be urged and preached, we should then direct our principal efforts to refuting the doctrine of the trinity—or if Millerism was raging so as to drive men and women from their regular employments, and bring ruin and distress on the land, then our principal efforts would be directed to showing that the Bible did not teach the destruction of the world in 1843. But at present, and ever since we can remember, the doctrine of endless woe has been made the principal topic by "the evangelical (?) denominations," and directly or indirectly has been made the "motive power" in all the operations which distract, divide, and destroy the peace and welfare of society. Of course, then, we, too, have made it the important point against which we have directed "a large portion" of our labors.

2. In doing so, though our measures may not be the same as Christ's, and though we may not have aimed them at the same objects which he had in immediate view, yet we claim to act in the same spirit, and that the ultimate aim and results of our labors are the same as his. But the great errors which, in his day, corrupted human virtue, and obscured the divine character to the destruction of human happiness, were not, in all respects, those which now obtain in Christendom. A purely spiritual resurrection to immortality was absolutely unknown—and, in some cases, any kind of resurrection from the dead was totally denied. External forms and ceremonies were substituted for internal purity—and sectional and selfish views and motives, for universal charity. And the divine Being was conceived of by the Jews, as an entirely partial being—the Father (perhaps) of the Jews exclusively, and their God in preference to all other nations. As a matter of course, then, Jesus directed his principal efforts to the overthrow of these principal errors, and to the establishment of the great leading truths of his mission. And these great leading truths we have frequently proved to be, 1. The character of God as the Father of all—Jews and Gentiles, saints and sinners. 2. The messiahship of Jesus, as the chosen of God to administer the moral government of the universe, until all God's children were reconciled to their heavenly Father. 3. The extension of revelation to the Gentiles, and the casting out of the Jews from the kingdom of heaven, until the fulness of the Gentiles should come in. 4. The resurrection from the dead, to immortality, honor, glory and power, in which all the raised should be as the angels of God in heaven. 5. The delivering up of the kingdom to God, the only supreme object of worship, and the subjection of the Mediator himself to God, so that God might be all in all. On these principal teachings Jesus based his precepts, which are in perfect accordance with them.

And here let it be remarked, that the four evangelists seldom represent Jesus as directly attacking all the errors of his age, or even all the principal ones; but as doing it merely when circumstances arose to require such attack, and then doing it gently, and incidentally—or by well chosen parables. Neither did he fully disclose his great doctrines at any one time, or in the form of a dissertation or treatise. His situation, and the prospective development of his whole mission, did not require such a course at that time. He patiently weeded the minds of his apostles from error, and planted in them the seeds of truth. After his resurrection, only, did he fully unfold the entire system to their minds, and lead them to the full knowledge he had in store for them. And this was all that was necessary under the circumstances of that period. Those principles of truth, themselves, become the guide which direct to proper action under all the varying circumstances of after periods—and by comparing all doctrines with these principles, we test the truth or falsehood of doctrines.

These considerations, then, answer the question, why Jesus, and his apostles after him, did not plainly and unequivocally oppose the notions of Jews and heathens in reference to punishment in a future state of being. 1. Those notions were not made a principal point in controversy with Christians, by either Jews or heathens—they were not, in the circumstances of the case, the principal error, and called not, therefore, for the greater portion of the labors of Christians for their removal. For let it be understood here, that it is capable of proof, that a general skepticism prevailed even in the heathen world, respecting the fables of their gods. But, 2, The truths taught by the Christians, it was well known, would, when fairly established, overcome these latent errors, without a direct and special effort for their destruction. For if the world once believed in a universal resurrection to a holy and happy immortality, the lurking skepticism in regard to endless misery, would be turned into a confirmed assurance of its falsity. So much for misery in eternity.

3. But it is not certainly true, as R. W. asserts, that the Pharisees believed in absolutely endless misery. I know the weight of the names he has adduced as authority, but even Dean Prideaux may be fallible, and Josephus may not mean endless when he uses the word eternal or everlasting: R. W. takes for granted this very question—one we seriously dispute and deny. There is abundant proof that the Greek words aion and aionios were frequently, yea, commonly used in a limited sense in his days, and for centuries afterward—and that those early Christians, the composers of the Sybilline Oracles, Origen, and others, all of whom advocated the doctrine of universal salvation, and contended for the limitation of all punishment, nevertheless freely called punishment everlasting, which they would not have done, had they supposed the word to mean endless. Now we say that Josephus used the word everlasting or eternal in the common mode of using it in his day, and that Prideaux may have been misled as to the opinions of the Pharisees on the duration of punishment, by putting R. W.'s construction on the word everlasting applied to it. But let us admit, to save argument, that R. W. is correct—that the Pharisees held to the doctrine of absolutely endless misery—what follows? It is admitted by the best Partialist commentators, that they did not derive the doctrine from the Old Testament, and even Josephus gives us to understand that it was derived from the heathen, or, at most, was dependent on what the Jews called the oral law, in contradistinction from the written law; while the Sadducees boldly asserted that the written law was the only rule of faith, and that therefore these "traditions of the elders," and "commandments of men," (from which, only, the doctrine of endless misery was derived,) were of no weight or authority whatever. Jesus took a medium ground in opposition to both Pharisees and Sadducees. He severely reprobated and condemned the "traditions of the elders" and "commandments of men," and, of course, the doctrine of endless misery which was taught in them. He commanded his disciples to "beware of the heaven—the doctrines of the Scribes and Pharisees"—including, of course, this very doctrine of endless misery in the warning. In regard to the Sadducees, he told them that they "erred, not knowing the Scriptures, neither the power of God," for that the Old Testament did contain an intimation of a resurrection. And in opposition to both, he showed that all who were raised in that resurrection would be freed from all earthly emotions and carnal propensities—would be immortal, and as the angels of God in heaven. So that, although Jesus did not directly and specifically oppose the doctrine of endless misery, (allowing that it had a place in the Jewish theology,) yet he did oppose and condemn it in proportion to the importance given it by its supporters—1, by condemning the only source from whence it was derived—the only foundation on which it stood; and, 2, by teaching a universal resurrection to immortality, and the destruction of all fleshly lusts and propensities in that resurrection state.

4 and 5. It follows then that the conclusions of R. W. do not follow, the premises on which they were based being utterly destroyed.

Inability to confine myself to writing much, on account of health, has prevented an earlier answer—and now prevents me from condensing this reply and re-writing it, as I should have done, in order to add some remarks I would like to add on the subject. I believe, however, that I have answered the objection entire, and so submit my hasty labors to the consideration of the candid reader. If further information is needed, it will be found in two very excellent labored articles, in the Expositor, vol. 3, for 1833, page 149, "Doctrines of the Pharisees and Sadducees" by S. R. Smith; and page 397, "Opinions and phraseology of the Jews concerning the future state; from the time of Moses, to that of their final dispersion by the Romans," by H. Ballou, 2d.

I will only add, that when the period arrives, which is coming rapidly, in which our opposers will nearly give up the doctrine of endless misery, (for they do not now claim one half the Scripture texts in its favor which they did fifty years ago,) it is very probable that Universalists will not pay more direct and express attention to that doctrine, than Jesus and his apostles did. And if they now will come to the ground occupied by the Pharisees on that subject, we too will confine ourselves to condemning the oral traditions—the "doctrines of men" and "the traditions of the elders"—on which only they will then rely for proof of endless sin and misery. Till then, we shall continue doing, as we believe Jesus would have done, had his opposers taken the position our opposers now do. A. B. G.

A TRINITY OF OBSTACLES.

There are three things, I conceive, which operate against the full and complete triumph of Universalism in the world, though it is by no means certain that they will always do so. The first is, that mankind have been taught that religion is a kind of speculation, against which all the false pleasures of time are held in competition. While they have been taught the necessity of embracing the religion of Jesus, it has been urged upon their immediate attention only in consideration of the shortness of life—as much as though religion had nothing to do with the enjoyments of the present. Thus while they have been directly taught the necessity of embracing religion, they have been indirectly taught to put it off just as long as they dare venture with the competition. The popular system of faith, having accomplished all this, it next introduces a sort of forcible compromise with the love of sin, by which, through the animal fear of the poor trembling sinner, he is compelled to become religious, in spite of his preference for delay. Thus the system of popular religious education, from infancy upward, is almost entirely against Universalism, by so predisposing the mind that the impulse of abject fear only can turn its attention to religion. This, Universalism must tear from its foundation, by teaching the mind that the sooner it embraces the Christian religion, the sooner it will enjoy the blessings which God has bestowed upon it, and by convincing it that as there is no competition between holiness and iniquity, so there is no compromise with sin—they must abandon it, and the love of it.

The second consideration to be noticed is, a kind of spurious philosophy, which flatters the mind that old errors are preferable to new experiments. Most of those who are half persuaded, stand in this predicament. They have an instinctive attachment to their early associations, much as one loves the old domicile of his juvenile days, though it may now be crumbling into ruins. They love it for what it once appeared to be, and not for what it is now. They have become so convinced of the untruth of their old notions, and of their inability to withstand the strength of Universalism, that they neither attempt to defend the former, nor to controvert the latter. As to Universalism, they think it is well enough, but they are not disposed to active measures either for or against it. They do not think it necessary. They are, in fact, riding a sort of non-committal hobby. They must come off from this, and it must be the province of Universalism to bring them off.

The third consideration—the most fatal, and yet the easiest remedied—is the indifference of Universalists to the progress of that cause which they profess to love. Let a man who has been in the habit of witnessing exhibitions of the most fervent devotion and zeal, and reading of the sacrifices of time, and liberty, and life, which have been made in the cause of endless misery—let such a man come among us, and see us cold, and careless, and unengaged, in that best of all causes, the salvation of the world from sin; and he almost unavoidably concludes that we lack the vital principles of Christianity—he attributes our errors to the cause which we dishonor, and he makes no further investigation, for he feels no further interest. Let Universalists awake, and the rest of the world must awake. Let Universalists act for themselves, for humanity, for God, and every effort of the religious world, for or against them, will, in spite of themselves, result in the spread of our glorious faith, and the up-building of the Zion of our God. A. R. B.

THE DISCUSSION.

I have hitherto neglected to state to the public one important consideration in reference to the Discussion with A. Campbell—or rather to the sale of that work when published, viz. that whatever profits, if any, arise from the sale of the Discussion will be devoted to benevolent and charitable objects. Those therefore who subscribe for the work will contribute by that means to the promotion of the objects of benevolence, instead of any private and individual gain, besides diffusing more widely the arguments pro and con on the doctrines of Endless Misery and Universal Salvation.

Our printers will not be able to get the work out of press quite as early as was anticipated. It will not probably be ready for the market much, if any, before the middle of May. D. SKINNER.

ERRATUM.

A mistake occurred in the obituary notice of Mr. Adam W. Zimmerman, published in current volume, number 10, in giving the text. Instead of I Cor. ix: 13, it should read, II Cor. iv: 13.

Also in a notice of the death of Mrs. Took, published in current volume, number 12. It should read, Miss Eliza Ann Look. She was the daughter of Doct. Sylvester and Mary S. Look, and died aged 14 years, 5 months and 17 days. We are very sorry that such a mistake should have happened, but we very distinctly recollect the circumstances which led us into it. We even took pains to erase such portions of the original notice as we found to be unintelligible—yet we mistook the name.

Br. Whittemore, in reply to the charge of Br. L. F. W. Andrews, says the plan of the Universalist Guide was adopted before the Two Opinions was published, and that he has not copied a single word from the latter work, where as Br. Andrews has copied or borrowed from books published by Br. Whittemore—as Paige's Selections, etc.

To dilatory subscribers we say, Remember the first of May. Do not expect to pay at the convention, or some of the Associations, and have it called paying in advance. So, pay in time, and save the increase of fifty cents.

Agents will please remit whenever they receive a remittable sum. Better the risk of the mail, than delay—we want money. A. B. G.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
SPRING.

My love is very strong for thee,
Dear, sunny Spring—
Thou strewest the leaves on memory's tree
With thy soft wing.

I hear low voices in thy breeze,
Of friends long dead;
In thy sweet flowers my spirit sees,
Past scenes outspread.
Thy birds the slumbering sounds awake
Of olden songs;
The music thy glad streamlets make,
The charm prolongs.

My childhood's home comes back again
With its old trees,
Its ripening fruit, its waving grain,
Its humming bees.

Again I trail my jumping rope
Beside the hill,
And with strawberries from the slope
My basket fill.

Again with childish awe I stand,
In the old church,
And for the hymns, with dextrous hand,
Begin a search.

I listen to a voice as sweet
As Mennon's lyre,
And my young prayerful pulses beat
With sacred fire.

A resurrection morn thou art,
Dear Spring, to all
Whose soul's with quickened ardor start
When thou dost call. JULIET.

CHEERYBELE BROTHERS.—This firm which has been so worthily portrayed by the gifted author, "Nicholas Nickleby," is said to have really existed, but under another name—and not to have been merely the offspring of a fertile imagination. The following anecdote respecting these noble minded originals is taken from the Manchester (Eng.) Times:

"The elder brother of this house of merchant-princes amply revenged himself upon a libeller who had made himself merry with the peculiarities of the amiable fraternity. This man published a pamphlet, in which one of the brothers (D.) was designated as "Billy Button," and represented as talking largely of their foreign trade, having travellers who regularly visited Chowbent, Bullock, Smithy and other foreign parts. Some 'kind friend' had told W. of this pamphlet, and W. had said that the man would live to repent of its publication. This saying was kindly conveyed to the libeller, who said that he should take care never to be in their debt. But the man in business does not always know who shall be his creditor. The author of the pamphlet became bankrupt, and the brothers held an acceptance of his which had been endorsed by the drawer, who had also become bankrupt. The wantonly libelled men had thus become creditors of the libeller. They now had it in their power to make him repent of his audacity. He could not obtain his certificate without their signature, and without it he could not enter into business again. He had obtained the number of signatures required by the bankrupt laws, except one.

"It seemed folly to hope that the firm of 'brothers' would supply the deficiency. What, they, who had cruelly been made the laughing stock of the public, forget the wrong, and favor the wrong doer! He despaired; but the claims of a wife and children forced him at last to make the application. Humbled by misery, he presented himself at the counting room of the wronged. W. was there alone, and his first words to the delinquent were, 'Shut the door, sir!' sternly uttered. The door was shut, and the libeller stood trembling before the libelled. He told his tale and produced his certificate, which was instantly clutched by the injured merchant.

'You wrote a pamphlet against us once!' exclaimed W. The supplicant expected to see his parchment thrown into the fire; but this was not its destination. W. took a pen, and writing something on the document, handed it back to the bankrupt. He—poor wretch! expected to see 'here 'rogue, scoundrel, libeller,' inscribed; but there was in fair round characters the signature of the firm! 'We make it a rule,' said W. 'never to refuse signing the certificate of an honest tradesman, and we have never heard you was any thing else.'

"The tear started into the poor man's eyes. "Ah!" said W. 'My saying was true. I said you would live to repent writing that pamphlet. I did not mean it as a threat; I only meant that some day you would know us better, and would repent you had tried to injure us. I see you repent of it now.' 'I do, I do,' said the grateful man. 'Well, well, my dear fellow,' said W. 'You know us now. How do you get on? What are you going to do?' The poor man stated that he had friends who could assist him when his certificate was obtained. 'But how are you off in the mean time?' And the answer was, that, having given up every thing to his creditors, he had been compelled to stum his family of even the common necessities, that he might be enabled to pay the cost of his certificate. 'My dear fellow,' said W. 'this will not do—your family must not suffer. Be kind enough to take this ten pound note to your wife from me. There, there, my dear fellow—nay, don't cry—it will be all well with you yet. Keep up your spirits, set to work like a man, and you will raise your head yet.' The overpowered man endeavored in vain to express his thanks—the swelling in his throat forbade words; he put his handkerchief to his face, and went out of the door crying like a child."

MARRIAGES.

In Rochester, March 7th, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. JOHN JENKINSON, to Miss SAMANTHA STONE. Also in same place, March 12th, by the same, Mr. LEWIS SHULTS, to Miss AMANDA ANDREWS, all of Rochester.

In Leon, Cattaraugus county, March 26, by Samuel Cowley, Esq., Mr. SMITH CURTIS, of Napoli, to Miss ANN ROSS, of the former place.

In Richfield, Sunday evening, March 8th, by Rev. J. S. Kibbe, Mr. BENJAMIN C. WILDER, to Miss CAROLINE WILLIAMS, both of Richfield.

DEATHS.

In Kingsbury, Feb. 9th, Mr. DANIEL SMITH, aged about 42 years. Nearly two years previous to his death, he received a shock of the numb palsy, which, in a measure, prostrated his faculties, of both body and mind; in which state he remained until the 9th, about 1 o'clock, P. M., when he was attacked with a fit of apoplexy, which terminated his life in about seven hours.

It seldom falls to our lot to record the death of an individual who has fewer enemies, or more friends, than Br. Smith. His circle of acquaintance was extensive, and through the whole, his name is associated with the christian character and virtues. He was a Universalist in every sense of the word, a member of the Universalist Society in Hartford, and an ornament to Christianity. His life was a practical commentary of the doctrine of universal benevolence and good will. He was always active, zealous and consistent in his efforts to promote the cause of his Master, which he loved, which governed his life, and continued his sustaining power, after the paralyzing hand of disease had prostrated his energies.

He was the first of a large family, to discover and embrace that light which beams forth from the boundless love of the Universal Father, and which finally will subdue all enemies, and make them friends and obedient subjects of his spiritual and eternal kingdom; and through his well-directed, prudent, candid and persevering efforts, it may be said that a kind father, affectionate mother, loved and loving brothers and sisters, and other friends, enjoy that faith by which they are enabled to rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, and the salvation of all his children. He was an intelligent, independent, honorable and practical Christian—respected and loved in life, and deeply and sincerely lamented in death. Through this dispensation of a wise and good Providence, a wife and five children, father and mother, brothers and sisters, and numerous friends, are called to mourn their loss of a devoted husband, affectionate father, dutiful child, and a brother and friend indeed. They mourn not as those who have no hope; but are sustained and consoled by the happy and gospel faith and hope, that they shall meet again, where

Husband and wife no more shall part,
Parent and child unite in heart.
Kindred and friends shall join in one
Eternal song around the throne
Of God our Father and the Lamb,
And praise and love the great I AM.

His funeral was attended in the Baptist meeting house in Hartford, the 11th February, and a discourse delivered to the mourning relatives and friends, and a numerous congregation, by

J. A. ASPINWALL.

At Cheshire, on Saturday, February 8th, after a short but distressing illness, Mrs. SARAH CHITTENDEN, wife of Rev. Wm. Wilcox, aged 24.

Mrs. W.'s residence in Cheshire had been but short, yet sufficient y'long to very much endear her to a large circle of acquaintance. Those who are favored with frequent association, beheld in her a beautiful combination of all those graces which exalt and adorn the human mind, and render truly excellent the sons and daughters of humanity. The memory of her unaffected dignity of mind, together with the graceful meekness of her pure and virtuous spirit will remain when the beautiful casket which contained it shall have mingled with its native element.

A lovely infant daughter, for whom had been manifested all the fondness of a mother's affection, remains a seal and solace to the widowed heart of him who but ten short months previous led the deceased a happy bride to the sacred altar. Short was their union upon earth; but the bereaved has possession of a faith which supports him in this trying hour, being aware that notwithstanding dust must mingle with dust, the spirit is beatified and called a little before him to rest with its Saviour and its God, where all is peace and joy.

Mrs. W. was a subject of early religious impressions, and at the age of 17 made a public profession of religion, by uniting with the Universalist society in Stephentown, N. Y., of which society she continued a virtuous and exemplary member until the time of her death. Her moral feelings were at all times very acute, so that she loved virtue for its excellence, and detested vice from its odiousness. Although a Universalist, Mrs. W. was no sectarian; she was ready to aid all who were engaged in improving the condition of society, and to worship with all who would worship God in sincerity and in truth, and she protested against that spirit of fault-finding against other denominations which is too common with professed Christians of the present day. But a few days before her death, she observed to the writer, that she "did not think it necessary for clergymen of her faith to be employed in opposing other denominations, or in exposing the errors of their creeds, for," said she, "there is a moral power in the truth, which if rightly inculcated, will overcome all else." Would that every heart had this strong confidence in the truth of God. But we close in the appropriate language of the poet,

"Her race was fair but short on earth,

Her duty was well done,

Beloved by all who knew her worth,

And all who knew her mourn.

Like a bright cloud of Summer's day,

That sweetly fades at even,

Sarah's spirit passed away

From earth to shine in heaven."

In New Hartford, on the 24th ult., Mr. RICHARD WILLS, aged 51 years. Br. Wills has been long and extensively known and esteemed in this section. By his own industry, uprightness and intelligence, and in despite of the peculiar disadvantages which surround the colored man, he not only became a comparatively wealthy and able farmer, but was respected for nobler qualities by his neighbors—and though he followed teaching dancing for a long succession of winters, he still retained the esteem and friendship of many who are conscientiously opposed to that art—a fact which shows his native worth. He was a Universalist, and in life supported that Gospel which sustained him in his last long and painful illness. His worthy and amiable partner, and adopted children, reared by his bounty and care, together with other relatives and friends, lament their loss. The funeral was attended by a large concourse on the 26th, in the Presbyterian meeting house in the village, which was granted for the occasion, and a discourse delivered by Br. Cook of this city. A. B. G.

In West Turin, Lewis county, on the 22d ult., Mrs. SARAH COLLINS, consort of Hon. Jonathan Collins, aged 63 years and 4 months. She had been confined to the house for twelve years by a paralytic stroke, and fell from the tree of life, by a gentle shake of the hand of death, ripe for immortality—only anxious to "depart and be with Christ." For 65 years she had been united with her now bereaved partner in the bonds of a happy union—for 43 years she had dwelt under the same roof, and never seen under it a human form stretched in death—her neighbors shared her ministering kindness in all the sickness and trials of a new country—her children, and her children's children, grew up and called her blessed—her cup was full—and gently was she led down to her last resting place, trusting in the God of universal goodness who had so richly blessed her, and relying on his grace to crown her immortal existence with all the perfection of bliss.

The funeral was attended on the 25th, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the sick and surviving partner, the children and other relatives and friends, by the writer. A. B. G.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. IV.—Conduct towards Husbands.

"If 'twere not the sparkling light
That trembles from yon beauteous star,
How dark would be the form of night,
Careering in her gloomy car.

'Tis thus enlivening woman cheers
Man's gloomiest hours with fond caress,
When nought of kindred life appears
To soothe the pangs of deep distress."

How general is the impression that when a young couple become united in matrimony, they will soon begin to exhibit less of those kind attentions and those tokens of deep affection towards each other, which were so manifest in their conduct previous to their union. I will not now tarry to describe how discreditable it is to any young married pair, to justify this expectation—or to describe the nature of the love by which they have been attracted, or to depict how far and how different it is from that pure, elevated affection, without which there can be no happiness in the marriage state. I will only remark on this point, that the true love of the soul which, proceeding from a congeniality of tastes and dispositions and brought into existence by beholding meritorious and pleasing qualities, attaches those of different sexes together, increases rather than diminishes, after they have become one before God and the world. Nothing, in my estimation, throws a more gloomy cloud over the prospects of a youthful couple, than to behold coldness and indifference towards each other, speedily succeeding the marriage day. And few things can be more discreditable to a young wife, than to be the first to exhibit this indifference, or indeed to exhibit it at all.

That husbands and wives exercise a great influence in modifying each other's character and disposition, is a fact which admits of no dispute. And equally evident is it, that the influence of the wife in this respect, is much greater than that of the husband. We frequently see instances of this, in the striking change which is frequently wrought by second wives in the habits and tastes of their husbands. I do not suppose a second wife produces any greater modification in the characteristics of the husband, than the first—the change is only more apparent. The habits of a young man are not so fixed and manifest, as those of one more advanced in years; neither are his characteristics so much noticed, as those of an established citizen and householder, surrounded, perhaps, by a family. Hence the change wrought in him by a wife, although entirely as deep and radical, is not as manifest to public observation, as that effected in one whose habits and tastes have long been known to the community. However, be this as it may, a second wife affords a better illustration of the position, that the wife can and does exercise a most sensible influence upon the character, prosperity and happiness of the husband.

The influence of a wife upon her husband, can be exerted for good or for evil; and it remains for her to determine, to no small extent, his character and his standing. She can if she pleases, by pursuing a certain course of conduct, cause a husband of the best disposition and intentions, to become dispirited, sour, morose, intemperate and vicious. Or if she is more wise in her views and more discreet in her proceedings, she can exercise a strong influence in preserving and perpetuating the evenness and sweetness of his disposition and temper—she can aid him essentially on the highway to prosperity, dignity and honor—she can preserve him from many temptations which may beset his path—yea, in numerous instances, she can reform his habits and reclaim him from dissipation and the verge of ruin! All this may she do—all this has she done. The world is full of instances which illustrate the influence of wives, both for evil and for good. Of the latter character, I can not forbear referring to the case of Sir James Mackintosh, celebrated throughout the civilized world, both as a writer and a statesman. In reference to the character of his deceased wife, he remarks:—"Allow me, in justice to her memory, to tell you what she was, and what I owed her. I was guided in my choice only by the blind affection of my youth. I found an intelligent companion, and a tender friend, a prudent mistress, the most faithful of wives, and a mother as tender as children ever had the misfortune to lose. I met a woman who, by the tender management of my weaknesses, gradually corrected the most pernicious of them. She became prudent from affection; and though of the most generous nature, she was taught frugality and economy by her love for me. During the most critical period of my life, she preserved order in my affairs, from the care of which she relieved me. She gently reclaimed me from dissipation; she propped my weak and irresolute nature; she urged my indolence to all the exertions that have been useful or creditable to me, and she was perpetually at hand to admonish my heedlessness and imprudence. To her I owe whatever I am; to her whatever I shall be. In her solicitude for my interest, she never for a moment forgot my feelings or my character."

This is but one of the many instances which might be cited, where the success of renowned men was, to a great degree, to be attributed to the judicious course of conduct adopted by their wives. This is a point which a wise woman will not pass over without serious reflection, and without adopting prudent resolutions. If the character of the husband, if his habits, his respectability, his success in his profession, depend so materially upon the line of conduct adopted and pursued towards him, by his wife, how vitally important that she should take heed to her ways, and let prudence and wisdom guide her into those paths which befit a kind and judicious wife, who is indeed a "help meet."

Let no wife flatter herself that her husband is so perfect, that it is unnecessary for her to be thus circumspect in her conduct towards him. A supposition of this character would not only be erroneous but dangerous. She will soon learn that her husband is not entirely without faults. She will perceive many shades of character—many little traits of disposition, tinged with that imperfection, which is entailed upon humanity. And if she is surprised in making these discoveries, it will but evince that she is not fully acquainted with human nature; for where can those be found, who have not some failings to be regretted? Daily and hourly are mortals called upon to throw the veil of charity and forgiveness over each other's faults if they would live happily together on earth. And whoever are properly conscious of their own imperfections, will not fail to do this with a liberal hand.

But allowing that the wife is not disappointed in the disposition of her husband—allowing that she finds him in mind and feelings, all that she anticipated, and that she can discover little or nothing to amend in his character or conduct—still it would be injudicious and dangerous to throw aside caution and prudence in her conduct towards him—there yet would continue to be a necessity for the exercise of foresight, watchfulness and discretion. If he has a kind and pleasant disposition—if his habits are all of a proper character—if he has an honorable ambition to excel in his profession—surely the wife must desire that he should continue to possess these characteristics. And yet her conduct may be such as to change them, entirely. That pleasant disposition she may turn to moroseness—those virtuous habits she may break up, and cause them to be replaced by the most vicious propensities—that honorable ambition she may sink into an ambition to excel in deceit and crime! Changes of this striking character may be produced by the conduct of the wife—for "what has been, may be again." Not that a wife would deliberately design thus to make another being of her husband; but this may be the fruit of an unguarded and injudicious course of conduct on her part, operating upon a sensitive and perhaps not well balanced mind. How necessary, then, that those who have the best of husbands, should strive to keep them so, by pursuing a wise and judicious course, and not allowing any word or deed to weaken or change, in the smallest degree, the good qualities of their companions.

But unfortunately, the wife may be placed in other and more unpleasant circumstances. She may be surprised to find her husband disposed to be idle and careless, and inclining to vicious habits—she may perceive that he is negligent in his business, heedless of the future, and more inclined to trifling or dissipated amusements, than to those occupations which ought to occupy his attention and employ his time—frequent and long absences from home, at unseasonable hours, may alarm her, and coldness and moroseness in his attentions, may pain her. Alas! how many wives, who wedded with the brightest hopes and the fairest prospects, have speedily found themselves involved in those unfortunate circumstances! I pray Heaven, that such may not be the condition of the wife who is now perusing these lines. But should she unhappily be placed in this perilous state, let her prayer ascend to God, for wisdom, discretion and forbearance, that she may not err in the painful trials before her. The desire of the woman thus circumstanced will be, not to confirm her husband in his improper habits, nor hurry him on in the dangerous career he has just commenced, but if possible, to reclaim him. And here allow me to say, that no being on earth can exercise so much influence in bringing an erring man back to the paths of rectitude and virtue, as a discreet and affectionate wife. But what measures must she adopt?—what plans must she pursue?—what must be the character of her conduct towards her husband, to effect an object so desirable? These are important enquiries; and I crave the patience of the reader while I briefly comment upon them.

In the first place, let the wife establish it as an invariable rule, to treat her husband with constant and unwearied kindness, whatever may be his conduct. There is no other course to be pursued with the least hope or prospect of success. There is a moral power in kindness which is almost irresistible. If the husband begins to indulge in improper habits, it should be the object of the wife to choose a proper opportunity, when his mind is clear, his feelings calm and composed, and his better nature has the ascendancy, to address him on the subject of his failings. Let her not commence in an angry tone, nor indulge in bitter accusations or harsh invectives. This course would defeat her purpose. It would afford him an opportunity and an excuse for replying in like manner; and a warfare of vituperation would commence, that could result in nothing, but, perhaps, the confirmation of the hypband in his dangerous career. Instead of adopting this method, let her address him in her kindest and sweetest tone, and in a manner as little calculated to offend him as possible. Let her gently lead him to converse upon the subject of his habits; and when the way is perfectly prepared, she can proceed to call his attention to the unhappiness which his present conduct is calculated to bring upon himself and his family. Let her advert to the virtuous and useful habits he formerly possessed—to the bright hopes they once cherished of prosperity and happiness, and to the danger that those hopes may be forever blasted. Strive to awaken, if possible, his finer sensibilities, his honorable and humane feelings—and when these have been brought into activity, then appeal to his love, his manhood, his good sense, his desire for prosperity and respectability, and beseech him in gentle, yet moving terms, to attempt a change in his tastes and habits. A conversation of this character should be pursued as long as she discovers that it is producing beneficial influences. But the moment she perceives that bitterness and acrimony are tincturing her own language, or that anger and resentment are arising in her husband, the conversation should immediately be changed—for all that would afterwards ensue, would be injurious. Wait patiently until another favorable opportunity occurs, when the same course should be pursued with equal caution and kindness. I pray the wife to believe me, that this, and this alone, is the plan she can adopt with any hope of success in reforming her husband, or in preventing him from adopting any improper practices to which he may be inclined. There is good reason to believe that many husbands have, in this manner, been saved from irretrievable ruin. But if this course will not result successfully, then nothing can accomplish the desired end.

I would again emphatically repeat, that a course of kindness and love is the only one the wife ought ever to adopt towards her husband. It will have the strongest possible tendency to cement the affection of a good husband, and encourage him in his commendable efforts to walk in the paths of virtue and probity: and, as I have already remarked, it will be the only line of conduct that can produce any favorable impressions upon one whose habits are, or are inclining to be, reprehensible. Like begets like. If the wife keeps her affection for her husband warm and active—if she strives to treat him with kindness and complacency, and forbearance, especially in those moments when he is irritable and fractious—if she overlooks his hasty words, and forgives his offences—the influence of this course will be to induce a similar spirit and disposition in him—and peace and harmony will reign throughout the habitation, and shed their sweet light into every heart. But when the wife allows herself to be peevish and irritable—when she permits every little circumstance which is not precisely pleasant in the affairs of the family, or the conduct of the husband, to arouse her anger and cause a flood of bitter denunciation to proceed from her tongue—it will awaken a similar disposition in her husband, and all those around her, and discontent and unhappiness will fill every heart. To be united to “a scolding wife,” is one of the greatest evils that can befall a poor mortal. A woman who, from morning until night, strains her lungs in an incessant strain of scolding, is a pest to her husband and her family, and affords a melancholy instance of the perversion of that “readiness of speech” which was given to woman as an ornament, and not as a means of torture to others. No wonder the husband of such a wife, on the most trifling pretext, flees from home as though it were a hated place! No wonder he visits the tavern and the grog-shop—no wonder he mingles with improper companions, and tarries late in their company! The “scolding wife” has made home distasteful to him—he has lost his love of domestic enjoyment—any other place on earth is preferable to him, provided it will screen his ears from the incessant din produced by that voice, which of all others, ought to sound the sweetest and most pleasant to him. The dissipation and ruin of many a husband may be directly traced to the “unruly tongue” of a termagant wife. Hence every prudent woman should strive to the utmost of her power, against what, the ladies will pardon me for saying, seems to be the besetting failing of the sex—or at least, one which vast numbers undoubtedly fall into.

Instead of pursuing any course calculated to offend or irritate her husband, a wife who is desirous that peace and happiness should dwell in her abode, will adopt another and a different line of conduct. She will avoid all scolding, all ranting, all fretfulness and peevishness, and strive to make herself agreeable to her husband, her family, and all with whom she has intercourse. This will be a very important object to her, for very much depends upon it. If a wife becomes disagreeable to her husband, from any cause whatever, an interruption to the happiness of both parties takes place. When the husband comes in, perplexed with business or fatigued with labor, how much depends upon the treatment he receives from his wife! She can depress his spirits still lower, and weary him with herself and his home, by being entirely indifferent to his feelings and regardless of his comforts—or she can chase the cloud of anxiety from his brow, and supply its place with a smile, and attach him still stronger to herself and his abode, by paying every attention to his convenience, striving to have all things in accordance with his liking, and endeavoring to make home as agreeable to him as possible. If he happens in an irritable moment to drop an ill-natured remark, she will not catch it up and retort upon him in full vengeance, but she will strive to soothe his irritability, and drive it away by her own pleasantness and forbearance. This is the very work for which a wife is intended, and for which she is peculiarly adapted. And she should strive to make herself agreeable in small things, as well as in matters of more importance. The greater amount of our actions, by far, consist in what may be termed trifling things. Hence the wisdom of the poet's exhortation—“Think nought a trifle, though it small appear;

Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles life. Your care to trifles give,
Else you may die ere you have learned to live.”

A certain writer most truly remarks—“A great portion of the wretchedness which has often embittered married life, I am persuaded, has originated in the neglect of trifles. Connubial happiness is a thing of too fine a texture to be handled roughly. It is a plant which will not even bear the touch of unkindness; a delicate flower which indifference will chill, and suspicion blast. It must be watered with a shower of tender affection, expanded with a glow of attention, and guarded by the impregnable barrier of unshaken confidence. Thus matured, it will bloom in every season of life, and sweeten even the loneliness of declining years.” “Never consider a trifle what may tend to please your husband. The greater articles of duty he will set down as his due; but the lesser attentions he will mark as favors; and trust me, for I have experienced it, there is no feeling more delightful to one's-self, than that of turning these little things to so precious a use.”

LOVE TO GOD.

BY REV. JAMES GALLAGHER.

“We love God, because he first loved us.”—1 JOHN iv: 19.

Such is the language of the beloved disciple John; and such should be the language (in truth and sincerity) of every professed Universalist.—John takes for granted that God did first love us. This is his foundation, and he gives it as the reason why he loved God. He had not received the spirit of fear but of love. Reader are you a Universalist? If so, you can say, you love God, because he first loved you? I do not inquire whether you believe in this principle, but do you live in accordance with it! Do you love God? It is idle for us to talk about what we should do, or why we should exercise love towards our Maker, unless we show evident signs that our faith in these principles is active. How shall we do this? “This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments.” How simple and plain! This is the evidence or proof of our love to God, that we “do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before him.” This is all he requires of us, and surely we can do thus much, especially when we reflect that it is intended for our good.

MATTER AND MIND.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

Philosophers tell us that matter is indestructible by human agency, and that we have no reason to suppose that a particle of it has ever been annihilated. We may, indeed, change it from one state to another; but in each it will retain all its essential properties. Under every form and mode of combination, it is inert, extended, dense, impenetrable, divisible and gravitating. It is known unto us only by these properties. Concerning its peculiar essence, we know nothing. And should it, under any modification, cease to possess those properties, we should cease to know it as matter.

Now can we suppose that the mind of man is more destructible than the body?—that our nobler part shall be blotted out by death, and cease to exist altogether, while our material frames under all the changes and modifications to which they may be subjected, will forever continue to exist in the possession of all their essential properties? The mind is that which thinks, reasons, remembers, loves and hates; and is known to us only by these properties: destroy them, and we can no longer recognize their existence. Now, can we annihilate mind, when we can not annihilate the least atom of matter? Can we destroy the properties of the former, while the essential properties of the latter are indestructible, and will ever continue? Will death put a final end to the former, while it can only change the latter? What is death? It is nothing more than a separation of what before was united—a dissolution of the copartnership between matter and mind.—Then, is it not more than reasonable to suppose, that mind will continue to possess its properties after death? Will a change of state annihilate its essential properties, when it can not those of matter? Will it not go on to think and remember forever? If it be material, it certainly must; and if it be immaterial, which we scarcely can doubt, it can not be inferior to matter; and hence, that which now thinks, will continue to think on, when this body shall have been dissolved into its primitive elements and scattered to the four winds.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN A PARTIALIST AND A UNIVERSALIST.

A Universalist, seated in the front room of his house, hears a loud rap at his door. He rises, opens the door, and who should enter but his neighbor Partialist, who is shown to a seat, and the following friendly conversation ensues, after the usual compliments.

U.—Neighbor P., I am truly happy to receive a friendly call from you, as I have resided in this place nearly a year, and have been entirely neglected by my Partialist neighbors. As you have now broken the ice, I have some reason to hope that I shall not be overlooked by others.

P.—True, I have not called on you before, though I have frequently thought of doing so.—But be assured that my neglect has not been the result of any unfriendly feeling. And perhaps I should not have called this morning had I not yesterday, for the first time in my life, attended your church. I had heard a good deal said, pro and con, in relation to the services of your church, the sentiments held forth there, etc., and I concluded to drop in once, and see and hear for myself.

U.—Well, did you hear any thing that displeased you, or caused you to regret your presumption in “dropping in” there?

P.—My dear Sir, I must decline at present to answer in full, the question you have proposed. I did not call so much for the purpose of answering as of asking questions. In relation to the discourse, however, which was founded on Psalms cxxiii: 1—“Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity”—I would say, that some things in it corresponded tolerably well with my idea of things; but there were a few observations I would like to hear more fully explained, before I concede to their correctness. And it was principally for this purpose that I have called on you this morning.

U.—Well, neighbor, you know it is much easier proposing questions than answering them; but I have no objection to making a trial. If my memory serves me, the preacher endeavored to show, from the fact that God is the Father of all men, and all men consequently brethren, that all men could and should “dwell together in unity.”

P.—Yes, that was the point which he endeavored to prove and enforce. And I am aware, as he said, that “Political strife, religious animosity, and domestic discord, excited by the fell spirit of lawless ambition in the attainment of power; clerical thirst for pre-eminence in matters of religion, carried on and encouraged at the expense of moral honesty and religious consistency, and ending generally in national wretchedness, desolation, cruelty, and premature death; have shook the world to its centre, and changed the moral character of man, who was made in the image of his Creator, into that of a demon, rendering his life a curse to himself and to the world he lives in.” But how shall this deplorable state of things be changed for the better? and how shall that degree of reform be effected which will enable the human family to say in reference to themselves, “Behold how good and how pleasant,” etc.

U.—I think, neighbor, you must have paid uncommon attention to the sermon, or you could hardly have made the verbatim extract which you have quoted, from memory. But no matter. I will endeavor as briefly as possible to answer your question. 1. Let mankind be induced to consider in what relation they stand to each other—that God is their common and universal Father—that they are all of one blood—in a word, that they are all really and truly brethren. 2. Let moral honesty, which is every where acknowledged to be “the best policy,” be carefully cultivated, cherished and promoted, in all civil, political, religious and domestic concerns. 3. Let truth, honor and virtue be indelibly inscribed as the universal motto upon the tablet of every human heart. Let the “pure and undefiled religion” of Jesus Christ, become the popular standard—the test of moral character and conduct; and let it be viewed by all as “the one thing needful,” and without which we can never become reconciled to God—to each other—and consequently, can never become good and joyful in life, and resigned and happy in death. Let the interest of each become the interest of all, and the predominating interest of all, the predominating interest of each. 6. Let principle instead of animal passion reign triumphant in the human breast; and this all important reformation will be effected, and moral evils and wretchedness will be swept from the ranks of men, and they will become again what they once were, innocent, friendly, peaceable, and happy children of God. Then would each recognize in his neighbor, a brother—a faithful friend—an upright citizen. Then would the long distracted and hostile kingdoms of this world, become united in the spirit of love and union, and participate in all the privileges, honors and blessings of the holy administration of the Prince of peace.

P.—I admit that if mankind would all be governed by the rules you have laid down, such a result as you have described, might ensue. But it appears to me that the most powerful means have been employed, and yet such a reformation hardly begins to dawn upon the world. An immense multitude of religious teachers have been engaged for centuries in efforts to bring about this much desired reformation in the social state, and yet but little has been accomplished towards such an improvement. These facts you will not deny. Then what is to be done to gain the object?

U.—I do not know but I shall lay too heavy a tax upon your patience; but, as the subject in hand is a very important one, and as you called for the purpose of hearing what I have to say in relation to it, I must detain you while I endeavor to explain your queries. To proceed, then, I would say, that of the distressing fact to which you allude, respecting the “immense number of religious teachers” that have flooded the world for centuries, their “efforts” and the appalling result, I am fully aware. But the great difficulty is, and ever has been, the mass of these pretended reformers have ever been striving to coerce their contemporaries by the most dreadful threats and unreasonable means, to adopt systems, civil, moral and religious, the practical influence of which has greatly served to increase rather than diminish the vices and miseries of the world.

P.—I begin to perceive, I think, the drift of your explanation. I have been induced to think, recently, that there may have been something wrong in the efforts which have been put forth to reform and evangelize the world; but I hardly dared to cherish the thought, as such reformers have claimed to be sent of God, and endowed with power from on high. But I would like to have you proceed in a statement of particulars respecting those reformers. A general statement does not fully satisfy me.

U.—Well, brother, since it is your wish, I will particularize. But I must deal plainly, and you must not be offended, nor charge me with a want of Christian charity, for no unfriendly feeling dwells in my heart.

The first particular is, those teachers have metamorphosed the merciful and mild religion of Jesus, into crude and cruel systems of sectarian aggrandizement, speculation and plunder. They have transformed the adorable character of our beneficent Father in heaven, into images of men, beasts and reptiles. And not content with this, they have so modelled and constructed civil governments, as to make them harmonize with the terrible government of their tyrannical divinities. And to cap the climax of their inconsistency and folly, they have misrepresented the nature of man, his mental faculties and moral powers; by which means, they have induced mankind to distrust the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Almighty, and to withhold their confidence from his words, his works, and his religion.

The second particular is; in this pretended work of reform, many who have attempted its promotion, have exerted all their energies to produce a moral revolution among their neighbors, while they have, perhaps, neglected entirely the improvement of their own hearts, and their own moral conduct. The fact is, all sectarian reformers have been too much prone to the work of reforming their neighbors, and too little to the important labor of reforming and evangelizing themselves. But the latent spark of human virtue and reason, which slumbers in the breast of intellectual beings, will, in due time, be kindled into a flame; the dormant energies of the human soul will be roused from their long sleep; man will arise to that exalted state of intellectual and moral purity for which he was originally designed, towards which he is travelling, and for which he is hoping. Yes, that long anticipated period will arrive, when “every valley shall be filled, every mountain be brought low; when the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways smooth, and all flesh shall see the salvation of God.”

P.—I am satisfied there is some truth in what you say about the course generally pursued by reformers; still I must think that among them have been found many good and sincere men, whose only object was to enlighten and benefit the souls of men.

U.—That there have been “good and sincere” individuals among them, I do by no means doubt. But what one may call good, another may call bad. So far as their moral conduct has partaken of the character of their intentions, it may be denominated good; for their intentions, to some extent, have evidently been good. But good intentions and perfect sincerity, are not enough in a religious reformer, whose ignorance, prejudice, and bigotry are notorious. Look at the case of Saul of Tarsus. No one can doubt the purity of his motives, or his sincerity; yet who of us would justify his unjust and cruel conduct towards the disciples of Jesus? Men must be enlightened by the spirit of truth, and imbued with the spirit of Gospel benevolence, before they are fit for reformers. “Every spirit begets its own likeness,” an Apostle tells us, and therefore, while public instructors act under the influence of false, partial and cruel theories, notwithstanding their sincerity, the public will exemplify the spirit of those theories; and in this way “brethren” can never “dwell together in unity.”

P.—Well, neighbor U., I am heartily glad I called; you have suggested some ideas that are somewhat new to me, but I think them worthy of some consideration and will carefully examine them. I should like to pursue this subject, and learn on what authority you predicate your belief that all mankind will finally be so reformed and purified as to “dwell together in unity;” but I have not time now. And since I have “broken the ice,” as you call it, I should be happy to receive a call from you, when we will pursue this matter a little further.

U.—Neighbor P., allow me to thank you for this friendly call, and to hope that nothing has been said to wound your feelings. I shall, life and health being spared, return your call, and we will then go into a consideration of the authority of which you speak. Exit P.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXIII.

OBADIAH. Obadiah prophesied after the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. He was contemporary with Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

JONAH. Jonah was the first of all the prophets after Moses, and the first who committed their predictions to writing. Samuel only wrote part of the historical book which bears his name; and Elijah and Elisha, though great prophets, wrote nothing.

Jonah lived in the time of Jeroboam, second king of Israel, and he delivered other predictions beside that which is the subject of this book. See 2d Kings xiv: 25.

MICAH. Micah prophesied under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. He was nearly contemporary with Isaiah—of his death we know nothing authentic.

NAHUM. Nahum lived in the reign of Hezekiah, and prophesied soon after the captivity of the ten tribes by Shalmanassar, king of Assyria. Josephus, however, places him in the reign of Jotham, and says his prophecies were fulfilled 115 years after.

HABAKKUK. Habakkuk was probably contemporary with Jeremiah. He foretold the desolation of his country by the Chaldeans, and the destruction of that nation afterwards.

Habakkuk iii: 3.—“God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran.” The prophet here alludes to the appearances of God in favor of his people in the wilderness. Teman was in Idumea, and Paran in Arabia Petra.

ZEPHANIAH. Zephaniah prophesied in the reign of king Josiah.

HAGGAI. Haggai, Zachariah and Malachi, prophesied after the return of the Jews from Babylon. All the other prophets preceded that event. Of his life and death nothing is known but what may be gathered from this book.

ZACHARIAH. Zachariah prophesied at the same time with Haggai, viz., in the reign of Darius Hystaspis. He was the son of Barachia, who, it is supposed, was one of the Zacharias mentioned in history, as having been slain by the people in the midst of the temple, or between the porch and the altar. See Matthew xxiii: 35. If this is so, Barachia must have had two names, which is no uncommon thing among the Jews. Josephus mentions one Baruch, who was slain under similar circumstances just before the taking of Jerusalem, and some are of the opinion that this was the one which Christ had reference to, and that what he said was prophetic.

Zachariah iii: 1.—“And he shewed me Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him.”

This was a vision, and Satan denotes those who were opposed to Joshua, his accusers or adversaries. See Ezra, chapters 4 and 5, by which it will appear that Tatnai and Sathar-boznai were his accusers or adversaries.

Verse 8. The Baruch here spoken of denotes the same person so denominated by Isaiah iv: 2, and Jeremiah xxiii: 5, and xxxiii: 14, to whose prophecies there is an allusion.

A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

BY HARRIET M. TORREY.

At an early period of American history, when the “wilderness world” was just beginning to attract the attention of the eastern continent, and emigration was sending its thousands across the “world of waters,” to become the founders of a new empire, Abraham Densmore, with his family, consisting of his wife, two children, and a maiden sister, bade farewell to the soil of Germany, and sought a new home among the Dutch settlements on the banks of the Hudson River. Unlike most of the early settlers of our country, he brought with him the ancient religious dogmas of his native land, and hugged close to his bosom the fetters of ignorance, superstition and bigotry. The dark frown which forever hung upon his brow, and the cold, cautious severity of his manner, caused him to become an object of dread and distrust to his neighbors, rather than a being to respect and admire. His dwelling was situated in a narrow yet beautiful valley, bordering on the Hudson, and its materials were such as are generally used by settlers in a new country. The logs were not hewn, and together with the chimney of rough stone, formed a complete wall on the north side of the house; a large clearing on the south and west gave evidence of Abraham's industry, and the acres of ripening grain, which well nigh concealed the blackened stumps and half burnt logs, were signs that the first difficulties of a new settlement were overcome, and that plenty was beginning to reward the toil of the laborer. A flourishing woodbine, trained by woman's tasteful hand, was traversing the logs in every direction, so as almost to conceal the exterior of the dwelling—within, the bark had been removed from the logs, and a coat of “white-wash” had taken its place. A rough bench occupied one corner of the room, and a capacious cupboard another—the crockery was arranged with a neatness peculiar to the “olden time”—and the unplanned floor was clean and comfortable. Aunt Mary, the maiden sister, was busied with her domestic avocations, while the mother, naturally of a delicate, fragile constitution, was reclining upon the bed. Her features were pale and melancholy, and she seemed like one, about to yield unresistingly to the embrace of death. A dark-haired girl of some five or six summers, was amusing herself with a playful kitten, while a noble looking boy of two summers more, was standing by his mother's bedside.

“Mother, mother,” said the urchin, “shall I come to you in that happier land, where you tell me you are going?” “Young child,” replied his mother, “my Albert, you shall come to me in that happier land; for our Father in heaven is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works; he causes the sun to shine, and the rain to fall, the earth to be covered with vegetation, and the beautiful flowers to bloom. We hear his voice alike in the gentle breeze, and in the awful roaring of the tempest; though unseen, he is ever present; he fills immensity, he guards you in your sleeping hours, and when you wake, his eye is upon you. He loves you, my child—love him and all shall be well with you. Albert, Albert,” continued the pale mother, drawing him closer to her side, “when I am gone, be mindful of your sister. Suffer not her youthful mind to be poisoned, nor her youthful pleasures to be embittered by the thought that there is an angry God, who waits to plunge her immortal spirit into a fathomless abyss of unending misery! But tell her that her Father is her changeless friend; that he is the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever. His love knoweth no end—his goodness is infinite, and his mercy is boundless as the works of his creation. Tell her to love him—to keep his commandments—to do unto others as she would have others do unto her, and then at last her spotless soul shall rest with me, in happiness above the skies.”

Years rolled their agitated tide back on the voiceless records of the past, and their pages were fraught with change. True, the same dark frown rested on Abraham's brow, yet when he thought he was unobserved by all save the eye of Jehovah, a big tear would trickle down his sunburnt cheek, and a sigh heave his broad bosom. No one inquired the cause of this, and he passed on unmolested. Albert, after laboring untiringly to impress his mother's principles on the mind of his young sister, complied with the wishes of his father, and recrossed the “world of waters,” to complete his education in the land of his ancestors. The log house had disappeared, and a beautiful brick dwelling had taken its place. The lovely landscape was no longer soiled or deformed by the appearance of blackened stumps or half burnt logs. The shrubbery around the dwelling was arranged with a mixture of ancient and modern taste, which gave it a singular yet beautiful appearance. The walks were handsomely gravelled, and the old woodbine had been carefully preserved, and was now lazily stretching itself over the capacious front of the house. Green shutters of the latest fashion ornamented the windows, and the interior of the dwelling was elegantly furnished. A few rods west of the house, was a cluster of weeping willows, hanging over the paling of a small enclosure, which contained all that was mortal of the wife and mother. Within, a female form might be seen bending over the grave; she was not what the world would call beautiful—yet she was lovely. Her dark eyes beamed with intelligence, and her noble, ingenious countenance bespoke a soul capable of elevated thought and exalted sentiment. Her hands were pressed upon her bosom, and her eyes were raised to heaven. “Father in heaven,” she murmured, “hear, O hear the orphan's prayer, and cause her sorrowing heart to rest in peace. Let persecution cast its pointed shafts, and with its venom pierce my inmost soul—still let me know that thou art near—that thou art my Friend, my Guide, my God—still let me hear thy voice, like music in the tempest's rage, whispering peace, be still, to each rising passion, and each murmuring thought. Guard me from harm through life's uncertain voyage, and when death's solemn shades I near, may I, like her whose body now lies mouldering back to dust beneath this grassy sod, resign my breath with joy. My mother's faith and hope be mine—her death—her resurrection—her home in heaven.” She ceased to speak, and with a trembling voice sung the following lines.

“Blest shade of my mother, look down from above
And smile on Eliza, in pity and love—
The child of thy heart a lone mourner appears.
And moistens thy grave with her sorrowing tears.

O, had I the wings of an angel, I'd go,
And leave this low valley of sorrow below;
On the breezes of evening how sweetly I'd rise
To meet thee, my mother, in yonder bright skies.

How mournfully sweet to my listening ear,
Comes the voice of the nightingale, plaintive and clear,
My spirit would mingle in sympathy sweet,
In tear drops dissolving, forever would weep.

Blest shade of my mother, look down from above.
And smile on Eliza in pity and love—
Soon, soon may she follow thy path to the skies,
From earth and its sorrows to glory arise.”

Scarcely had the soft accents of her voice dissolved in the evening air, when Abraham's hand was laid upon her shoulder. “Child, child,” said he, “no more of this, no more of this. Have done with these evening rhapsodies and these moonlight wanderings. Why, why should you, who can hardly remember your mother's death scene, cling so tenaciously to her obnoxious principles? Come, obey your father's commands, throw aside your damnable heresy, and become a true daughter of the Church.”

“Father,” replied Eliza with an agitated voice, “too well do I remember the mournful scene to which you allude. Even now, methinks, I feel the dewy pressure of her lips to mine, my hand is clasped in hers, I see her pale, beautiful features, and hear her saying, ‘Father, thy child is coming home; take her, O take her to thy promised rest!’—and then how my young heart bled, when I saw her enclosed within the narrow coffin, and laid in this cold, this silent grave! These scenes I remember well; and never, until the throbbings of this heart shall cease—this form, like hers, lie mouldering in the grave, shall I forget them! And then,” continued she, “like the flowers, which bloom to die, and die to bloom again, will I rise immortal, to dwell with her, with you, and with a ransomed world, in peace and happiness forever."

"My child," said Abraham, "give up these foolish, these impious whims; they are deceptions—a snare laid by Satan to ensure your eternal destruction." "Nay, dear Father," replied Eliza, "say not thus. My Bible tells me that Jehovah's word is sure and steadfast. That what he has promised, he will fulfil. He has promised rest to the sons of man. He has promised, that in the fulness of the dispensation of times, all things shall be gathered together in Christ Jesus; that he will bring his sons from afar, and his daughters from the ends of the earth; that sin shall be finished, transgression shall come to an end, and that all flesh shall praise the Lord. O, father, how sweet, how precious are these promises! and why, why should we disbelieve them?"

"Child," said Abraham, "cease thus to pervert the teachings of that sacred book. How, how will you appear at the day of judgment? The veil will then be withdrawn from your eyes, and too late you will find that you are lost, ruined, damned forever, and forever!" He turned and abruptly left the place.

Eliza paused until the echo of his footsteps died away, and then with a heart oppressed with pity and sorrow, sought the peaceful solitude of her chamber, where we will leave her for awhile to witness a brief interview between Abraham and his sister.

Aunt Mary was sitting by the parlor window, biting her lips with some inward vexation, while Abraham was pacing the room with heavy and measured tread. His eyes were bent upon the floor, and the agitation of his countenance spoke of conflicting passions within. "If the child goes on in this way," said Aunt Mary, "she is ruined. And I should think it was time to stop such work as this; for my part I don't care about living where a heretic, and that, too, of the deepest dye, bears the sway. If she was a daughter of mine, she would know her duty, and that, too, without delay." "Sister," said Abraham, "I know not what to do, I know not how to act. When I command, she reasons; when I entreat, she pleads; she is mild, yet firm as a rock. She is dear to me as my own heart's blood—I can not—will not send her an outcast from her father's house. O, that I had removed her from her brother's influence, before he had so deeply poisoned her mind with her mother's heresy! My children, my children," cried he, striking his clenched hands upon his broad bosom, "would to God ye had never been born—that ye had never beheld the light of day! The curse of Heaven is upon you, and ye will bring your father's grey hairs with sorrow to the grave."

"Well," said Aunt Mary, rising, "you know your duty, and if you do it not, the curse of an incensed God will rest on you and yours forever!" So saying, she left the room.

Again we change the scene. The rising moon cast its beams upon the sleeping waters of the Hudson, and threw a mellow, sickly lustre, upon the surrounding scenery. A faint light beamed from the parlor windows of Abraham's dwelling, while all within was silent as the grave, save the occasional moanings of the sinking invalid. The physician stood bending over the couch, and in his countenance might be read, "there is no hope." Abraham stood near, apparently unconscious of all that was passing around him. A deep, settled, unearthly gloom was upon his countenance, and he seemed like one "stricken to the very soul."

"Has he come?—I heard some one," murmured the sick girl, and the next moment Albert was by the side of his dying sister—her hand was clasped in his, and the almost audible throbbings of his heart, told the deep workings of a brother's soul. "They told me you were coming," said the dying girl, gathering strength from excitement, "but I feared you would be too late. My spirit still lingers here, but it will not linger long. I am going to my changeless home—even to my Father's house in heaven. I am going where my mother has gone, to dwell with her forever. Albert," continued she, a heavenly smile playing upon her countenance, "death has no terrors for me. I fear not to die, for my Saviour has passed through the grave before me, and robbed it of its gloom. O, how sweet, how consoling in this hour, is that faith which tells us we shall meet again—that we shall be re-united with our friends and kindred, and eventually gathered with the families of the earth to an inheritance incorruptible, and that fadeth not away!"

She ceased to speak, and insensibility for a moment came over her. At length her lips moved, "I see, thee," she murmured, "blest shade of my mother! I see the bright hosts around you! I hear the sweet music of the heavenly choir! I come! I come!" she cried, and throwing her arms around her brother's neck, she breathed her last sigh upon his bosom.

"How beautiful is death! How sweetly has the departing spirit left the impress of its future destiny upon the smiling countenance of its forsaken clay! Why should I mourn, why should I weep for thee, my sister, for I know thy spotless soul has gone to a better world. Angels are thy companions, and the society of the blessed in heaven is thine. The voice of unkindness will no more reach thine ear—the venomous shafts of persecution will no more deprive thy soul of rest. Thou art gone in the brightness of thy youth—yet thy example still lives, thy virtues will be long remembered, by the few that knew their excellence, and the roses will freshen and blossom upon thy grave, watered with the tears of affection. Thy mother's virtue and goodness has been thine—her life, her death, her resurrection, and her home in heaven—all are thine. Her precepts have been thy guide, and her influence has indeed rested upon thee. Therefore rest in peace; and when I shall have lived mine appointed time, I too will die, and come to that happier world, where you have gone before me."

Thus mused Albert, as he gazed upon the clay cold form of his sister, and saw her shrouded in the habiliments of death. And when the sods of the valley rested upon her bosom, he would often visit her grave, and moisten it with the chaste tears of a brother's love. His days, though not long, were prosperous, and he went down to his grave "wept and honored." Abraham, oppressed with the weight of griefs and years, was laid by the side of his daughter, ere the grass had time to freshen upon her grave. Aunt Mary lived a number of years, a torment to herself and to all around her, and at last fell a victim to the disease called a Guilty Conscience.

NEVER ALONE.

BY MISS H. STONE.

It has been truly said that "some are never less alone than when alone," and it may with as much truth be said some are never more alone, than when surrounded with thousands. How many are there in the crowded hall—in the midst of merriment, noise, and bustle, who retire within themselves and are lost to every thing around them—their spirits soaring far away from such scenes of heartless enjoyments! O, there is a blessedness in the thought of being alone—alone with one's own self. How sweet to hold communion with the great I AM and with our own hearts—to meditate on the past with its joys and its sorrows, to take warning from past offences, and with new resolutions begin to live better lives, forsaking all known sins, thereby gaining fresh vigor and strength to run the race which is set before us!

To the true Christian it must ever be the highest satisfaction to be at times retired from the world, to call home the wandering thoughts and fix them on the glorious Gospel—its requirements, its hopes, its joys, and its final triumphs over all sorrow, sin and death. Such hours I pray Heaven be mine—next to life and health I prize them.

JUDAS ISCARIOT'S THRONE.

A correspondent asks our views on Matthew xix: 28—whether Judas was not promised a throne, as well as the other apostles; and where this throne was to be? The language of the text is somewhat obscure in our common version, and dependent on the punctuation. It may mean, "ye that have followed me in the regeneration, shall sit upon twelve thrones, when the son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory"—or it may mean, "ye that have followed me, shall sit on twelve thrones, in the regeneration, (that is to say) when the Son of man," etc. The regeneration in the former case, would mean the renovating labors of Jesus during his personal ministry—in the latter case, the renovation of the world by the introduction and spread of Christianity dunnirring tee Christian dispensation. So that in either case, in my opinion, Judas may be included in the promise. But if the regeneration is construed as a personal "change of heart," (as many of our Partialist brethren contend,) then Judas may be excluded; but this view would prove that even Jesus needed a change of heart!—a conversion to belief in himself and his mission!!—before he could enter his own kingdom!!—an absurdity which few of our Partialist brethren will be willing to advocate, even to exclude Judas Iscariot. My answer then is, that Judas was probably included in the promise—though there is some reason to believe that he was superseded in that office by Matthias—of which, more anon.

The nature and locality of these thrones are not clearly understood—in my opinion, are frequently mistaken by our brethren. They are not literal, no more than the throne of God, or of Jesus, is literal. The word is used as a figure to denote a spiritual authority—a power of ruling and giving decision. Christ's coming to judge Israel, in this case, was only a spiritual coming, in the clouds of heaven. And as the office of judgment here conferred on the apostles is connected with it, and confined to the twelve tribes of Israel, it appears reasonable to suppose that their thrones and judging would be of the same nature. As the Queen of the South, and the people of Nineveh were to rise up in judgment against that generation, by a strong contrast of their easy conviction under Solomon and Jonah, with the hardness of heart manifested by the Jews—so might the readiness of the apostles to receive and follow Jesus as the Messiah, and their testimony in favor of his Messiahship, be the judgment they would give against the twelve tribes who rejected (and would continue to reject) Jesus. That testimony, embodied in the New Testament, being the power which would ultimately bring the twelve tribes into the embrace of and obedience to Jesus as the Christ, may also be alluded to by these thrones—emblems of authority and government. If this view is correct—and I think it has strong claims to be so considered—then the thrones are now set for judgment—have been so set in the Christian dispensation for nearly 1800 years, and will continue standing, occupied by the twelve apostles, until the object is accomplished for which they were erected. And as the testimony of Judas (including all his actions and words) is not the least powerful, I see not why he may not be considered one of the occupants.

There are two other questions proposed by our correspondent, connected with the case of Judas; but to avoid a long article, and as they are distinct from the subject above considered, I reserve the answer to them for a future number.

MIRTH AND THOUGHTLESSNESS.

It is not to be questioned, that the human mind, in this state of existence, from its very nature, requires the aliment of mirth and rejoicing. Hence the readiness with which we escape from long and tedious occupations, from laborious study, from the duties of the sick room, to lighter and more gleesome pursuits. Hence the occasional attempt, even by the staid and sober, to extract sport out of solemn subjects, and to laugh at those accidents which place a fellow creature in a ridiculous, and to him mortifying condition. There is, perhaps, no condition in which any of us would be less likely to laugh, than in that of being compelled to measure our locomotive powers against "rude Bores," when he has mischievously snatched our hat away from us. But there are some who can not witness such a scene with any degree of stern composure, but feel their risible faculties excited beyond control. They laugh not at the accident, but at the circumstance. They laugh, not because they rejoice at the vexation of their neighbor, but because the mind is predisposed to that kind of exercise. But the poor man who has thus given them an occasion for mirth, feels as though he should have liked them better, on that particular occasion, if they had been under a league never to look good natured as long as they should live. And we confess that more refined mirth would be less annoying to the embarrassed.

But excess of mirth does not militate against the soundness of the principle that a light heart is better than a full purse, and a smooth countenance than honied words. We acknowledge this, when we require of our associates kindness, courtesy, and good nature. We can enjoy ourselves better, our minds are more gratified than when we have to contend against our sympathy for the gloomy and desponding. We acknowledge it also, when we see one whose downcast countenance, and vacant stare, and disconnected sentences, show how little he enjoys our presence, and we pronounce him a prey to mental disorder. We say, then, that from our estimate of the mental constitution of man, we have not the least objection to the seasonable, merry laugh, the well timed joke, or even the light and casual expression, whose meaning is that of friendship and kindness, indicated by the manner, and not by the words only. Even in the sick room, we have known a light and unconcerned expression, give a pleasant turn to the thoughts and hopes of the poor patient, that he had not the power to do himself, and if not his words, at least his eyes, as they brightened up from their desponding heaviness, expressed his gratitude for the welcome interference. However, in this, as in all other cases, we must exercise prudence and judgment.

So it is with the preacher, in the discharge of his duties as a minister of the everlasting Gospel; his business is to do good, and though rudeness and frivolity should never enter into his character, so neither should a morose, and stern, and repulsive temper mark his deportment and feelings. He ought always to be glad to see his fellow beings, and especially the people of his charge. If then, he has not these feelings, he is not fit for a minister of the Gospel, and if he must not, or does not manifest them, he had better take up the profession of a hypocrite at once, and let mankind know that while he would pass for one of the world, its common courtesies even are regarded as beneath his assumed dignity. At the social gathering of friends, especially, do we expect to find pleasantness, cheerful voices, and happy faces. A stump at a feast, would make a better impression, and be regarded as a more agreeable companion, than a sly, jealous looker-on, who said nothing, and gave every body the liberty of supposing that he was secretly impugning motives, and cowardly sneering at customs which he dare not reprove.

Let me not be misunderstood. Even in the party circle, where colloquial festivity and social glee prevail, there may be, and is, excess. Such, for instance, is the practice of wasting whole evenings in talking nonsense, merely to entertain company, and appear agreeable; and that, too, when it is evident that the speaker is the only one who feels at all interested in the subject matter in hand. Only think of being surrounded by some dozen or fifteen companions, all talking for the sake of talk, and laughing for the sake of merriment, and yourself vainly watching for something that is laughable, or listening for a word that you can understand. We do not expect one to talk philosophy when he will be stunned by the loud laugh, or annoyed by the searching repartee. But on all occasions of joy, there is a sort of laughing philosophy, that is far preferable to garrulity. The Saviour said, "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Only let the heart be right, and while it certainly will not be gloomy and morose, it will also be able to express its gladness, and its satisfaction, befitting the occasion, and without unbecoming rudeness, or injudicious and undignified mirth.

Turn over the picture, and see if there is nothing more wanting. This life presents to the eye a variety of incidents, of every shade and texture. As the beautiful flowers of summer are nipt by the cold frosts of winter, so are the prospects of human life dimmed by its reverses. It is our duty to be prepared for the latter, that we may meet them with that cheerfulness which is the heart's native treasure. It is our duty to think deeply and solemnly on the powers which we have, the privileges which we enjoy, and the mutations which surround us. Hence, though peaceful and happy, we can not always be light and laughing. These are the outbreaks which come from the heart in the fervor of its accumulated love and gladness. They are the occasional flowers which bloom along the journey of life to give variety to its incidents, and beauty to its scenery. When dark clouds are over and around us, we must be sober. Peter exhorted some of his brethren to this effect: "Be sober," says he, "be vigilant, because your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." They were young, and their hearts buoyant, and might overlook the temptations that were about them, and the persecutions that environed them. Therefore they were to be sober. For unless they were so, instead of soberness and vigilance, which might yet be companions of a joyful heart, they might exchange their untimely mirth for gloom, and sorrow, and despair. So in respect to the natural hilarity of the human heart. Excess of laughter produces tears, and excess of mirth is often succeeded by despondency. To prevent these extremes, and strengthen the mind against temptation, it must have its serious and thoughtful moments—thoughtful at all times, but then, solemnly thoughtful. It must reflect upon its present condition, its opportunities, and its duties—what it is, what it would be, and what it should be, and so prepare itself for the varied events of life. Thus we should labor to establish ourselves in a uniform and consistent degree of spiritual enjoyment, and in the midst of this, comport ourselves with outward manifestations of joy or seriousness, according to our duty, our necessities, and the circumstances which surround us. ## AN OBJECTION TO PARTIALISM.

It is a well known fact that there is no doctrine held by the so called evangelical denominations, that is so violently and steadily supported by the Partialist portion of community, as the doctrine of endless punishment. The support and use of this doctrine constitute a large portion of the labors of Partialist clergymen. The doctrine of endless punishment, say they, is so necessary to vindicate the character of God for justice—is the only restraint on the sinful passions of men—is so plainly taught in the Bible, and was and is so generally believed among Jews and Christians, that he is not a minister of the Gospel who denies it.

Now if Partialists are correct in these views, the course pursued by Christ and his apostles while on earth, and by their opposers, the Scribes and Pharisees, seems to me to have been remarkably strange. It is generally held by them as an undeniable fact, that all these, believed in endless misery in a future state, as a punishment for crimes committed in this life. And it is a fact, denied by none, I believe, that the Scribes and Pharisees were the bitter and unrelenting enemies and persecutors of Jesus and his disciples—that they treated them as deceivers and impostors, deserving of every penalty inscribed in the Law, and worthy of the direst punishment divine vengeance could inflict. It is a fact, also, that Jesus and his apostles failed not to rebuke them faithfully, and to warn them of the punishments that must overtake them for their hypocrisy and wickedness. Now, if the doctrine of endless punishment in another state of being, for sins committed in this life, is as true, as necessary for restraining the wicked, and as useful as a vindication of God's justice and holiness, as Partialists contend it is, is it not remarkable that in the whole history of the labors and sayings of Jesus, we find no such language as Partialists use at the present day? Jesus nor his apostles ever said to the Scribes and Pharisees, "You will be punished in another world for your wickedness in this—God will roast your souls in an endless hell—if you do not repent before you die, you will open your eyes in an endless hell—if you sin away your day of grace, or pass away this state of probation, without getting religion, you will certainly go to an endless hell, where God's mercy never extends, and where hope is unknown—if you die finally impenitent, endless torments must be your portion—if you are not born again before you leave this life, your eternal destiny will be fixed in sorrow and despair among devils, fiends and flames—if you die in your sins, where God and his Christ are you can never come, for as the tree falls, so it shall lie, and as death leaves us, so judgment finds us, and from hell there is no redemption." All these expressions are very common in our day among believers in endless misery. I repeat it, therefore, that it seems to me very strange, if Jesus and his apostles were Partialists, that they did not use these and similar expressions in their conversations with the wicked Scribes and Pharisees. But is there the least evidence—even so much as a hint, that the Saviour or his apostles ever believed that the Scribes and Pharisees lived in a state of probation for eternity, or would go to an endless hell? No!

Nor is the conduct of the Scribes and Pharisees less remarkable, if they supposed the doctrine of endless misery to be taught in the Bible, and deemed it as important a doctrine as Partialists now do. They deemed Jesus and his apostles, deceivers—yet where did they sentence either to ceaseless woe? When did they ever tell any of the people who were disposed to follow and believe in Jesus, that they would incur endless damnation, or endanger the salvation of their immortal souls, by doing so? Where do we find them accusing the Saviour of leading hundreds down to an endless hell?

Here, then, we have the fact staring us in the face, of the most wicked people in the world, needing all the restraints to keep them from sin, and yet the faithful Jesus never warning them of the danger of an endless hell—of sinning away their day of probation, etc., etc. How shall we—how can we account for these facts—how explain why such wicked men as the Pharisees, did not denounce endless damnation on the Saviour, as well as the curses of their Law? Perhaps R. W., whose objection to Universalism we mentioned in No. 16, current volume, can give us an answer—but we fear it is only "perhaps"—or, if he fails, can some other person be found who will reconcile these facts with the important doctrine of endless misery?

It will be seen that I have drawn largely on the language of R. W. in framing this article. I did so, solely because in replying to him, I did not embrace in that reply all I wished to say on the subject. I think I have now fairly turned the tables on the objector—and though this mode of arguing may not be altogether a fair one—or, if fair, not the best calculated to elicit truth—yet I think the objection to Partialism to be a little stronger than R. W.'s objection to Universalism.

BR. BARRAY'S SERMON.

I am very sorry that wrong information in regard to the sermon in our last paper, led me to write the notice then published. The information was, that the same sermon had previously appeared in the Union—whereas it now appears, by a letter from Br. Barry, that it was not the dedication sermon, but his sermon on the opening of the house in Homer, which appeared in the Union. I regret it the more, because Br. Barry considers the notice itself unkind, whereas I intended no unkindness—and carefully exonerated him from all intentional wrong or impropriety, in the article itself. And could I have believed that the publisher and readers of the Union would not think us guilty of cribbing, I would not have noticed it at all. The information was received, as stated, at a late hour—I had no copy of the Union to look to—and I had (and have) no reason to doubt the honesty or good will of my informant toward Br. Barry—and consequently wrote the hurried notice, with no design to injure any one. I feel regret, but no remorse, thank God, in the matter—and pray to be forgiven by those who may feel offended, as I forgave when I thought I had some reason to be offended by what I deemed an act devoid of intention to give me offence.

A. B. G.

P. S. In regard to postage, mentioned incidentally as one of the useless matters in that supposed affair, I would state again, what I stated at the time the sermon was received, that Br. B. paid all the postage demanded on the package at the time of mailing it—we paid the extra postage only, which was added at this postoffice. I find, on looking at my notice of the sermon last given, that it states differently—the fact is as here stated. I may add, that we do not ask those whom we personally solicit and engage to write for the paper, (of whom Br. B. is one,) to pay postage on their communications. Knowing whose they are, we take them from the office, and cheerfully pay the postage.

THE LOST BOY.

Velorus Alonzo Osborn Thorp, who was noticed in No. 9, current volume, has not yet been found. He left the Rev. Liscomb Knapp's, Royalton, Niagara county, N. Y., on the 16th of November, at sundown, probably with the intention of returning to his mother, as he was seen on the towpath, a mile east of Mr. K.'s, the same evening, going east. He must have got on board of a boat soon after, as Mr. K.'s son went on horseback after him, immediately on receiving the information, which was soon after dark, and rode four miles on the towpath, inquired at every house and hailed every boat on the way, but could find nothing of him. He took a small dog with him which returned from the east after eleven days; which we think is an evidence that he was not drowned immediately after leaving Royalton. We think he must have passed Rochester in the night, and was carried on to the east, and as the boats lay up soon after, has had no opportunity of returning. We appeal to the humanity of the public generally, residing on or near the canal, from Royalton to Albany, and from Syracuse to Oswego, and especially to all boat captains and boatmen, to recollect, if possible, whether they have seen or can discover him, and convey the least information concerning him, to his afflicted widowed mother, Sophronia Thorp, or his grandmother, Achsah Osborn, residing in Rochester, New-York—who, we fear, are sinking to the grave with grief, suspense and anxiety, in consequence of this sad calamity. He probably calls himself Alonzo O. Thorp, is ten years old, thick set, brown hair, black eyes, reads well and is fond of books.

REMARKS.—We give the above in its amended form, to prevent misunderstanding, and to incite to a further search. To the esteemed writer, we say—ours is not an advertising sheet—we refuse advertisements uniformly, whatever pay may be offered for their insertion; and where we give them as notices, it is done gratis. A single editorial notice, I consider better calculated to arrest attention, than an advertisement inserted for weeks in the advertising columns of a common paper.

From this rule we can not depart, without creating a precedent which, if we deal equally, would fill our paper with advertisements, repeated weekly for months together, to the injury of its usefulness in the cause to which it is devoted. Were the case my own, I would not occupy more room in this paper than I have freely granted in this case. As to the discontinuance, or being reproached for a want of feeling, because I would not do for another what I would not do for myself, they were deemed ungrateful, but probably ignorantly so, and therefore are forgiven. I hope all who see this notice, will make some inquiry respecting the boy, and if they know any thing of him, will send word to his mother. If they will not do it for one notice, they will hardly do so were the notice given oftener. A. B. G.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. B. Morse has removed from Haverhill to Orford, N. H. Br. W. H. Griswold, (late of this State,) from Andover to North Reading, Mass. Br. S. Laws from Felchville to Springfield, Vt. Br. P. Hathaway from Ballston to Amsterdam, N. Y. Br. C. H. Fay has commenced his labors as pastor of the Society in Woodstock, Vt., Br. Streeter laboring with the Society in the South part of the town. Rev. A. C. L. Arnold has dissolved his connexion with the Universalist society in Essex, and commenced his labors as pastor of the Unitarian society at Fall River, Mass. Rev. M. H. Smith's connexion with the Universalist society in Salem, Mass., has also been dissolved.

Br. Thos. S. Bartholomew has removed from Brooklyn, Pa., to Victor, Ontario county, N. Y. Editors and others are requested to direct their favors to the latter place. Br. Bartholomew enters upon the pastoral charge of the society in that place, on the first Sunday in May.

Br. J. K. Ingalls has accepted an invitation to remove from Providence, R. I., and settle with the society in Southold, Long Island. Br. J. N. Parker has removed from Yarmouthport, Mass. Br. N. Gunnison, from Provincetown, Mass., to Manchester village, N. H. (Amoskeag.)

Br. H. Bacon was installed pastor of the society in Marblehead, Mass., on the 8th inst. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner.

Br. Asher Moore was installed as Pastor of the Lombard-street society, in Philadelphia City, on the 5th inst. Sermon by Br. J. H. Gibon, aided in the services by Br. Perry and the candidate.

Br. S. W. Fuller's health improving—able to sit up—hopes entertained that he may recover.

A Union house at Ossipee corner, N. H., erected by Universalists, Calvinists, and Freewill Baptists, was dedicated on March 26th. Sermons by Rev. J. S. Winter, Calvinist; Elder Chick, Freewill Baptist; and Br Robert Bartlett, Universalist.

The corner stone of the Universalist house in Newburyport, Mass., was laid on the 31st ult., with appropriate ceremonies. Address by Br. H. Ballou.

Br. Geo. Proctor, of Sterling, Mass., a young man of great promise, has commenced preaching the restitution of all things.

Br. Cobb professes inability to understand Br. Everett's arguments in their controversy, and waits for an explanation—and Br. Everett says he waits until he can find an abolitionist who can understand his meaning without an explanation. Thus ends this beginning of a controversy!

The second volume of the Layman's Legacy, now in press, will make a volume of about 500 pages—and will contain nearly double the quantity of reading contained in the first volume. It will be ready in a few days. Price, single $1.25—per dozen $12.

Br. L. L. Sadler, as we learn by a pamphlet lately received, is not idle in Troy. Rev. Mr. Levings, Methodist, preached against Universalism, March 8th. He refused to permit a reply to the same congregation—to re-deliver it in the Universalist house, or to loan a copy of his manuscript. But two "cheils" had been "among them takin' notes," and faith they've prented them! Br. Sadler publishes Mr. Levings's arguments one by one, accompanying each with a brief, pertinent and conclusive reply.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. WHITAKER in Salisbury Corners, and in Nicholsville in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in May by Br. CHAMBERLAIN in Bridgewater—Br. GROSH in Taberg—Br. S. J. GIBSON near Br. Crandall's, East Green.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May by Br. CHAMBERLAIN in Vernon—Br. D. BIDDLECOM in Alder Creek.

POETRY.

RESTITUTION HYMN.

We copy the following hymn in compliance with a particular request. Our friends will find it in the "Hymns of Zion," a work, by the way, which contains a very superior collection of hymns, together with a goodly variety of most excellent music. Indeed we could select from 197 tunes, a half dozen which, alone, are worth the price of the book.

Come, then, O my soul, meditate on that day,
When all things in nature God's voice shall obey;
The trumpet shall sound, and the dead all arise,
To dwell in the kingdom of life in the skies.

With wonder and joy, every eye shall behold
The portals of light and of glory unfold!
Heav'n's arches shall ring—the Saviour appear—
The news of salvation shall greet every ear.

The deaf shall all hear, and the dumb shall all sing;
The blind shall discover that Jesus is King:
The lame shall all walk, and the mourners rejoice—
The poor and the simple believe in his voice.

No thunders of wrath or of terror shall roll,
But breathings of mercy shall gladden each soul;
Our Lord shall be crowned the Redeemer of men,
And all shall unite in a joyful Amen!

All evil destroyed, every sorrow shall cease,
And all men rejoice in the fulness of peace;
Redeemed of the Lord, they his love shall extol,
And God in his glory shall be ALL IN ALL.

MELANCHOLY MOMENTS.

BY MARY EMILY JACKSON.

"I would not live always! I ask not to stay
Where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way:
The few lurid mornings that dawn on us here,
Are enough for Life's woes, full enough for thy cheer."

Thou art gone, bright and beautiful summer, with thy green leaves and roses, to be here no more for a season. Thou hast borne them all hence upon the winds, to rest a few short hours in oblivion, and then come back in all their sweetness to the longing earth. Even as the fond participants of my happiness have passed one by one, and left this lone heart a gloomy unlighted sepulchre, so hast thou past away. And, shall I be here when the warm sunshine of spring breaks up the rude frosts of winter, and unlocks the icy fetter which have stayed the rivers in their course, and stopped the wild gush of fountains? when all nature again smiles and puts on her garment of green—shall I then be here to pluck the first spring flowers upon moor and mountain? Ah! who may tell? Yes, who may look forward to thy coming and say "I shall be here?"—Some unforeseen pestilence, some hidden blow from the hand of him who created the universe of worlds, and he who is the All-seeing Ruler of our destinies, may bear us hence to be here no more for ever. The song of birds may be heard again in the forest; and the hum of bees upon the wild flowers, unwitnessed but by a few of those that now feel that thou art gone. Who of the gay circle that now smiles around me, may be dwellers in this earth when thou again visitest it? Thy balmy winds may sigh over them, and the dew-drops rest sweetly upon the long grass that overshadows them; and I, even I, may be one of those who have passed away! yet who would live for ever? Who would not rather die, when the ties which bind us here are yet unbroken: when our early affections are yet un tarnished and our fond hearts are still glowing with the warm impulse of youth, unchilled by the lapse of time? Who would not pass away, whilst life is yet bright with the flowers of existence, and friendship has not grown cold? Ah! why do we cling to earth! when the warm currents of life are frozen and our time worn and channelled brows wear the deep impress of age; when the rude frosts of our decline have stolen each flower of beauty, and fitted our grey heads for the tomb; why do we still dread the coming of death, and say we are not yet ready? True, thou mayest come again; thy beautiful flowers may spring up, when the earth and green leaves may thrill to the music of the birds; the fountains may gush forth from their chains, and the young streams leap to their own murmurs. But not like unto this age. Death is the only restorer, and who would not hail it as the high boon of Him who created all things!

ADVICE TO WIVES.—By J. A. JAMES.—Economy and order in the management of her personal and domestic expenditures, are the obvious duties of a wife.

You are to preside in the direction of household affairs, and much of the prosperity and comfort of the little community will depend upon your skilful and prudent arrangements. A showy, luxurious, and expensive taste, is almost universally cherished, and is displayed in innumerable instances, where there are no means to support it. Christian families are in most imminent peril of worldly conformity in the present day; and the line of demarcation between the church and the world is fast wearing out. It is true they have no cards: they do not frequent the theatre, or the ball-room; and, perhaps, they have no mid-night routs; but this is all: for many are as anxious about their furniture, the fashion of their habits, the expensiveness of their entertainments, as the veriest worldling can be. Now a wife has a great influence in checking or promoting all this. It has been thought that this increasing disposition for show and gaiety, is to be attributed chiefly to female vanity. It is woman that is generally regarded as the presiding genius of such a scene, she receives the praise and the compliment of the whole, and she, therefore, is under the strongest temptation to promote it. But let her consider how little all this has to do with the happiness of the family, even in its most prosperous condition: and how a recollection of it aggravates the misery of adversity, when a reverse takes place. Then to be found in debt for finery of dress and furniture; then to have it said that her extravagance helped to ruin her husband; then to want that for bread, which was formerly wasted on luxury; then to hear the whispered reproach of having injured others by her own thoughtless expenditure! Avoid, my female friends, these miseries; do not go on to prepare wormwood and gall to embitter still more the already bitter cup of adversity. Endeavor to acquire a skillfulness in domestic management, a frugality, a prudence, a love of order and neatness, a midway course between meanness and luxury, a suitableness to your station in life, to your Christian profession, an economy which shall leave you more to spare for the cause of God and the miseries of man. Rather check than stimulate the taste of your husband for expense; tell him that it is not necessary for your happiness, nor for the comfort of the family; draw him away from these adventitious circumstances, to the mental improvement, the moral culture, the religious instruction of your children. Let knowledge, piety, good sense, well-formed habits, harmony, and mutual love, be the sources of your domestic pleasure; what is splendor of furniture, or dress, or entertainments, to these?

PRESENCE OF MIND IN THE HOUR OF DANGER.—In the course of an article in relation to the Lexington, the Albany Advertiser narrates the following as a striking example of how much may be effected in such an emergency by decision and presence of mind on the part of the captain of the boat:

"Several years ago a disaster occurred on Lake Champlain, similar in many respects to the burning of the Lexington. One stormy night, as the steamboat Phoenix, with a full load of passengers and freight, was ploughing her way through the waters of Champlain, a fire broke out at midnight, and soon raged with irresistible violence. The passengers roused by the alarm from their slumbers, and waking to a terrible sense of impending destruction, rushed in crowds upon the deck and attempted to seize the boats. Here, however, they were met by the captain, who, having abandoned all hope of saving his boat, now thought only of saving his passengers, and stood by the gangway of his vessel, with a pistol in each hand, determined to prevent any person from jumping into the boats before they were properly lowered into the water, and prepared to receive their living freight. With the utmost coolness and presence of mind he superintended the necessary preparations, and in a few minutes the boats were lowered away, and the passengers received safely on board.

"They then shoved off and pulled through the darkness for the distant shore. As soon as this was reached and the passengers landed, the boats returned to the steamboat and took off the crew, and as the Captain supposed every living soul except himself. But shortly after the boats had left the second time, he discovered under a settee, the chambermaid of the Phoenix, who in her fright and confusion had lost all consciousness. Lashing her to the plank which he had prepared for his own escape, this gallant Captain launched her towards the shore; and was thus left alone with his vessel, now one burning pile. Having satisfied himself that no living thing remained on board his boat, and with the proud consciousness that he had saved every life entrusted to his care, he sprung from the burning wreck as it was about to sink beneath the waters, and by means of a settee reached the shore in safety.

"The above is no exaggerated story. It is the simple narrative of one of the most heroic acts on record. We have only to add that the Captain who so faithfully and fearlessly discharged his duty on this trying occasion, is still in command of a noble boat on Lake Champlain, and is known to every traveller as Captain Sherman, of the steamboat Burlington."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, April 12th, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. JOSEPH P. FARER, to Miss FRANCES F. KELLEY, all of this city.

In Memphis, Tennessee, on the 22d of February last, OLIVER G. WHEELER aged 45 years, late of Florence, Huron county, Ohio. He was a Universalist in faith and practice. The sentiment cheered him in health, supported him in sickness, and consoled him in the hour of death. Also at Clarksfield, Huron county, Ohio, March 8th of consumption, Miss SARAH DUNNING, aged 17 years. On the 9th her remains were carried to Florence for interment, and her funeral was attended by a large circle of mourners and sympathizing friends. Sermon by Br. S. Hull. The Rev. Messrs E. Barber, (Presbyterian) B. B. Wright, and—Curtiss, (Methodists) attended and kindly took part in the services. I. W.

In Augusta, February 6th, NANCY CORNELIA ROOT, daughter of Orville and Mary Root, and grand daughter of John Blunt deceased, aged 1 year and 21 days.

Weep not, though thus she hath fled,
In the blossom of beauty and prime;
The flower's transplanted, not dead—
The sunshine of heaven is her clime.

PROPOSALS

For publishing in Utica, N. Y., a monthly periodical, containing original Universalist Sermons, to be called,

THE UNIVERSALIST PULPIT.

A. B. GROSH, EDITOR.

There is now no such periodical in our denomination. From our inability to publish in the Magazine and Advocate all the sermons we are requested to publish, we know that one is needed. We will strive to supply that want with a variety of original sermons, of the best literary character, (preferring the doctrinal and practical combined, to the controversial) published in a style creditable to all concerned. To do so, we ask 650 subscribers, on the following terms, which must be rigidly adhered to in all cases.

We think we shall be enabled to issue the first number in June next—but to do this, all who want the work must subscribe soon and pay in advance when notified; for we will not commence until 650 copies are subscribed for, and will then limit the edition to the demand, and will supply paying subscribers only. None need fear paying on subscribing, for even should the Pulpit not be published, the money will be refunded, or applied as they may order.

Utica, April 3d, 1840. A. B. & C. C. P. GROSH.

CONDITIONS.—1. The Universalist Pulpit will be published early in each month, on good white paper, with new long primer type, in large 12mo. form, neatly folded and stitched in handsome, printed covers.

2. Each volume will contain at least 26 original sermons, (by adding an extra number with the title page and index at the close of the year,) thus making a volume suitable for binding, of 312 pages per annum.

3. It will be afforded to single subscribers at one dollar per annum—but when six copies are ordered in one package to be directed to a single address, they will be furnished for five dollars per annum—or thirteen copies for ten dollars per annum—always payable in advance, and all discounts and postage to be paid by those ordering the work.

4. No subscriptions received for less than one year—and all payments will be refunded by the publishers, unless the conditions on their part are fulfilled.

AGENTS.—Agents of the Magazine and Advocate, and all responsible postmasters and others friendly to the work, are requested to procure good subscribers, and forward their names and address before the first of June next, to

A. B. & C. C. P. GROSH, Utica, N. Y.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE,

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. IV.—Conduct towards Husbands.

[Concluded.]

There is nothing which will more assist the wife in making herself agreeable, than cheerfulness. This is a very important and valuable characteristic in a wife. Cheerfulness is a great promoter of health in woman as well as in man. Dr. Salgues, professor in the Institute of France, remarks in respect to cheerfulness—"It is the best preservative against anxiety and grief; it is the golden panna-cia, the secret of longevity, the elixir of life." Cheerfulness is easily communicated from one to another. When the wife is constantly and habitually cheerful, how can the husband and the family long avoid being cheerful also? And where cheerfulness is, there is enjoyment. When a woman is sullen, morose, ill tempered and fault-finding, a dark gloom will overspread her countenance, and its shadows will be reflected in the countenances of her husband and all within the circle of her movements, and the streams of domestic enjoyments will be frozen to their fountain head. Fortunate and happy is the man, who has a cheerful and smiling wife, to welcome him whenever he turns his footsteps to his residence. Though he may become weary and dispirited in struggling with a selfish world, yet the remembrance of that bright countenance ready to greet him in his home, will be as sun light to his soul! It will give him strength, and courage, and perseverance; and he will exert himself manfully that he may obtain the means to make comfortable and happy the wife who is so anxious to become useful and agreeable to him. "A cheerful wife may be of great assistance to her husband in business, by wearing a cheerful smile continually on her countenance. A man's perplexities and gloominess are increased a hundred fold when his better half moves about with a continual scowl upon her brow. A pleasant wife, is a rainbow set in the sky when her husband's mind is tossed with storms and tempests."

I repeat, then, the wife should strive with all the ability and tact she possesses, to make herself agreeable to her husband, by a cheerful affectionate demeanor, and by endeavoring to minister to his convenience and comfort, all in her power. And she will not go unrewarded. She will rivet still closer the love of her husband, which will be coupled with respect and gratitude—and peace, harmony and joy will fill all hearts in such a household. There is much good sense in the quaint rhymes of Garrick—

"Attend to my counsel—nor frown to be taught,
That prudence must cherish what beauty has caught,
The bloom of your cheek and the glance of your eye,
Your roses and lilies may make the men sigh:
But roses, and lilies, and sighs pass away;
And passion will die as your beauties decay.
The sparrow and linnet will feed from your hand;
Grow tame by your kindness, and come at command,
Exert with your husbands the same happy skill,
For hearts, like your birds, may be tamed at your will;
Be gay and good humored, complying and kind,
Turn the chief of your care from your face to your mind:
'Tis thus that a wife may her conquests improve,
And Hymen will rivet the fetters of Love."

The remarks of Patrick Henry, are worthy the attention of every wife. "The love of a husband can be retained only by the high opinion which he entertains of his wife's goodness of heart, of her amiable disposition, of the sweetness of her temper, of her prudence, of her devotion to him. Let nothing upon any occasion ever lessen that opinion. On the contrary it should augment every day; he should have much more reason to admire her for those excellent qualities which will cast a lustre over a virtuous woman, when her personal attractions are no more."

A woman should never attempt to rule her husband. There are two important reasons why an effort of this nature should not be made. The first is, that nature and reason plainly demonstrate that this is not the office of the wife; and the Scriptures forbid it in the commandment to woman, not "to usurp authority over the man." The second reason is, that such an attempt will, in vastly the greatest majority of cases, prove unsuccessful—especially if she is united to a man who is worthy of being a husband and a father. But whether the attempt be successful or unsuccessful, the result will be equally disastrous to the harmony and happiness of the family. In making an effort of this nature, with a husband of a firm and independent spirit, a warfare would be commenced which would call into action the most dangerous passions of our nature, and scenes of strife would ensue, alike humiliating to both parties, and destructive to any affection that may once have existed between them. Water will not more certainly quench flames of fire, than will such contentions annihilate love. Even if the wife eventually succeeds in breaking down the spirit of her husband, and in subjecting him to a cringing obedience to her dictation, will she be a gainer? She has certainly accomplished her will; but she has just as certainly destroyed her husband's usefulness, her own happiness, and injured very sensibly the respectability of the whole family! The energy, the enterprise and perseverance of her husband is gone—he feels that he has sunk to the level of a menial—he is unfitted to attend in a proper manner to those affairs upon which the welfare of the family depends, and to degradation in the eyes of the public is often added loss of property, and final poverty and want.

In these remarks I have not adverted to an evil which does not exist. There are in almost every community, wives who govern, or attempt to govern their husbands. In Flint's "Art of being Happy," the following language occurs. "Nothing is more common than this contemptible ambition of wives to govern their husbands. It is said there are coteries of wives, who impart the rules in masonic conclave. Be it so. Whoever exults in having usurped this empire, glories in her shame. However much a wife may humble her husband in general estimation, by presenting him in the light of a weak and docile subject, with all sensible persons, she humbles herself still more." Another writer remarks—"There are in almost every considerable neighborhood, a little squadron of intermeddlers, generally the youngish wives of old or weak-minded men, and generally without children. These are the tutoresses of the young wives of the vicinage; they, in virtue of their experience, not only school the wives, but scold the husbands; they teach the former how to encroach, and the latter how to yield: so that if you suffer this to go quietly on, you are soon under the care of a comat as completely as if you were insane." Although there may not be in this country a regularly constituted coteries of wives banded together for the purpose intimated by the writers above quoted, yet it is well known that there are many older married ladies who are fond of giving advice to the young wives of their acquaintance—and advice, too, often of the most reprehensible and dangerous character. "If I were you, I would have such and such articles of furniture, or dress, or equipage. I would let my husband know that he is obliged to purchase for me such things as I desire; and I would give him no peace day nor night until he complied with all my requests. When you are first married is the time to establish your authority! If you give way now, without making him comply, you will never obtain anything you wish; but if you succeed in conquering him and in making him understand that you will have your way, you will have no difficulty in managing him hereafter. So when you have once expressed your will, never give back, but persevere, and you will at length succeed in worrying him into a compliance!" The young wife should close her ears to all advice of this character and turn from it as from the hissing of an adder! It is full of the poison of asps, and would, if followed, destroy that conjugal affection which is the sweetener of life, and undermine and overturn all foundation for domestic prosperity and happiness! I do not say the wife should not strive to exert an influence over her husband. It is her right and privilege thus to do; and that influence she will possess to a proper degree, if she pursues a right course to acquire it. The only influence which the wife ought to seek after—the only influence she ought to acquire or consent to exercise over her husband, is that obtained through love and respect. All she can obtain by the ardor of her attachment, the sweetness of her disposition, and her unvaryingly kind and tender attentions to her husband, she is justly entitled to. And the amount of influence thus to be acquired, will by no means, be small. Where a contrary course of imperative command and arbitrary will on the part of the wife, would only irritate her husband, and cause him to openly assert his power and determination to rule over her, besides cooling, and perhaps destroying the love he entertained for her—she would, by pursuing this course of kindness and affection, obtain the gratification of all her reasonable wishes, and still cement stronger and stronger that love which ought to be more precious to her than mines of gold! An eminent Persian writer most beautifully remarked that "the gentle hand leads by a hair, the mighty elephant himself!" And this truth is based on a general principle applicable in innumerable cases. In the great majority of instances, the wife whose proceedings towards her husband are characterized by kindness and gentleness, will acquire far greater influence over him than can possibly be obtained by those who resort to any other course—and this too, in addition to all the quietness and harmony which invariably flow from a pleasant and peaceable deportment.

There is a most dangerous feeling which is liable to enter the heart of either party in the marriage covenant, and destroy their happiness. I refer to Jealousy. Whoever would enjoy even a small degree of peace, must avoid this emotion as they would a viper whose sting is death. The bane of the most unhappy family of my acquaintance, is the jealousy of the wife. It greatly injures, and ere long, if not remedied, will utterly destroy the husband's usefulness, who is now occupying a very important station. It annihilates the happiness of the wife, and makes her who might have been an ornament to her sex, an object of the ridicule and contempt of community. Peace is a stranger to the family; and the children behold scenes of strife which can but exert the most deleterious influence upon them.

If woman is more liable to cherish this disposition than man, it is from one of two causes, both of which are, in some degree, an extenuation of the fault. The first is, that her feelings are more delicate and sensitive—and the second is, that she probably, as a general rule, has more cause for jealousy. But if there is a disposition which the wife should most particularly and strongly guard herself against, it is jealousy. Whoever cherish it kindle a flame in their own bosoms which will burn up every vestige of happiness. A woman should never marry a man who, she has any reason to believe, will prove unfaithful. But after having become united to one with full confidence in his fidelity, let not that confidence be destroyed, or even weakened, except by the most indubitable evidence of his guilt. Believe him to be honest and faithful, until incontestable facts prove the contrary. There is much meaning in the old saying, "evil to them who evil think." When a woman is disposed to seize upon every unguarded or thoughtless word, look and action of her husband, for the purpose of finding something with which she can feed her jealousy, it is a very suspicious indication that her own thoughts are not as pure as they might be.

The wife should guard against the first promptings of jealousy. When it begins to coil itself in the heart—when "the green-eyed monster" obtains possession of the mind—it will never be at a loss to find means to strengthen itself in its position. The most frivolous and innocent actions will be distorted into evidences confirmatory of its suspicions.

"Trifles light as air,
Are, to the jealous, confirmation strong
As proofs from Holy Writ."

A woman who is disposed to be jealous, will find something suspicious in the conduct of the most upright of men. The wife should never seek after the faults of her husband, and should never strive to hear things that might excite her suspicions of his fidelity. Even if he is guilty, a knowledge of it will do her no good, but will make her miserable. And if he is innocent, it is ungenerous to be constantly on the look out to hunt up something that may be distorted by a suspicious mind to his disadvantage. "Never search after what it will give you no pleasure to find; never desire to hear what you will not like to be told; therefore avoid that tribe of impertinents who sow dissensions wherever they gain admission by insinuating invented falsehoods; or by telling unwelcome truths, injure innocent people, disturb domestic union, and destroy the peace of families." The man or the woman who will run to a husband or wife with idle and frivolous reports, calculated to awaken jealousy in regard to their companions, is engaged in the most contemptible and despicable business that can claim the attention of the meanest of mortals. It must be an inconceivably narrow and barren mind, a most wretchedly debased and vitiated taste, that can find satisfaction in seizing every flying rumor and hissing it into the ear of a wife or a husband, to awaken their jealousy. The heavens never looked down upon actions more completely surcharged with the concentrated essence of meanness.

There is nothing more likely to cause an innocent man to become guilty, than to have his wife constantly exhibiting jealousy respecting his actions, and uttering or insinuating suspicions against his fidelity. It will bring subjects into his mind which may never before have occupied a moment of his attention, and may be the means of starting him on a career to which he had always before been a stranger. When a woman has doubts of her husband's faithfulness, there is danger that she may pursue a wrong course to change his conduct. "Some women, in order to win back a husband's wandering love, have recourse to the attempt to arouse his jealousy; but they are much mistaken in pursuing such a method. A man, however debased may be his conduct, never entirely forgets the love he once bore to the bride of his youth; there are moments when feelings of tenderness for her will return with force to his heart, and to reap the benefit of such moments, the injured but forgiving wife, must still be enshrined in the purity of former times. A husband will excuse his fault to himself, and in some measure also stand exonerated to the world, if his wife relax in the propriety of her conduct; while on the contrary, the gentle forbearance, the uncomplaining patience, and unobtrusive rectitude of the woman he injures, will deeply strike his heart, and do much to win him back to his former love, and to the observance of the vows he breathed at the altar, when his heart was devoted to the being from whom it has wandered. A kind look, an affectionate expression half uttered, must bring his wife to his side, and she must with smiles and tenderness encourage the returning affection, carefully avoiding all reference to her sufferings, or the cause of them."

While addressing these remarks upon jealousy, more particularly to wives, I must not forget that husbands are guilty of the same fault, and that their heedless and inconsiderate conduct, is too often the cause of jealousy in their wives. The language of Cobbett, is directly to this point. Speaking of jealousy, he remarks—"One thing, however, every husband can do in the way of prevention, [of jealousy on the part of the wife,] and that is, to give no ground for it. And here it is not sufficient that he strictly adhere to his marriage vow; he ought further to abstain from every act, however free from guilt, calculated to awaken the slightest degree of suspicion in a mind, the peace of which he is bound by every tie of justice and humanity not to disturb, or, if he can avoid it, to suffer it to be disturbed by others. A woman that is very fond of her husband, and this is the case with nine-tenths of the English and American women, does not like to share with another any, even the smallest portion, not only of his affection, but of his assiduities and applause; and, as the bestowing of them on one another, and receiving payment in kind, can serve no purpose other than of gratifying one's vanity, they ought to be abstained from, and especially if the gratification be to be purchased with even the chance of exciting uneasiness in her, whom it is your sacred duty to make as happy as you can. For about two or three years after I was married, I retaining something of my military manners, used, both in France and America, to romp most famously with all the girls that came in my way, till one day, at Philadelphia, my wife said to me, in a very gentle manner, "Don't do that: I do not like it." That was quite enough: I had never thought upon the subject before. One hair of her head was more dear to me than all the other women in the world, and this I knew that she knew; but I now saw that this was not all that she had a right to from me. I saw that she had the further claim upon me that I should abstain from every thing that might induce others to believe that there was any other woman for whom, even if I were at liberty, I had any affection. I beseech young married men to bear this in mind; for on some trifle of this sort, the happiness or misery of a long life frequently turns. If the mind of a wife be disturbed on this score, every possible means ought to be used to restore it to peace. And though her suspicions be perfectly groundless—though they be wild as the dreams of madmen—though they may present a mixture of the furious and the ridiculous—still they are to be treated with the greatest lenity and tenderness; and if, after all, you fail, the frailty is to be lamented as a misfortune, and not punished as a fault, seeing that it must have its foundation in a feeling towards you, which it would be the basest of ingratitude, and the most ferocious of cruelty, to repay by harshness of any description."

To sum up the whole of these remarks on the conduct of wives towards their husbands, I must use the language of another—"An affectionate wife will cling to her husband through good report and evil report—through poverty and riches—and the more the world recedes from him, the more firmly will she stand by him—she will be his comforter, when all other worldly comfort has slid from him—her devotedness will be his rock when he has no other support—she will smile at the frowns of the world, she will not heed its censures; he is her all, and in her love are all other feelings forgotten or absorbed. No sacrifice will be too great, the faintest smile will not be a reward too little."

THE MORAL INFLUENCE OF BEAUTY.

BY MISS SARAH C. EDGARTON.

Have you ever marked the taste which is bestowed by most of the poorer class upon their humble dwellings?—the scarlet bean-vine trained around the window, the lilac shading the door with its drooping branches, the tall sunflowers around the well-curb, and underneath the windows, the little beds of pansies and pinks, and golden asters! Oh! it is a beautiful sight to witness the outbursts of this passion for the beautiful, through all the restraints which poverty and ignorance have imposed! It is soothing to the heart that yearns for the restoration of our fallen natures, to find upspringing in the most barren spots the freshness of pure and delicate feeling. It is an evidence that the fountain, though buried beneath desolation, is yet giving forth an under-stream that can never run dry; that human nature has, at the heart, the root, the inner being, a vein of truth and of beauty that will nourish its wants through all the vicissitudes of life, and finally work out the renovation of our higher capacities in a nature all divine.

In travelling through the humbler villages of the country, I have noticed that even the most desolate habitations—the ruins of hovels even—are cheered by some lingering fragment of the works of taste. I have seen the hop growing luxuriantly over the naked rafters of a deserted hut; I have found around the borders of some old cellar,—from which the Penates fled long ago, carrying with them the hearthstone and the family altar,—tufts of the garden-flag and many a thriving rose-tree, giving out their fragrance as generously to the "desert air," as to the bowers of the beautiful and the opulent; and when I have chanced upon scenes like these, I have felt encouraged to think kindly of human nature, and to believe that there are yet some lingering traces of original purity remaining to the most degraded, and the most wretched.

And why call flowers and vines evidences of moral purity in those who have strewn them around the shrines of the homestead? Because, gentle friend, the love of the beautiful was their motive principle; and where this love is a native feeling, there will goodness, and beauty, and refinement, be appreciated, and partially incorporated into the soul. And so with every display of taste. A perception of beauty may not be goodness, in itself, but it necessarily includes a perception and a love of goodness wherever realized; and this perception, and this love must naturally induce a desire for possession.

Probably no principle of the human mind has been more active in exciting religious devotion, than the inherent passion for everything beautiful and pure. It sees in the Deity a spirit of utter beauty and glory, surpassing all the creations of his power in the loveliness and purity of his character; it sees in the gentle Saviour, also, the sweetest excellences of the divine nature; and in its visions of Heaven nothing but perfect and absolute beauty has any place. Why then should not the whole soul yield to the influence of glories and excellences so complete? Why should not the heart pay homage to spiritual and celestial beauty? And why should not the principle which induces this kind and degree of devotion, be encouraged and cultivated?

There is a very excellent and elegantly written article by Mrs. Sigourney, in the "Lady's Book," upon a subject similar to the one I have here slightly touched, which I would recommend to the attention of parents and those who have the charge of youthful minds, as containing much truth of great importance to the happiness and morality of the generation they hold in ward.

With one short extract I will close this hasty article. "This branch of education, it would seem, might recommend itself even to the utilitarian spirit of the times—from the cheapness with which it may be taught. It requires neither expensive books nor deep scientific research. The means of studying it are revealed at every footstep, and varied through every season. From the young, vernal grass—the pure, fertilizing stream—the tasselled corn—the grain ripening for the sickle—the wing of the bird, which, like living sapphire or ruby, glances through the dark forest, the teacher may weave a pleasing and profitable lecture for his attentive auditors. How readily may he collect a simple apparatus for the school-room—the crystal—the tinted shell—the branching coral—the wild-flower, which, submitted to the action of the tiny microscope, might fill with a spirit of admiration not unallied to piety, the brief intervals of study. Thus the pinion of the butterfly, the armour of the beetle, or the lamp of the glow-worm, may furnish a lesson to the rudest boy, of kindness to the inferior creation, and wondering love of Him who has clothed it in mysterious beauty."

"IF A MAN DIE SHALL HE LIVE AGAIN?"

BY J. H. MASON.

Shall we regard death as the sleep of the spirit anterior to the resurrection? Weary with the cares, the labors, and the burdens of the day, tired nature seeks repose,—and man lies down upon his couch in the shades of night, to seek that rest, that sweet repose, which he so much needs, and which the darkness and silence of the night are so well calculated to bestow. The morning dawn creeps in apace, and reminds him of the near approach of the king of day, and he rises refreshed with rest and animated with hope; and with a heart overflowing with love, he beholds all nature glowing and smiling in the playful beams of the morning sun.

Even so man shall lie down in the silent grave, and the clouds of the valley shall cover him. The spirit, weary with the burdens and cares of life, shall lie down in the peaceful grave, to be refreshed with the sleep of death. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Then shall the spirit, refreshed with the sleep of death, come forth through the resurrection to immortal life, and meet the Son of God, and drink in the joys of immortality.

Yes, "we are sown in corruption, we shall be raised in incorruption—sown in weakness, raised in power" over death, sin and the grave.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER TWENTY-FOUR.

MALACHI.—Malachi was cotemporary with Nehemiah. He was the last of the twelve minor prophets, and the interval between him and John the Baptist was nearly four hundred years.

Malachi i: 3—"And I hated Esau," etc., etc. We are not to infer from this that God actually hated Esau, but that he preferred Jacob to Esau, though Esau was the elder brother.

Malachi 3d and 4th chapters.—Here are two persons announced, one of which, like a pioneer, would prepare the way for the other, (see 3d chapter, 1st verse,) and the other, who is called, "the messenger of the covenant;" "the sun of righteousness," (see iii: 1, and iv: 1,) who should turn many to righteousness and be the means of establishing a new covenant—that new covenant which is mentioned by Ezekiel, when the stony heart should be taken away and a heart of flesh given. See Ezekiel xi: 29, and xxxvi: 26. He is also said to be a refiner and purifier of silver, and like fuller's soap. See Mal: iii: 3.

The two persons here announced were John the Baptist for the former, and Jesus Christ, or the Messiah, for the latter. They both preached repentance, and exhorted to the practice of virtue with great success.

Malachi iv: 5—"Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before that great and notable day come."

This seems to be an intimation that they were to have no more prophets until Elijah should come—which was the fact.

This Elijah, Jesus said, was John the Baptist, whose office and character did in several respects resemble his.

APOCRYPHA.—There are a vast many books called Apocryphal, some of which are embodied in the English Bible. It is no honor to Christians that these books should be suffered to remain in the Bible. They were written after the days of Malachi, in whom, according to the universal testimony of the Jews, the spirit of prophecy ceased. Not one of the writers in direct terms advances a claim to inspiration, none of the writers of the New Testament mention them, neither Philo nor Josephus speak of them, the Christian church was for some ages a stranger to them, all the orthodox writers who have given catalogues of the canonical books of Scripture, unanimously concur in rejecting them, and, to conclude, Buck says, "they contain fables, lies, and contradictions," and Calmet says, "they bear the stamps of legends on the face of them."

MR. CAMPBELL'S CONSISTENCY!

Those who read the controversy between Messrs. Campbell and Skinner, will recollect that Mr. Campbell virtually called Mr. Skinner a liar for saying that some respectable critics derived a certain word in dispute from ades, (hades,) though he did not say he himself so derived it. Mr. S. then mentioned the names of Scarlett, Creighton and Kneeland. Mr. C. undertook to ridicule the names, and says, "Call the devil a saint when you call Kneeland a scholar or a critic." He had never known a gentleman among the preachers, nor a critic in the whole denomination of Universalists. Yet strange to tell, a few letters after these things, when Mr. C. gets hold of Rev. L. C. Todd's renunciation of Universalism, from which he quotes so largely, he prefaces his extracts with this very courteous compliment to Mr. T., viz—"His book shews that he is a gentleman of an enlarged and cultivated mind." Verily, how strangely his renunciation of Universalism changed him from a savage boor to a refined gentleman! And stranger still, that in the very extract which Mr. C. publishes and endorses from Mr. T., the latter says, "Mr. Kneeland was for years a learned and eminent teacher." Thus taking the two together, it appears that Mr. K. from a learned man, became an ignoramus, by renouncing his Universalism, and Mr. T., from an ignoramus and semi-barbarian, was at once transformed into "a gentleman of an enlarged and cultivated mind"! simply because when he renounced Universalism, he was supposed to have embraced Orthodoxy! But stranger still! this same Mr. T., by his late recantation of his renunciation, has ceased to be a gentleman of enlarged and cultivated mind, and again become a kind of barbarian or ignoramus, because again inclined to the dreadful heresy of Universalism! Can Mr. Campbell explain all these strange transformations?

RIVALRY.

How full of jealousy and acrimony towards each other, do we see rival statesmen, writers, and place-men. Nor are we ourselves free from it, especially when we get among us agricultural societies, and the distribution of premiums.—Some late occurrences have led me to doubt if the increased stimulus to improvement in the arts of production, would compensate for the loss of harmony, and the introduction of jealousy and bitter rivalry among us. To be sure, the latter need not be an inseparable accompaniment of the aids to agriculture; but what can we expect of human nature in a farmer, when even rival divines will quarrel. I was thinking to-day upon this exhibition of the selfishness, irritability, and imperfection of man, and a similar incident among our clerical brethren occurred to my recollection. Bossuet, an excellent and eminent prelate of France, when he came to the bishopric of Meau, found the clergy about the Episcopal residence, a set of heavy, stupid men. It is said that though they lived in amity and on the best terms among themselves, the bishop was disgusted with their dullness, and as opportunity served, supplanted their places with men of eminent abilities, and thus, by degrees, collected about the most literary and talented ecclesiastical body in France.—Bitterly, however, it is said, did the good bishop rue his success; for instead of tranquillity, as formerly, came bickerings, rivalries, jealousies interminable, and all those little petty quarrels which occur among those who have any pretensions to talent. In the midst of this hot water he lived to regret his dismissed incapables. S. S.

The third quarterly Conference of the Alleghany Association was held at Cold Creek, on the second Saturday and Sunday in February. The house was filled to overflowing, and many were obliged to leave and attend other meetings, who could not find shelter from the storm where they could hear the Gospel of glad tidings.

Br. Stacy writes that a Conference was held in Michigan Centre, Jackson County, Mich., on the 10th, 11th and 12th of April. Six preachers were present, viz., Brs. Sweet, Gage, Billings, S. S. Curtis, Lee and Stacy; and seven discourses were preached, and devoutly listened to by a respectable congregation; and it is believed that God will be glorified in the event.

Unless poetry is good—decidedly good—it had better not be sent to us. We mention this for the benefit of young writers (some of whom are old people, however) who think that jingling verse without measure or sense is better than good, sensible, sober prose. We have more good poetry on hand than we can find room for in our prescribed limits, at present—and when we have not, we prefer good selections to the labor of preparing and mending measure and rhyme. ## NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION....NO. VIII.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"And hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel."
 "Charity rejoiceth in the truth." "Charity never faileth."

It has been believed by probably a very great majority of the Christian church, for more than a thousand years, that to a numerous portion of our race, the future state of existence, with its attendant miseries, is unspeakably the worst calamity that ever befel them—that to many, very many of mankind, the resurrection is, as it were, the door through which they will be introduced into untold and unimagined sufferings, of which the extremest tortures ever inflicted by the cruellest of human monsters, are but as the faintest representation. It is believed also that these torments, so intense, so keen, and seemingly insupportable, are to continue, and last, and be endured, without intermission, without mitigation, without the hope of relief, through years unnumbered, and centuries beyond computation, even ages on ages, and duration without end. And it is believed by some that the existence of these torments depends upon the resurrection; and by a greater number, that the resurrection will greatly enhance them. I have thought proper to offer in this place, a few out of the many reasons that might be offered, against the truth of that doctrine.

1. The apostle Paul tells us that "charity never faileth," which remark is equivalent to saying that it exists to all duration; since he adds respecting knowledge, that "it shall vanish away;" that is, as he afterwards explains himself, the knowledge we possess in the present state. He then gives the reason why it shall thus vanish, which reason is somewhat similar to the reason why the stars vanish at sun-rise—our knowledge in the present state is imperfect, but in the future state all is perfection—"For we know in part, . . . but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part [or imperfect] shall be done away." Charity, then, is known and exercised in a more perfect state of existence. The apostle also says that charity "is the bond of perfectness," that is, that it is the very thing on which the perfection of Christian union depends. This will easily be understood; for it is generally known that charity, in the Scriptures, is the same as is there called love, which, as all intelligent Christians agree, — "is the strongest tie

 That can our hearts unite."

But if charity is love, what sort of love is it? Evidently that which is properly called benevolence; for the apostle affirms of charity what is true only of benevolent love, that it "seeketh not its own." Also, when we read of God's love to sinners, the word-rendered love is the same as is rendered charity, and all will agree that God loves sinners with a love of benevolence. We have it, then, as the doctrine of Paul, that benevolence belongs to the resurrection state, and is to exist after faith and hope shall cease; that is, after all the objects of faith and hope shall be fully realized. See 1 Cor. 13th chapter, also Coll. iii: 14.

Now, in my mind, a very strong argument against the doctrine of endless misery, may be grounded upon the above facts. The resurrection state, as all agree, is to be a state of happiness to some. But if a part are consigned to endless misery, and the rest are in any considerable degree exercised by benevolent feelings, it can not be possible that these last shall enjoy happiness to any very great amount. And the greater their benevolence, the less their happiness. Indeed, should their benevolence be perfect, as the language of the apostle seems to intimate, their sorrow must be perfect also. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep," is a positive command in that immutable law of love which admits of no repeal. Rom. xii: 15. If any are to weep forever, the benevolent will weep with them. If any are endlessly miserable, all will be so. There is no dividing the child.

II. The apostle tells us that Jesus Christ "hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." 2 Tim. i: 10. And in 1 Cor. 15th chapter, being about to write a dissertation upon the resurrection, he announces his subject by saying, "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you." The doctrine of the resurrection, then, is embraced in the Gospel. The Gospel, as all are aware, is literally good tidings, or good news. The Gospel is truth. Those who believe it, receive it as good news, and rejoice in it. In some cases, at least, they "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." 1 Pet. i: 8. But it is obvious that the same intelligence may make one person glad, and another sorry, even though it relate not to the personal interests of either. The prosperity of an absent friend is announced. I esteem it as good news, because I wish him well, or in other words, am exercised by benevolence towards him. Another deems it bad news, because he is actuated by the opposite spirit. The tidings are reversed. Now he rejoices, and I sorrow. The goodness or badness of a message, then, considered as a message, depends altogether upon the good or the bad will of those to whom it is addressed. Benevolence rejoices in the good of others; malevolence, in its opposite.

The apostle is particular to tell us what principle it is that recognizes the Gospel as good news, or as he expresses it, which "rejoiceth in the truth;" and he says it is charity. 1 Cor. xiii: 4-6. Charity, as we have seen, is benevolence. Endless misery is a positive evil. If true, however, it is the truth, it is Gospel; and charity recognizes it as good news, and rejoices in it. But it would be an insult to common sense to affirm that charity, that heaven-born principle, so kind, so desirous of the good of others, rejoices at the prospect of endless misery. Such a prospect may be rejoiced in, but charity is absent from the heart that can contemplate it unpained, not to say with emotions of joy.

As, then, the ultimate destiny of man in the resurrection state, is plainly embraced in that system of truth which, when the benevolent minded believe it, they recognize as good news, and rejoice in, even with joy unspeakable and full of glory; and as the doctrine of endless misery is such that no benevolent person can receive it "with gladness," and rejoice in it for its intrinsic goodness, I therefore conclude that the doctrine is untrue.

III. In Heb. ii: 8, 9, and in 1 Cor. xv: 27, 28, the apostle gives a commentary upon a passage from the Psalms. In one place he quotes the passage, and in the other he alludes to it. The passage, as quoted, reads, "Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet;" as alluded to, it is, "For he hath put all things under his feet." His comments follow; but it should be observed that he makes use of the language of the text, rather than its teachings.

"For in that he put all things in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man." Again, "But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all."

The above commentary most clearly presents, to my understanding, the following philological and doctrinal particulars:

1. In the passage commented upon, "all" signifies every one, or the whole of what it is applied to; since the apostle illustrates the extent of its meaning by saying that nothing was left out, God excepted.

2. The phrase "all things" has no reference to inanimate objects, but is equivalent to the phrase all human beings; as the apostle applies it to those for whom Jesus "tasted death," and who "shall be subdued unto him," and according to the common translation, even uses as a convertible expression, the phrase "every man."

3. Though, grammatically speaking, the verb "hast put" is in the past tense, the time intended is future; for Paul manifestly treats it as a prediction of something to come, and even says, "We see not yet all things put under him." Note. Using the past tense in declaring future events, especially in poetry, is a well known Hebrew idiom, abundant examples of which may be found in the 53d chapter of Isaiah.

4. To put all things, that is to say, all human beings, "under Christ's feet," means to subdue them to him, since in his comments on this phrase, he says, "And when all things shall be subdued unto him," which expression is evidently intended to be equivalent to saying, And when all things shall be put under him. *

5. To "be subdued" to Christ, is to become subject to him; for in the passage as quoted by Paul from the Psalms, the words, "in subjection" are supplied, seemingly for the purpose of expressing more clearly in Greek, the evident sense of the passage in Hebrew. And besides, the apostle tells us that "the Son also, himself, shall be subject to" God. Hence,

6. From all these particulars, it is quite evident that the sense of the passage, in the writings of Paul, is, that God will render all human beings subject to Christ. And if all become subject to Christ, I see not how any can be endlessly miserable.

It is asserted, however, that though all will be subject to Christ, yet some will submit unwillingly, being compelled to yield by superior force, as whole nations are sometimes compelled to yield to a foreign power by force of arms, that is to say, by dint of fighting. But this assertion, for it is only an assertion, stands directly opposed to what our Lord said himself respecting the genius of his government. When arraigned before Pilate, he declared, "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence." Here we have it from the King himself, that his kingdom differs from those of this world, in that its interests are not advanced by using physical force. The power then, by which mankind will be subjected to Christ, must be moral power, and of course must be brought to bear upon man's moral nature; hence those who become subjected to him, will yield a willing, a hearty, a loyal, a joyful submission to his government.

But the apostle adds that when all shall become subject to Christ, "then shall the Son, also, himself, be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." Here is another event predicted, on which we need not comment; but the object of both events, which is distinctly announced, claims a few moments' attention. "That God may be all in all." This, as I understand it, is equivalent to saying, That there may be a perfect unity of moral sentiment among all mankind, between them and Christ, between all and God. Note. The apostle John says, "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfect in us." Again, "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him;" that is to say, there is a perfect unity of disposition. When God comes to be all in all, then all will love one another; and then there will be no sin, for "love is the fulfilling of the law"—how, then, can any be endlessly miserable?

LETTERS TO A BAPTIST CHURCH.

"The spirit and the bride say come," and our spirits unite in the exhortation, and call upon all who hear us to enter into the vineyard of our Master and labor in the good cause. We rejoice with every one who has broken the fetters of superstition, and escaped from the unjust covenants of men. That others may rejoice with us, we present our readers with the following letters. They were written by a mother and her daughter, and as the reader will perceive, were designed to notify the church to which they belonged of their withdrawal from the same, and if we mistake not, their example will exert a holy influence upon those who are halting between the fear of men and the love of God, if any such read it.

LETTER

To the Baptist church of Boston and Concord, N. Y.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS—I take this method of communicating my mind and feelings to you. For many years have I walked with you as a church, often assembled in close communion with you around the altar, gave a listening ear to the chilling news of an angry God, there proclaimed, having an endless hell for millions of his creatures; yet as often, dear brethren and sisters, has the thought rushed in upon my mind, "Can all this be true?" Although I have passed many scenes of this life, and been called to mourn the loss of dear relatives and friends, I know that there is a joy in the midst of grief. I do not feel that I am forsaken or left without hope. In a God of love do I trust, whose arm hath brought salvation; who will wipe the tears from these weeping eyes and from all faces; whose tender mercies are over all his works; who fills all space; whose love I believe to be broad as the universe, and unbounded as creation.

When meditating upon the goodness and love of our God—when reflecting that soon I must leave this transitory life—that soon I shall meet all my dear friends in that upper and better world, there to unite with all our race in one general song of praise, my soul fills with that joy and consolation which the world can not give or take away. No longer, brethren, can I give my assent to that cruel, unmerciful doctrine of endless suffering for a portion of our race, as found in your articles of faith, and so publicly declared by your priests. But I must believe what the Scriptures teach concerning the destiny of man, the restitution of all things as declared by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began. I believe the promise, that all nations, families and kindreds of the earth shall be blest in Christ, the Saviour of all men. He "gave himself a ransom for all"—and the ransomed shall return and come to Zion, with songs of everlasting joy upon their heads." That "the blind shall be led by a way they know not," for in the fulness of times all shall be gathered together in Christ, who shall reign till all things shall be subdued to himself; then shall the kingdom be delivered up to God the Father, who shall be all in all. These are truths I sincerely believe.

I have now concluded to inform you, as I am a member of your church in full fellowship, that I have recently embraced the doctrine of the restitution. You are hereby informed that I withdraw all fellowship from you as a church, as long as you continue to teach the doctrines of endless wo, for a portion of the human family. I now consider myself no longer a member among you. I abhor the distinguishing doctrines of your creeds, esteem them false and pernicious, and while I remain of my present opinion, shall oppose them; but for your persons, your characters as Christians, I entertain the highest and sincerest regard. As brethren and sisters, I love you—shall ever pray for your welfare and happiness—and equally happy shall I ever be, to reciprocate with you the kind offices of friendship, and the tokens of brotherly love. With my best respects for your happiness, I must subscribe myself your affectionate sister and sincere friend.

LETTER

To the Baptist church of Boston and Concord, N. Y.

CHRISTIAN BRETHREN AND SISTERS—Under a deep sense of duty, and of the importance of the subject of religion, I address you this short epistle. When quite young I united with you in church fellowship, and still remain in the same standing among you. We have often assembled together at places appointed for worship; we have accompanied one another to the water side; we have seated ourselves around the communion table; we have met in the conference meeting and the praying circle, and have had many interviews with each other. I have received much counsel and good advice from you, for which I would not be ungrateful, but would express my sincere thanks to you for the same. O, that I may be enabled to communicate my feelings to you in such a manner that you may not feel to deny me the Christian name! for as the poet says,

"Christian's sweet name, its worth I view,
O may I wear its nature too."

It is well known to every individual member of this church, that a change has taken place in my mind as it respects the doctrine believed and preached among you. I once believed, and sincerely believed, the doctrine taught by your denomination to be a Bible doctrine and founded upon the scriptures of sacred truth. But I entertain quite different views of the subject at present. 'Tis education forms the common mind," and every one who has paid any degree of attention to this subject will be ready to acknowledge the truth of this remark. When young, the mind may be so fashioned as to become subservient to all the mysticisms and fables of men. I think your doctrine is founded upon tradition, which has been handed down from parents to children for many generations. I sincerely believe that the popular doctrine preached at the present day, and the measures that are adopted to proselyte the world, are calculated to excite fear, and frequently cause a change in the outward appearance of a person, but seldom produce a genuine change in the affections. This principle of fear operates with much greater force upon the minds of the young than the old, which is evidently the cause why the majority of those converted at protracted meetings are of the young and rising generation. I am constrained to believe that the course which many professed ministers of the Gospel have taken, is calculated to spread the dreadful mildew of despair and misery over the minds of the youth, middle aged and gray headed. Many a kind father, many an affectionate mother, many a promising youth, by listening to the dreadful doctrine of endless wo, have wandered about in darkness, without hope and without God in the world, until they have become raving maniacs, or been consigned to the silent tomb.

Perhaps you may think I have written rather harshly—I have not intended to, but I have felt it my duty to express my feelings to you in a plain and friendly manner. I read in 1 Timothy ii: 4, that God "will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." Again, Isaiah xlv: 22-24, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Also, Rom. xiv: 11, "As I live saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me and every tongue confess to God." Also, Philippians ii: 9-11, "God also hath highly exalted Jesus and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." This is Scripture as penned by the prophet and apostle. In Isaiah xxv: 6-8, it is written, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things; a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow; of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it." All of this is in perfect agreement with the language of Peter, Acts iii: 21, when speaking of Jesus, "whom the Heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

How can I, while reading these passages, with thousands of others which are recorded in the scriptures of truth, believe my heavenly Father to be that partial being which he is represented to be. I can not with reason and revelation before me. I believe that Christ is the Saviour of the world; that "he gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," that "as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men unto condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." "For it pleased the Father that in him (that is in Jesus,) should all fulness dwell, and (having made peace through the blood of his cross) by him to reconcile all things to himself, by him I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven." We are informed that the Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son, and that he hath given all things into his hands. Christ says, St. John vi: 38, 39, "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me that of all that he hath given me I should lose nothing but raise it up again at the last day." John says, Revelations v: 13, "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb forever and ever." These few passages are as the small dust in the balance, or as a drop from a boundless ocean, when compared with the numerous passages which we find recorded in sacred writ.

I have now expressed my feelings to you in a plain manner. But not more plain than you have often talked to me, or I have felt it my duty to do. It is well known to every one of you that some length of time has elapsed since I embraced the doctrine of the restitution. And as you have not taken up a labor with me, to save any farther trouble, I now withdraw myself from you as a church, and consider myself no longer a member among you, but praying for you that the dark clouds of error which have so long fettered and enslaved your minds may be removed from you, and from the face of the whole earth, and that every wandering son and daughter of Adam may unite in singing praises to our Father and our God.

SYBILLINE ORACLES, ORIGEN &amp;c.

R. W. by his objection to Universalism, has drawn us into pretty extensive business—which we do not regret, for there are times when we are sadly puzzled to find subjects on which to pen Editorial articles. Too late last week for insertion, we received the following polite note, with its requests, which we now present for the perusal of the reader.

MESSRS. EDITORS—In your remarks on the communication of R. W., last week, you say, “those early Christians, the composers of the Sybilline Oracles, Origen and others, all of whom advocated the doctrine of universal salvation.” Will you inform your readers,

1. What the Sybilline Oracles were.
2. When they were written.
3. By what evidence you prove them the production of a Christian.
4. What evidence have you of Origen's being a Universalist?
5. If a Universalist, in what sense?
6. What early Christians you refer to by “others.”

By giving distinct answers to each of these questions, confirmed by good authorities, you will oblige one who is anxious to learn. P. Q.

Utica, April 20, 1840.

Most willingly will I endeavor to answer the inquiries of our unknown correspondent, so far as my limited means for information will permit.

“1. What the Sybilline Oracles were.”

The Ancient History of Universalism, by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d, says that “This work, which we now have with some variations, in eight books of coarse Greek verses,” was forged by some Christian or Christians, for the purpose of convincing the heathens of the truth of Christianity. The Sibyls (supposed prophetesses) of the heathen were held in great veneration, among the Greeks and Romans. The writer or writers of the Oracles, taking advantage of this, compiled a narrative of the most striking events in ecclesiastical history, combined with the Christian faith as then held, and palmed the work off as the production of the Sibyls. It was seized with avidity by the popular Christians of that day and quoted to the heathen in proof of Christianity by Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, Clemens Alexandrinus, and the succeeding fathers then esteemed Orthodox. They now serve to show what was orthodoxy in the Christian church at that day. They declare that after the general judgment, “the omnipotent, incorruptible God shall confer another favor on his worshippers, when they shall ask him: he shall save mankind from the pernicious fire and the immortal agonies. This he will do.” Though teaching the doctrine of universal salvation, it applies the word eternal or everlasting to the limited punishment which it teaches.

“2. When they were written.”

The same History says, in a note, that Cave thinks the larger part of the Sybilline Oracles was written about A. D. 130, and the rest before 192. Du Pin fixes their date about 160—Lardner 169 to 190. The Shepherd of Hermas, the date of which is fixed not before A. D. 150, probably refers to them (says Mr. Ballou) Book i, Vis. ii.—and Justin Martyr, who repeatedly refers to them, flourished A. D. 150 to 162.

“3. By what evidence you prove them the production of a Christian.”

By the highest of all evidence—internal evidence. If their character has been truly stated above, and if they were proven to be forgeries, as is universally admitted, then they must have been forged by some one favorable to Christianity. And their frequent use by the Christian fathers, in opposition to the heathens, and for the purpose of proving Christianity, in connexion with the fact of their being proved to be forgeries, shows that they were what they are stated to be above. For the historical testimony, I refer “P. Q.” to Murdock's Mosheim, Vol. 1, page 159, and Note 14 on the same page.

“4. What evidence have you of Origen's being a Universalist?”

His own testimony, as quoted in the Ancient History of Universalism. See page 86, where he quotes from Rufinus' Latin translation of Origen's books Of Principles, thus—“The end and consummation of the world will take place, when all shall be subjected to punishments proportioned to their several sins; and how long each one shall suffer in order to receive his deserts, God only knows. But we suppose that the goodness of God, through Christ, will certainly restore all creatures into one final state; his very enemies being overcome and subdued. For thus saith the scripture: ‘The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool.’ (Ps. xc: 1.) To the same amount, but more clearly, the apostle Paul says that Christ ‘must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.’ But if there be any doubt what is meant by putting ‘enemies under his feet,’ let us hear the apostle still further, who says, ‘for ALL things must be subjected to him.’ (1 Cor. xv.) What, then, is that subjection with which all things must be subjected unto Christ? I think it to be that with which we ourselves desire to be subdued to him; and with which also the apostles and all the saints who have followed Christ, have been subdued to him. For the very expression ‘subjected to Christ,’ denotes the salvation of those who are subjected: as David says, ‘shall not my soul be subjected to God? for from him is my salvation.’ (Ps. lxii: 1).—But I have not room for further quotations—let this brief sample suffice.

Again—The testimony of Origen's contemporaries, and scholars, and immediate successors, prove him to have been a Universalist. For they recognize that sentiment in his numerous writings and long continued teachings, and for many years regarded him in that light, and revered his memory. In fact, the author of the Modern History of Universalism furnishes references to upwards of 60 principal passages in Origen's works where he advocates the doctrine. And though one of the greatest lights of the church in that age, no voice was lifted to condemn this portion of his teachings, or to oppose it as an error, until about 150 years after his death. Ambrosius, the patron and convert of Origen; Clemens Alexandrinus, his teacher; Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem; Heraclas, Bishop of Alexandria; Gregory Thaumaturgus, Athenodorus, and others, his contemporaries, all held the same doctrine, and revered him as its most successful advocate.

Again—we have the evidence of Anastasius, Pope of Rome, about A. D. 400. (Origen died A. D. 253,) and of the two Synods of Alexandria and Cyprus, about the same date, who condemned Origen (not for holding to the final salvation of all mankind, but) for holding to the final salvation of the devil and his angels—a doctrine never held by those who believe in the endless misery of any of the human race. From this period downward we find other witnesses to Origen's Universalism, until we come to the fifth General Council, A. D. 553, in which, for the first time, the doctrine of the salvation of all men is pronounced a heresy.

Such are our proofs that Origen was a Universalist, to which, as perhaps stronger authority with “P. Q.” than Mr. Ballou, we add the similar proofs furnished by Mosheim, in his Ecclesiastical History, (Dr. Murdock's Translation,) Vol. 1, p. 240, and note, and other passages in the same volume.

“5. If a Universalist, in what sense?”

I confess I do not know precisely what information “P. Q.” wants—but if he alludes to the character of Origen as a Christian and a scholar, I can only say he stood at the head of his contemporaries in both piety, learning, and what seems to have been considered orthodoxy, until A. D. 400, or 553. As to his views as a Universalist, he believed in the pre-existence of souls, and in punishment after death. If what has been written, does not prove satisfactory to “P. Q.”, let him ask again, so varying question 5th, that I may fully understand his meaning.

“6. What early Christians you refer to by others.”

This question has been answered, by the names already given—nearly all of whom freely used the word everlasting or eternal to express the duration of a limited punishment. Besides these, many others might be named, who are admitted by so-called orthodox ecclesiastical historians to have been Universalists, and who flourished from the general commencement of the Christian church down to A. D. 553, and somewhat later. But this article is long enough already. If P. Q. can get the Ancient History of Universalism already so often referred to, he will find it a candid, clear and able work, full of references to the most authentic sources for all its statements. The first edition is out of market, and no second edition has yet appeared, (though we hope one may soon be published,) which renders it a work difficult to procure. If “P. Q.” chooses to make himself known to me as a careful book borrower, (as I am inclined to believe he can do,) and wishes really to peruse it, he can have the loan of it for a few days. Or if he has any more questions to propose, I will endeavor to answer them respectfully and satisfactorily.

JUDAS ISCARIOT'S PLACE.

“Was Judas raised up to answer the very end he did answer; and would the Scriptures have been fulfilled had he not betrayed his Master?”

“Has Acts i: 25, reference to Judas' going to his own place—and if so, where was that place; or has it reference to Matthias' going to Judas' place in the apostleship?”

In a former article on “Judas Iscariot's throne,” I referred to the above questions, and promised to answer them in a separate article. I now intend fulfilling that promise.

There can be no doubt in the mind of any believer in the supremacy of God, as taught in the Bible, that every actor owes his existence to God, and that all his actions, when viewed as connected with the great chain of causes and effects which constitutes the entire providence and government of God, are considered as God's acts. Joseph's brethren sold him into Egypt—God sent Joseph to Egypt by their agency. Pharaoh acted tyrannically to the children of Israel—God raised up Pharaoh to show the weakness of human power when opposed to the divine purposes, and (by the Israelites) the power of human weakness, when acting in accordance with the divine will. However distinct these acts may be, separately considered—or considered in reference to the motives and objects of man, in contrast with those of God—yet they are both divine acts, and yet human acts. So in the case of Judas. He acted freely as a moral agent—yet God used his actions to accomplish the divine purposes—and this, whether God only fore-saw, without decreeing and controlling Judas; or whether he ordained that Judas should so act. Whether Arminian or Calvinistic principles are used, the fact itself is undeniable, that the betrayal and crucifixion of Jesus formed a part of the divine plan for the redemption of sinners, as much as his resurrection from the dead; and that the Scriptures were thus fulfilled.

The other question is dependent for answer on a passage somewhat ambiguous in the common version. It may mean, “that Matthias may take part of this ministry and apostleship, (from which Judas fell by transgression,) that he (Matthias) might go to his own place”—that is the place which Judas had possessed—or which Matthias should possess. Or it may mean, as some understand it, that “Judas fell by transgression, that he (Judas) might go to his own place”—and that place not be a place of misery in a future state of being, as Dr.

Clarke has ably shown in his commentary. I am inclined to use the parenthetical form, first designated, and so apply the first "he" to mean Matthias. Such I believe to have been the meaning of the eleven apostles, though I have always been inclined to think that they acted in this case without divine authority and guidance, and that the substitution of Matthias for Judas, was never sanctioned by the Master.

I am well aware that this is treading on delicate ground; but as the decision of this point will affect the argument in regard to the possession of a throne of judgment by Judas, I wish briefly to give my reasons. If Matthias took the place of Judas in the apostleship, he took the throne of judgment also. If he did not in reality take the place of Judas, the act of the eleven must have been null and void. In the former case a difficulty arises in explaining the promise of Jesus to the twelve—in the latter case, the difficulty of explaining the prophecy of the Psalmist—"let his habitation be desolate"—"his bishopric let another take." Neither of these difficulties are insuperable, but the former is the most, the latter the least so. My reasons then, for supposing that the substitution of Matthias for Judas, did not extend to his becoming an apostle (or witness) and the occupancy of the throne of judgment, are—1. The apostles were not to have power given them, till after they had received the holy spirit, and at the time of this election, the outpouring of the spirit had not yet occurred. Acts i: 8 and ii: 1-5. 2. Matthias has given no testimony, as a witness, in regard to Jesus. We are merely informed that he was one of the number who had been with the apostles—one of the numerous disciples of Jesus—from the beginning. So that though he may have seen much which Judas saw, and some things, even, which Judas did not see, yet the records show that Judas' acts and words in the way of testimony, are far more constant and numerous, than those of Matthias. 3. There is no recognition of Matthias as an apostle, after his election—nor any act recorded, showing that he did act as one. 4. The bishopric (or overseership) of the church, does not necessarily imply apostleship, and the duties of the judge. 5. If any substitution was necessary, or to be allowed, it appears to me that the selection would have been made by Jesus himself—who specially selected Saul of Tarsus to be the apostle to the Gentiles in a special manner—or, at least, that the selection would have been made after the divine spirit was poured out on the eleven. I freely admit that these reasons are not sufficient positively to preclude the common view; but they have appeared to me sufficient to warrant the belief that Judas is on the throne of judgment, instead of that throne having been given to another—even allowing, that Matthias was properly chosen to fill the bishopric. Had Paul been appointed an apostle to the Hebrews, instead of to the Gentiles, the argument would have been conclusive to my mind that Judas was deposed thereby from the throne of judgment.

I have thus given all the information I deemed necessary to answer the queries of our correspondent. I may not have satisfied him, or may have dissatisfied others; but I have freely given my opinion, doubts and all. I think Dr. Clarke correct, in the main, in the view he takes of the subject in his comments in Acts: though, as has been seen, I differ, in some particulars, from him and many Universalists in my views of the thrones, their location and meaning—and of the substitution of Matthias for Judas. Let facts stand, testimony be received according to its full weight, and mere opinions be judged of according to their accordance with testimony and reason. A. B. G.

PREACHING AND PREACHERS.

As the State Convention is to meet in this city between the fourth and fifth Sundays in May, the attendance of ministering brethren from a distance, will afford our friends in destitute places, an opportunity of procuring preaching on the preceding and succeeding Sundays. Will those friends who wish to be thus supplied, and are willing to make a suitable compensation to the laborer, please signify their wishes to us, with such other particulars as are necessary for our information, before the first Sunday in May? If they will, we will do what we can to see that they are supplied as they may request.

Ministering brethren who may wish, or be able, to supply appointments at that time, and know no better way to accomplish their object, will please inform us respecting their wishes, and we will do what we can to make suitable and convenient appointments accordingly.

In this way, we hope a number of places within thirty or forty miles of this city, which now are seldom favored with the preached word, may have one or two long desired opportunities; and brethren who want appointments, will be enabled to preach the word as they go to and fro, and find the weariness and burdens of travel lightened and relieved by the hospitality and generosity of those for whom they labor. A. B. G.

CUSTOM.

Custom softens, without imparting a single captivating quality. And it hardens, without ever giving stability or usefulness. But the most singular circumstance of all is, that it should be so often used as an excuse for impropriety, and even indecency. Ask yonder supercilious and contemptible burthen to society, why he does not notice and speak to the honest laborer, and he says it is not customary. Ask the young lady why she submits to the flattery and sycophancy of a drunken spendthrift, rather than to the respectful attentions of an honest poor man. Custom compels her to do it. Ask the rich man why he does not assist the famishing—ask the convert to a fearful religion why he does not make restitution to those he has defrauded, and their excuse is, it is not customary. Such is the company which the votary of Custom keeps. If it was the custom always to do right, it might do some good, but even then it would be better to act from principle. What shall we say, then, of those who are governed by custom in defiance of good principle? A. R. B.

REV. E. A. GARFIELD.—CAUTION.

We have received information from two respectable and veracious persons, that E. A. Garfield, lately of Massena, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., has left that place for Canada, under a charge of forgery. He may be innocent, for aught we know, but other circumstances of a suspicious character, and his leaving the place while such a charge was pending against him, compel us to warn the public against crediting him as a Universalist preacher in good standing, or placing confidence in him as our agent for this paper. If he wishes to be trusted in either of these capacities, let him pay unto us what he has collected from our subscribers, and return and stand his trial for the charge preferred against him. Said Garfield is a talented, plausible, ingenious fellow, and can invent a smooth story as easily and as quickly as any man we ever met with, as we have found out by experience. A. B. Grosh.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

REMOVALS.—We were pleased to see by the last Christian Messenger, that Br. D. Ackley, of Hudson, has accepted an invitation to settle in Hamilton, Madison county. He commences his labors there next Sunday. Br. J. Whitney has removed from Akron to Ohio city, Ohio. He preaches one sermon every Sunday; but devotes the principal portion of his time to portrait painting. Br. L. H. Tabor has removed to Plainfield, Vt.—will labor there in Calais and East Montpelier.

Br. David Van Alstine has removed from Campbell, Steuben county, to South Livonia, Livingston county, to which place all letters and papers designed for him should be sent. Br. L. T. Clark has removed to Harford, Cortland county, and wishes all letters and papers designed for him sent to that place.

Br. Horace G. Smith was ordained pastor of the Universalist society in Berlin, Conn., on April 22d. Sermon by Br. J. Boyden.

The new meeting house, in Woonsocket, R. I., was dedicated April 8th. Sermon by Br. Boyden. On the 9th, Br. Boyden was installed Pastor. Sermon by Br. W. S. Balch; other services by Mrs. Baker, Ingalls, Bugbee and Cobb. The pews were nearly all let, at $1000 per annum. The Rhode Island State Convention held its annual session at the same time. Br. Balch, Moderator—Br. W. Fishbough, Clerk.

A society was formed at Fall River, Mass., March 18th—they now have preaching every Sunday. Our eastern brethren know how to do business, and secure constant preaching as the most effectual mode of prospering.

The Western Reserve Association, at Parkman, O., after having continued the case of Rev. Enos Leidy from August to September, and from September to January last, find him guilty of charges of falsehood, and unchristian conduct, and resolve—"That the Rev. Enos Leidy has not only been guilty of conduct incompatible with the sacerdotal character, but highly derogatory to the Christian religion, and that in consequence thereof, this Association withdraw fellowship from him.—January 26, 1840.—Eusebius Hoag, Clerk."

Br. Beecher's church, in Cincinnati, is advertised for sale by the Sheriff.

NEW AGENT.—Daniel Mercerau, Union Springs.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in May by Br. CHAMBERLAIN in Bridgewater—Br. GROSH in Taberg—Br. S. J. GIBSON near Br. Crandall's, East Green.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May by Br. CHAMBERLAIN in Vernon—Br. D. BIDDLECOM in Alder Creek.

The Central Association of Universalists in Michigan, will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, on the first Wednesday and Thursday, third and fourth of June next. It is desirable that preachers and delegates should be present the evening before, or by 8 o'clock, Wednesday morning, as the council will be opened at 9 o'clock, A. M., on Wednesday, at the Universalist Church. N. STACY, Standing Clerk.

A Conference of the Chautauque Association will be held in the Baptist meeting house in Stockton, the first Tuesday and Wednesday, 5th and 6th of May next. T. C. EATON, Clerk.

The Pennsylvania State Convention of Universalists will hold its annual session at Pottsville, Schuylkill county, on Wednesday and Thursday, 20th and 21st of May next. It is desired that all the delegates from each Association in the State may be present, also all the preachers belonging to the Convention.

A general attendance of the friends is particularly requested. Those from a distance will call at Br. Samuel Hart's store for direction. The Magazine and Advocate and Nazarene will please copy.

YOUTHFUL PIETY.

My locks are gray, my light is dim,
My form is bow'd with years:
I have seen many lovely things
In this dark vale of tears:
I've seen the high advance the low,
The rich befriending the poor,
I have seen smiling constancy
For love all ills endure.
I have seen bitter enemies
The tenderest friends become;
I have seen long-lost prodigals
In penitence come home;
But never have these eyes beheld
A sight so purely sweet,
As youth's unsullied spirit bowed
At the Redeemer's feet.

JULIET.

Tosanda, Pa.

EXPEDIENT OF A NEEDY TRAVELLER.—We have heard the story of an English half-pay officer living at Florence, much in debt, and desirous to get to England, but unable to procure his passport, without which he could not be permitted to depart, on account of the interference of his creditors. He one day, in a coffee-house, fell to abusing the Grand Duke in very outrageous terms, in consequence of which he was next day conducted to the Tuscan frontier by a police officer. The following expedient, related by a London paper, is much less obvious and more ingenious:—

John Kilburn, a person well known on the turf, as list seller, etc., was in a town in Bedfordshire, and as a turf phrase is, "quite broken down." It was during harvest, and the week before Richmond races, (Yorkshire,) whither he was travelling, and near which place he was born; to arrive there in time he hit upon the following expedient:—He applies to an acquaintance of his, a blacksmith, to stamp on a padlock the words "Richmond gaol," with which, and a chain fixed to one of his legs, he composedly went into a cornfield to sleep. As he expected, he was soon apprehended, and taken before a magistrate, who after some deliberation, ordered two constables to guard him to Richmond; as time was to be lost, for Kilburn said he had not been tried, and hoped they would not let him lay till another assize. The constables, on their arrival to the gaol, accosted the gaoler with, "Sir, do you know this man?" "Yes, very well; it is Kilburn; I have known him for many years." "We suppose he has broken out of your gaol, as he has a chain and padlock on with your mark; is he not a prisoner?" "I never heard any harm of him in my life." "Nor," says Kilburn, "have these gentlemen, sir; they have been so kind as to bring me out of Bedfordshire, and I will not put them to further inconvenience. I have got the key of the padlock, and I will not trouble them to unlock it; I am obliged to them for their kind behaviour." He traveled this way about 170 miles.

THE TRYING TREE.—Journeying one day along a midland road not far from Stirling, we passed by a very fine old tree in a field at a short distance. I remarked its beauty, to which Simon assented, but seemed for a while absorbed in recalling recollections associated with it. At last he said, pausing and looking back on the tree. "That sturdy old plant of other years reminds me of an incident which displayed a striking trait of character of the true old Scotch breed. That is or was called, the Trying Tree; and there a country lass had consented to meet her sweetheart one winter night, to arrange matters for the wedding. The night came, cold and foggy, and the girl, true to her appointment, set off silently, in the hopes of being back again before she was missed. It soon came on a heavy fall of snow, and snowed all night. The girl was not to be found; and all the roads round being not only impassable but invisible, from the depth of the drift, a whole week passed before any communication was possible with the neighboring farms, all which time nothing could be heard of her. At length the news reached her lover, who was lost and bewildered in contending feelings of wonder, fear and jealousy. On inquiry as to the time when his bride had been last seen, he found it was the night of their assignation, and the first of the snow. The Trying Tree flashed upon his mind, and thither, with a sturdy band of volunteer pioneers, he bent his course. On reaching the tree, they commenced digging around it, and soon all came to a solid hammock. Their spades and shovels were then exchanged for the simple labor of their hands, with which they gathered up and flung out the snow by gowpens; and ere this had been long continued, they succeeded in extricating the very girl, exactly eight days from the time she had been buried. You may guess it was a moment of agonizing perturbation which preceded the discovery that she was alive!

"On coming to the tree, and not finding her lover there, she drew her plaid tight around her, and sat down to wait him. She conjectured that the cold had made her drowsy; and the snow falling thick upon her, when she awoke she was unable to move, and felt herself as if alive in her grave, and cut off from the living world. Her lover was full of sorrow and of explanations. If he had but thought she could have ventured out on such a night, he would never have failed to keep his word, etc. Every young man's mind will suggest the proper thing to be said on the occasion; but Lizzy, who could scarcely be suspected of bestowing any but cold looks at such a time, took no notice of him whatever. The country people who had accompanied him had a supply of cordials, and he was loud and earnest in enjoining them to 'give her something warm instantly;' and a glass of spirits was offered, which she gravely pushed aside. 'Give me a glass of water,' said she; 'it's a cold heart that canna warm a drink to itself.'

"Her Joe was ardent in his addresses, but she repulsed him with endless scorn. Whether she ever took a husband or not, I have forgotten; but it is certain she never married him."

EARLY MARRIAGES.—The author of a work called "The Monk of La Trappe's Pilgrimage to Palestine," gives a curious account of a practice prevailing in some parts of Arabia.

"Parents are accustomed to promise their children, when they are but two years old, one year old, or even younger. A Catholic Arab said to me a few days since, rubbing his hands for joy: 'I have just promised my daughter—it is an excellent match for her.' 'How old is she?' 'A fortnight.' 'And her intended?' 'Four years.' 'I have doubtly to congratulate you—never in my life do I recollect to have heard of a more innocent couple.' The father of the male child buys the girl; he bargains about the price, and pays down part immediately, by way of earnest. In our European countries, parents could not settle their daughters respectably in life, unless they were to give them a portion; here, on the contrary, as you see, the father is paid for his daughter, so that the more children of the female sex he has the richer he is. How often have I not already heard the expression, 'My wife cost me so much—'tis a high price.' In conversing with the workmen who made chaplets and other things for me, I have frequently asked the question: 'How much did your wife cost you?' and those to whom I addressed it answered it immediately, and with the greatest sincerity. 'I paid eight hundred piastres for mine,' said one of them one day. 'And what was the price of your mother?' I proceeded. 'Four hundred piastres.' 'That is very low in comparison.' 'But, father, the piastre was worth more than it is now.'

A MELANCHOLY TRUTH.—A man of genius consumes one portion of his life in painful studies; another in addressing his labors to the public; the last inconsiderable remnant of his life, he perhaps begins to enjoy the public esteem for which he had sacrificed its solid consolations, his fortune, his tranquility, and his domestic cares. Amid the funeral cypress, he sees the green leaves of the laurel. He resembles a veteran soldier, who at the moment he is carried from the trenches in an expiring state, receives the honors of promotion.

THE WOMAN WHO WENT ABROAD.—A lady who was in the habit of spending most of her time in the society of her neighbors, happened one day to be taken suddenly ill, and sent her husband in great haste for a physician. The husband ran a few rods, but soon returned exclaiming, "My dear, where shall I find you when I get back?"

DEATHS.

In Grand Rapids, Mich., September 5th, 1839, Doct. STEPHEN WILSON. A meeting of the Grand River Lyceum, of which Doct. Wilson was one of its most valuable members, was held on the following day, at which the following preamble and resolutions were passed.

Whereas—In the dispensation of Divine Providence, Doctor Stephen Wilson, a valuable citizen, and an able practitioner in the art of healing, a young gentleman worthy of the high estimation in which he was held by a large circle of devoted friends, is now no more; and whereas this affliction that has cast a wide-spread gloom over this community, extorting the pangs of grief from every bosom, demands a proper demonstration of respect for his undying memory: And whereas, in addition to his faithful efforts to promote the general welfare of the intellectual, moral, and physical condition of this new settlement, in which he took an early interest, as an enterprising pioneer, he has rendered his name dear and conspicuous by his services, talents, and attendance upon this literary association: And whereas, it is ever highly becoming for all such societies to bestow a token of unfeigned respect to the memory of a fellow member, whose eternal spirit has fled to that bourne whence no traveller returns—

Therefore be it unanimously Resolved, by the members of the Grand Rapids Lyceum, that we will join his distant and bereaved relatives, united with the sympathies of his numerous friends who surrounded his dying bedside, feeling with us that the loss is not only of a valuable associate and companion, but a valuable brother, whose death awakens emotions the poignancy of which becomes the strongest evidence of sincerity in our inexpressible grief.

Resolved, that in demonstration of our heart felt esteem, we will unanimously join the funeral procession to-morrow morning, and walk as mourners of our lamented friend and associate, to the final home of his earthly remains.

Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed to transmit a copy of these resolutions, together with a letter of condolence, to his friends, and also a copy for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, printed at Utica, N. Y.

In Marcy, Oneida county, N. Y., on the 16th instant, Mr. ALLEN FAXTON, in the 80th year of his age. Mr. F. was a soldier in the revolutionary war—was respected in life and resigned in death.

His funeral was attended on the 17th instant, in the Methodist meeting house in Marcy, and a discourse delivered on the occasion by the writer. It was listened to with devout attention, by a large concourse of people. May they profit by "the word spoken."

The aged widow mourns not as those who have no hope. She expects to follow him soon. May her last moments on earth be her happiest. And may that Gospel which consoles her under this afflictive stroke of Divine Providence, impart to the minds of all the surviving relatives resignation and peace.

In Phoenix, on the 5th February, ALVIN ALLEN, junior, son of Alvin and Catherine Allen, aged two years and six months. Funeral on the 6th. Sermon by the writer.

W. MARTIN.

At Hoosick Falls, January 25th, very suddenly, of the croup, CLORINDA M., only daughter of James L. and Malina Wells, aged 3 years, 1 month and 16 days.

In Conewango, April 2d Mrs. HANNAH DARLING, wife of John Darling, aged 45 years. In life she was an example of the domestic and social virtues—and a firm believer in the final salvation of all intelligences, as a doctrine that not only brings peace in prosperity—but one, being an incentive to virtue that would bring support in the hour of death. She has left a husband, ten children, and a large circle of friends to mourn an irreparable loss. The funeral was attended on the 5th, and a large congregation assembled, to pay the last tribute of respect to departed worth. Sermon by the writer.

PROPOSALS.

For publishing in Utica, N. Y., a monthly periodical, containing original Universalist Sermons, to be called,

THE UNIVERSALIST PULPIT.

A. B. GROSH, EDITOR.

There is now no such periodical in our denomination. From our inability to publish in the Magazine and Advocate all the sermons we are requested to publish, we know that one is needed. We will strive to supply that want with a variety of original sermons, of the best literary character, (preferring the doctrinal and practical combined, to the controversial) published in a style creditable to all concerned. To do so, we ask 650 subscribers, on the following terms which must be rigidly adhered to in all cases.

We think we shall be enabled to issue the first number in June next—but to do this, all who want the work must subscribe soon, and pay in advance when notified; for we will not commence until 650 copies are subscribed for, and will then limit the edition to the demand, and will supply paying subscribers only. None need fear paying on subscribing, for even should the Pulpit not be published, the money will be refunded, or applied as they may order.

Utica, April 3d, 1840.

A. B. &amp; C. C. P. GROSH.

CONDITIONS.—1. The Universalist Pulpit will be published early in each month, on good white paper, with new long primer type, in large 12mo. form, neatly folded and stitched in handsome, printed covers.

2. Each volume will contain at least 26 original sermons, (by adding an extra number with the title page and index at the close of the year,) thus making a volume suitable for binding, of 312 pages per annum.

3. It will be afforded to single subscribers at one dollar per annum—but when six copies are ordered in one package to be directed to a single address, they will be furnished for five dollars per annum—or thirteen copies for ten dollars per annum—always payable in advance, and all discount and postage to be paid by those ordering the work.

4. No subscriptions received for less than one year—and all payments will be refunded by the publishers, unless the conditions on their part are fulfilled.

AGENTS.—Agents of the Magazine and Advocate, and all responsible postmasters and others friendly to the work, are requested to procure good subscribers, and forward their names and address before the first of June next, to

JONAH AND HIS GOURD.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

"Then said the Lord, thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not labored neither madest it grow: which came up in a night and perished in a night: And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that can not discern between their right hand and their left hand, and much cattle?" Jonah iv: 10, 11.

Where is the philanthropic Christian that can read the above plain and beautiful appeal to the tenderest sensibilities of the human heart, without feeling his soul and all that is within him glow with gratitude and love to his Heavenly Father? What adorable and all-glorious conceptions of an omniscient, omnipresent God, does the above language present to finite man! How full of compassion and tenderness! It breathes the very spirit of that "God who is love." It is the voice of a father, pleading for his dear but refractory child—in whose every tone is blended alike pity and love. That voice was re-echoed again on Calvary's rugged brow, and rung through heaven's blue concave, and echoed back to perishing man—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" We hear its peaceful, mild, and harmonious sound, yet wafted in the cool zephyrs of evening; in the pure limpid stream which flows murmuring along; in the dulcet songs of the feathered tribes, which fill the earth with their melody. We read the character of that God in every flower that sheds its rich odors to the winds; in every spire of grass which waves its tiny blade in the breeze, in every ray of yon glorious luminary which shines but to bless, in every plenteous shower that cheers and replenishes the earth, and causes it to bud and bring forth sustenance for every living thing. But there are those that can not thus read his glorious character—those who view him, not as the universal friend of man, but as an unfeeling Sovereign.

It would seem that Jonah at first entertained nobler views of God's character; for when the message was given him to carry to Nineveh, he believed it not, therefore he refused to go as the Lord had commanded him. He believed him to be "a God gracious and merciful, slow to anger," and therefore fled unto Tarshish; but what were the judgments which God threatened the Ninevites with, compared to endless burnings? Nothing at all! and yet Jonah refused to carry the message, because he believed God would repent himself of the evil. O, what a lesson is this, for those who advocate the unholy, God-dishonoring doctrine of eternal wo! But more than this. After Jonah had cried in their city—"yet thirty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown"—after the people had put sackcloth upon them, and humbled themselves even in the dust, crying mightily to God for the forgiveness of their sins—then, even then was Jonah angry; and prayed unto the Lord, that he would take his life from him, saying "it is better for me to die." But what was the reply? Jonah, "doest thou well to be angry?" Mark the mildness of that question! Take notice of the means which were used to convince him of his weakness and folly! It is nought but a simple gourd, which is suffered to grow up to cast its cooling shade around his head to deliver him from his grief. But as mysteriously as the gourd was produced, in like manner was it swept away, and the sun beat upon his head so that he fainted. Then again wished he himself to die, and said, "it is better for me to die than to live." But in the mildness of Heaven the voice came again—"Jonah, doest thou well to be angry?" "Thou hast had pity on the gourd, which came up in a night and perished in a night; and should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than six score thousand people that can not discern between their right hand and their left hand, and much cattle?" What an effect must such an appeal have had upon the heart of Jonah? Could it fail to convict him of the error of his ways, and lead him to rejoice in such a God of mercy and compassion? Certainly not.

Let us apply our subject to modern times, and see if there are not Jonahs still in our very midst. Those there are who suppose, at least, that they have a message of wrath from the Father of all spirits, to deliver—not to the Ninevites—but to the vast family of man—a message, which as far exceeds that delivered to Jonah in cruelty, as eternity exceeds one moment of time. But they, unlike him, believe it true, and that God will never repent himself of that endless evil. Judging by the feelings of Jonah when he discovered that his message had proved not true, and that God had pardoned all their sin and averted the impending destruction, what will be the chagrin, not to say the anger, of those who have been engaged all their lives "in dealing damnation round the land, on each they deemed God's foe"—when, through the intercession and mediation of the Saviour of the world, all shall be restored to holiness, to God, and to perfect bliss?"

INSPIRATION OF NATURE.

BY REV. H. TORREY.

How is it possible for man to gaze around him, and view the admirable fitness of things, without feeling emotions of gratitude within his bosom to the great Artificer of the universe! What mind can contemplate the varied, and ever varying scenery of our earth, and at the same time be a stranger to the devotional spirit which the soft-breathing eloquence of nature's stillness seems to enkindle in the reflective soul! Nature, like music, has charms to soothe the savage heart—to lull to repose all the furious storms of passion, and to soften down our feelings into a mild, calm, and holy tranquility.

But how many are dead to its peaceful influence! How many are insensible of those lessons of wisdom imprinted on every object around them. How many admire the glories and beauties of the visible world, without reflecting upon the greatness of that wisdom which planned, and of that power which executed the mighty universe! Such are those whose minds do never look "through nature up to nature's God." Like the child who admires the watch for its beauty, but does not reflect upon the mind that contrived, or the skill necessary in its formation; so does man look upon nature and admire it for its adaptedness to the wants of all sensitive and moral beings, for the harmony of its laws, and the beauty of its construction, without a single thought relative to the character of its Almighty Author!

"Man views it and admires; but rests content
With what he views. The landscape has his praise,
But not its author. Unconcerned who formed
The paradise he sees—he finds it such,
And such well pleased to find it—asks no more."

There are such, but such there should not be, who have wrapped themselves in stupidity, to slumber in ignorance. But that number is small who can view the wonderful works of creation and remain unconcerned with regard to its great author. Callous indeed must be the understanding of him who can look at nature and then rest satisfied to "ask no more." The human mind is formed for investigation. Man is endowed with faculties which enable him to explore the deep things of God; and while he has before him, in imagination, the boundless universe, is it possible for his mind to stop in its researches, and say, I ask no more? No! his thoughts can not be stayed—they are traversing the wide field of immensity, and will not return until they can bring back the sweet conviction to his heart, that everything bears the impress of Deity. And thus the soul

"Discerns in all things, what with stupid gaze
Of ignorance, till then she overlooked,
A ray of heavenly light, gilding all forms
Terrestrial in the vast and the minute;
The unambiguous footsteps of the God,
Who gives its lustre to an insect's wing,
And wheels his throne upon the rolling worlds."

The works of art we may admire; the genius and intellect of man as exhibited in the proud monuments of earthly wisdom may excite our attention and call forth our praise, but the sublime works of nature only can kindle within our hearts that more holy and exalted feeling—the spirit of devotion!

"The achievements of art may amuse,
May even our wonder excite;
But groves, hills and vallies diffuse
A lasting, a sacred delight."

There is an inspiration in nature—a language of powerful eloquence, which speaks to the soul and tells of God. And what does it say of him? There is no ambiguity in the language—no clash of words—no discord of sentiment. We hear it say that the unbounded love of God prompted his almighty power to execute the designs of his infinite wisdom. And on nature's every page is manifested the greatness and goodness of God. We have already learned by observation and experience that all the operations of nature are calculated to benefit, and to increase the happiness of all sensitive and intelligent beings. As God is the Maker and Father of all, he promotes equally their welfare. In this is taught an important lesson. The slothful worm—the meanest reptile, or the most disgusting thing on earth, receives the attention of God; is fed, clothed and preserved by him. Thus man should learn to "not think of himself more highly than he ought to think," by despising or disregarding the beings of an inferior grade. Do we ask for proof that God is impartial? Then reflect that there is a means in nature to satisfy the returning wants of all who live. Every thing is happy in its sphere, and seems to rejoice in the consciousness of its own existence.

How orderly and harmonious are the works of nature! With what convincing eloquence do they speak forth the sentiment that "God is good unto all." "The Lord reigneth," is declared by all the things of earth, and the sentiment is reflected from the bright luminaries of heaven. Considering the greatness of the visible world, how vast in being—how infinite in excellence—how omnipotent in power, must be the Almighty, who is,

"Of all nature's wide extent, the soul, Exists in every part, and animates the whole!"

When we are led forth to contemplate the beauties of surrounding nature, then will our souls derive new energy from the consideration that we are gazing upon the dwelling place of the great Eternal; and realizing that "THE LORD IS IN HIS HOLY TEMPLE," may we feel to rejoice in the excellency of his glory, and with "all the earth KEEP SILENCE BEFORE HIM." The grandeur and sublimity of the outward universe speaks forth in the language of convincing eloquence, which sinks deep into the heart—"Be still! and know that I am God." "Come, then, expressive silence, muse His praise."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXV.

NEW TESTAMENT.

We now come to the New Testament, and as the authors of these books, and the time and place when and where they were written are so generally known, we shall not pay much attention to these particulars. We shall, without much attention to order, select from the New Testament such passages as appear dark and mysterious, and throw as much light on them as possible, availing ourselves of all the helps within our reach.

MATTHEW.—This book was written by the evangelist whose name it bears, and it was originally written in Hebrew. The translation of it into Greek, was made in the year 61—by whom, is not known—some say by Matthew himself. Matthew was by birth a Jew. His office was that of a tax gatherer, and he is thought to be the same person who was sometimes called Levi. He was the immediate disciple or follower of our Lord, and relates what he saw and heard.

Chapter 1. In this chapter we have an account of the genealogy of Jesus Christ. The genealogy here, as given by Matthew, does not agree with that of Luke. The probability is, that either, 1st, these genealogical tables have been corrupted, or 2d, Matthew may have traced the genealogy on the father's side, and Luke on the mother's, as some suppose, or the genealogies might have been originally imperfect. The Jews kept genealogical tables on rolls, which might have been consulted by these evangelists, and though they were in the main correct, yet they might be deficient in many things. For a full exposition of this, see "Clark on the four Gospels." So far from this being an objection to the Bible, it is in fact a confirmation of its truth, for if it were forged, the forgers of it would surely have taken pains not to have made a blunder like this.

Chap. i: 18. "When his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph before they came together," etc.

They were betrothed. It was customary among the Jews to enter into the marriage agreement, and the woman was espoused at her own or her father's house, sometimes long previous to her being taken home, or living with her husband. See Deut. xx: 7, and Judg. xiv: 7, 8. This will account for the expression, "before they came together," etc.

Chap. ii: 1. "Behold there came wise men from the east," etc.

These were probably Persian philosophers, or magi. Many Jews were mixed with this people, and they had heard probably of the predictions relating to the Messiah, and seem to have been guided by a divine impulse.

Verse 2. "And have come to worship him," etc., i. e., to do him homage.

The original word is used to express both civil and religious reverence; and this kind of homage is paid also to great men. We are not to suppose that they were to worship him as God, for this would be more than Jesus ever desired or claimed. As to what is here called a star, some say it was a meteor; others a luminous appearance like an aurora borealis; others a comet. There is no doubt the appearance was very striking, whatever it might have been.

Chap. iii: 1. "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea," etc.

That is in the country parts, as distinguished from the city, for in this sense the word is used.

Verse 7. "Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come."

The desolation which was about to pass on the Jewish nation for their wickedness, and threatened in the last words of their own Scriptures. See Malachi, iv: 6. This wrath or curse fell on them to the uttermost.

ARRANGEMENTS IN NATURE.

When I was a younger man than I am now, I used frequently to wonder why water did not freeze to the very bottom of our ponds and rivers, and thus deprive us of the power of watering our cattle. The reason why I wondered was this:—I knew that the general law as to the bulk of bodies was, that the bulk increased in proportion as the body became hot, and decreased as the body lost its heat or caloric, or in proportion as it became cold. Now if this were the case with water, as soon as ice was formed it would be less in bulk than water, and would consequently sink. Another layer of ice would then form and then sink; and in this way, even in this climate, we would soon have our deepest wells, ponds, and streams, transformed into solid masses of ice. What a miserable condition would the whole animal creation be in then? Our fish all destroyed, our cattle unable to slake their thirst, and man obliged to melt all the water he used! Was it not to prevent these direful consequences that the wise Architect of all made water an exception to the above named general law? The greatest density of water is about 40 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, so that when water gets colder than that, instead of sinking, as it should do according to the general law, it actually rises to the surface. Again; water cooled to 40 degrees sinks and gives place to that of a higher temperature, which in its turn, when about 40 degrees allows warmer water to rise to the surface. Before ice forms the whole of the water is thus cooled down to 40 degrees. The top stratum being now cooled below 40 degrees, becomes specifically lighter than that below, and consequently remains at the top until it has become congealed, which happens at 32 degrees. Ice, we are told, is a bad conductor, especially with a little snow upon it; it therefore increases very slowly, and thus shelters the water below. Thus fish are preserved at a temperature of 40 degrees; and by this beautiful provision, in exception to a general law of nature, our rivers, lakes, and other fountains of water are kept from becoming a solid mass of ice, which even our summer would scarcely restore to fluidity.

This subject was brought fresh to my mind today, by meeting with a young friend to whom the difficulty had occurred, but to whom the explanation was unknown. I explained it to him as above, and I have no doubt he will be induced, by this wise and obviously beneficent provision of Nature, along with others with which he will become conversant as he advances in life, to reflect and mentally exclaim often, "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice!"

WHAT CAN I DO?

This is a question that is very frequently asked by mankind while pursuing the ordinary business of life—not only asked, but meditated upon, time after time, contriving some way to increase their possessions or spread their fame. And all this is just and proper: for man is an active being, and it is impossible for him to remain idle; he will and must act, either for the better, or worse. Now, as mankind are imitative beings, and copy much after the example of others, how important it is that we pay strict regard to all our actions. Knowing that others will copy after us, let us study rather to amuse than divert; for "solid sense is generally preferred to vain wit." Let us not only ask ourselves what we can do, but inquire if we can do it in a proper manner, that it may exert a beneficial influence on our associates.

While perusing the valuable paper, the Magazine and Advocate, during the past winter, what should I behold but my name put down as agent for it. What can I do? Why is this? was the inquiry that recurred to me. Certainly there must be something for me to do, (thought I,) or I would not have been appointed. But why was I appointed? Why not some one that was more capable? Then it recurred to me, that from him to whom much is given, much is required—and if my abilities are small, they will not require much of me. But on looking around, and seeing how little my superiors had done, I thought I might as well bury my talent at once, for those that had five had not done much better. But on taking the second view, I saw there was much to be done, and if they had neglected to do their duty, that was no excuse for me. Wishing to have all men receive the truth; but how could I sound "the still small voice" in their ears? Perhaps I can do it (thought I) by loaning them books, or by inducing them to take some Universalist periodical. Therefore to work I went, and the result of my labors thus far is this. I have obtained three subscribers for the Magazine and Advocate. And this much I have learned, "that success is secure unless energy fails." Brethren, what think ye? Have you not some in your vicinity whom you can induce to take a Universalist periodical that will be a benefit to them and some publisher? Try and see. AN AGENT.

Oppenheim, March, 1840.

REMARKS.—Good active agents are the right hand of the publisher. Without them it would be impossible to continue our paper a single year. We thank the writer of the above for his desire to see them more engaged and active, and hope his words will not be in vain to those who need them. May 1st is a good time to begin subscriptions, for those who do not want a full file; as a one dollar bill will pay to the end of the volume, i. e., for 35 numbers. It is also a good time to get subscribers; for the changes by removals have now taken place, and agents may find new neighbors who should be supplied with the paper. In all such cases, a good Universalist paper should be introduced, where possible. But remember mercy to the publisher—better send no new names, than get an irresponsible, shiftless one—unless you can get him to pay in advance. And even then, please inform us to stop it when the pay runs out, unless reordered. A. B. G.

"DUTIES OF YOUNG MEN, BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN."—This very acceptable tribute to the cause of morality and virtue, consists of six lectures, which, as is set forth in the preface, were originally delivered in Richmond, Va., and repeated in Charlestown, Mass. They form a neat little volume of 212 pages.

These lectures exhibit the self, social, intellectual and moral duties of young men. They are written in a chaste, manly style, and abound with many of those bursts of eloquence for which their talented author is so justly celebrated.

My acquaintance with Mr. Chapin commenced about three years since. The pathos, the energy, and the eloquence which shines in every page of his work, brought back to my mind with the freshness of yesterday, many scenes, when the same depth of feeling and energy of thought, fell warm from the lips, upon hearts delighted and made better by the contact. He is still a young man. His book is emphatically an appeal, "from the young to the young," and its value is enhanced for that very reason; for, he well observes in his opening lecture that, "There is a charm in sympathy which gives efficacy to exhortation;" and, "A degree of influence which those who participate naturally in our feelings may exert. That others, who can not, in all respects, place themselves in a like condition, will fail to obtain."

The work is for sale at O. Hutchinson's. To those who are acquainted with the author, I would say, buy it. It perusal will be to you like converse with a familiar friend. And to those who have not had that pleasure, I would say the same; for it contains excellent precepts and valuable advice; and coming as it does from a member of the class to whom it is addressed, it stands forth a bright and shining evidence that morality and virtue may find an able advocate in heads yet beaming with the freshness of early manhood, and in hearts yet warm with the glow of youth.

VOLUNTARY OBEDIENCE.

"I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart." This has often been the theme of my meditations as I went forth to my labors. I presume every man, who has exchanged the gloomy and heart-contracting views presented by Calvinists, for the cheering, animating, and heart-expanding sentiments entertained by real Universalists, must have felt the enlargement of heart mentioned by the Psalmist, and the consequent increased facility and freedom in treading the paths by Heaven approved. Formerly, the practical part of Christianity seemed like an impractical requisition, like a task imposed upon us without strength or stimulus to carry us through it; now, thank Heaven, we feel far otherwise; we feel, in the character of an impartial, benign, and universal Parent, a moving power which impels to cheerful obedience, and literally, makes us run—if we are not negligent in cultivating the spirit and influence of our views—in the way of his commandments. For this we prize—we had almost said adore—the liberal and enlightened views of Universalists. Most fervently do we pray that every one who becomes persuaded of the truth of Universalism by appeals to his own reasoning powers, and to the Scriptures of truth, may also be led onward to experience its animating, purifying, and cheering effects upon the inner man, and the outward conduct. His own experience, will then be the strongest argument in favor of the views "every where spoken against."

BR. GROSH—If you think proper to insert in your paper the following extract from the Oberlin Evangelist, you are at liberty so to do. The Oberlin Evangelist is published at Oberlin, Ohio, under the direction of C. G. Finny. The article alluded to is editorial, and is eminently entitled to notice on account of the candid acknowledgment of facts which, although known to community generally, are cautiously concealed from the members of the denomination of which this Mr. Finny is the head and front.

EXTRACT. "Now this is the kind of confession and this is the kind of forsaking which we mean and which is necessary for the promotion of revivals. Who does not know that the Church is filled with a worldly spirit?—that she is deeply involved in speculations?—that she has much property in her hands fraudulently obtained?—that she is indulgent in many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition?—that she is eaten up with a party and sectarian spirit? and in short, that she is very far from having the spirit of Christ, without which she is none of his?"—Oberlin Evangelist of March 25, 1840.

What a comment upon the practices of those who sneer and profess to scorn at the idea of God's universal grace and impartial goodness to his fallible children.

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

Br. Whittemore says there are now one hundred and ten Universalist preachers in Massachusetts; and gives a list of some twenty societies that are yet in want of pastors. The cause appears to advance rapidly and permanently in that State. We would not hold the Bay State back, but wish the other States, particularly our own, could be impelled forward more rapidly in the march.

The meeting house in Barre, Mass., was dedicated April 22d. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou.

At a late meeting of the Middlesex Conference in Mass., a number of preachers present could not be prevailed on to preach. We pity their great modesty and diffidence—it must be "a very great cross" to such persons to speak in public, even in defence of truth and righteousness!!!

The Christian Freeman, and Family Visitor, a large, folio, Universalist paper, published every week in Boston and Waltham, Mass., has entered on its second volume. Br. S. Cobb, of Waltham, Editor and Proprietor. It gives special place in its columns to discussions of, and articles on, the temperance and abolition questions. It is well printed and ably edited.

REMOVALS.—Br. E. Hewitt has engaged to labor every Sunday with the Society in Albington, Mass. Br. C. F. Lefevre, of New-York city, has removed to Hudson, to take the pastoral charge of the society lately left destitute by the removal of Br. D. Ackley to Hamilton. The brethren in New-York regret to lose Br. L. from their midst. Br. F. Hitchcock, late of Newtown, should be addressed at Westport, Conn. Br. C. S. Brown has engaged to remove from Upper Lisle, N. Y. to Bethany, Pa. Br. H. Torrey has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to settle in Pittsburg, Pa. He removes there, from South Brainbridge, N. Y., about the first of July next.

The Society in Providence, R. I., has colonized and formed a second society in that city, under the pastoral care of Br. J. N. Parker. The places of the colonists from the first society were immediately filled by others who had been waiting for room in the house. Thus a society is born in a day—the time will come when a nation shall thus come into the church.

The second volume of the Layman's Legacy has been issued from the press. It contains 497 large 12mo pages—price, $1.25. Br. Hutchinson will soon have some for sale.

Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d, of Medford, Mass., proposes to fix three or four stated periods in each year, at which students will be received by him, for instruction in theological studies—thus arranging them in classes, so as to save his time and theirs, and greatly facilitate their studies. It is needless to say, that there are few in our order, more capable to instruct the candidate for the ministry, than Br. H. B. 2d.

THE REGISTER.—No returns have yet been received for the Register (save one)—and but one communication for the Companion. I hope the standing Clerks of the Conventions and Associations will immediately make known to me all the alterations which they wish to, or which should, be made from last year. A few brief articles for the Companion will also be very acceptable, if sent soon.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH in Burrville, and once in four weeks thereafter—Br. COOK in Marshall and Br. GROSH in this city—Br. WHITAKER in Vernon in lieu of Br. CHAMBERLAIN.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. COOK in Auburn and Br. MONTGOMERY in this city—Br. FRENCH in South Champion, and once in four weeks thereafter—Br. GIBSON in Columbus—Br. WHITAKER in Vernon—Br. GROSH in Bridgewater.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. COOK in Auburn and Br. MONTGOMERY in this city—Br. FRENCH in Tylersville, and once in four weeks thereafter—Br. GROSH in Union meeting house in Lee, and in Delta at 5 P. M.

The Central Association of Universalists, will meet at Hamilton Centre on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June next (3d and 4th). Occasional Sermon by the writer. Societies and churches will be careful to select and send two delegates each, with statements of their condition and prospects.

T. D. COOK,
Standing Clerk.

The Central Association of Universalists in Michigan, will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, on the first Wednesday and Thursday, third and fourth of June next. It is desirable that preachers and delegates should be present the evening before, or by 8 o'clock, Wednesday morning, as the council will be opened at 9 o'clock, A. M., on Wednesday, at the Universalist Church.

N. STACY, Standing Clerk.

The Pennsylvania State Convention of Universalists will hold its annual session at Pottsville, Schuylkill county, on Wednesday and Thursday, 20th and 21st of May next. It is desired that all the delegates from each Association in the State may be present, also all the preachers belonging to the Convention.

A general attendance of the friends is particularly requested. Those from a distance will call at Br. Samuel Hart's store for direction. The Magazine and Advocate and Nazarene will please copy.

"I WOULD NOT LIVE ALWAYS."—Job.

When the patient man gave utterance to this saying, he spake as a truly religious philosopher. He saw life and death each in their true light—each designed by Jehovah for good—the one following the other in continued and regular succession.

Let us consider this declaration of the excellent Job—and in doing this, we may notice some of the reasons which we may suppose led him to make it; reasons which would operate in the same manner in our minds, and lead us to adopt and express the same language. Why is it not desirable to live always?

1. Because of the trials of life. True, many trials and troubles which we are called to encounter here, may prove serviceable to us, if we will rightly understand and improve them. Yet this is not the privilege of the great mass. They do not so reason. Trials are not considered as they stand connected with the true science of human life. We grow sick of life from what we see of its deceptions. When we are looking for sunshine, darkness and storm come upon us. When we promise ourselves prosperity, then comes adversity to lay our brightest prospects in the dust. When we think ourselves surrounded with this world's goods, some unseen train is laid that shall yet scatter all our hard earnings, or accumulated riches, to the winds, and we are hard in hand with pinching poverty. We mourn, we repine, we struggle to suppress the uprising of our souls, we ask if it is thus with others, and the answer is in the affirmative. "Man that is born of woman, is of few days, and full of trouble." Thus we read, thus we think of life's trials. Thousands are now weary of earthly existence, from the cause we are considering. They have met sorrow where they sought joy—have fallen where they hoped to rise. So heavily does affliction weigh them down, that they look with earnest hope to that period which shall bid them lie down in that peaceful sleep "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

2. Sickness and pain induce us to say we would not live always. We who are blessed with health and strength, who know but little of bodily debility, are not properly qualified to judge from experience in this matter. We ought to see the dark places of suffering in our world—the apartments of anguish—the pillows of sharp distress—

"Those who, tossed on beds of pain,
Seek for ease, but seek in vain;
Those whose weeping, longing eyes
Watch to see the morning rise."

How much of this is realized among men! and often where it is realized, the mind sickens with the body in prospect of protracted suffering. It grows weary of life because life seems so heavy—the cloud so continually envelopes—the light so long refuses to appear. The happiest ones among us are made to suffer. In the midst of health, love, joy and peace, the fondest delights and hopes fly at the wasting touch of disease, and pain comes to tell the mortal of his earthliness. It was the affliction of which we are speaking that caused Job to say, "I would not live always." He would go to a land where the inhabitant should not say, I am sick, but where perpetual health and life should be the portion of man.

3. The loss of friends leads us to desire that we may not live always. As time goes on, and as friend after friend drops away—although others come up and take their new stations around us, these can not take affection from those whose lives and sympathies were interwoven with ours in earlier days. Memory will be true; and in the secret chambers of the soul she will often bring before us those we would give worlds to behold, and join, and love again, and whom we hope to meet in the blessed regions of immortality.

It is related that one of the aged prisoners who was released from the French Bastille upon the accession of Lewis Sixteenth to the throne, was so grieved in not finding any of his family, friends, or associates of his earlier days, that he sought again the gloom of the prison. This denied him, he soon died, because he could find none who could say to him, "We were formerly known to each other."

4. The doctrine of immortal life leads us to adopt the sentiment of the man of Uz. This consideration belongs especially to the believer in Gospel truth. If others without great faith, are led in view of the ills of human existence, to desire death, the Christian in view of the promises and assurances of immortal life given in the Scriptures, may well exclaim with Job, that it is not his desire to live here always. It is not his wish, however, because God has promised him perfect bliss hereafter, to be so impatient of delay as to overlook the benefits and enjoyments of this life in his longings after that of the future. He does not say that because his gracious Father has promised him a rich inheritance hereafter, it is therefore of but little or no consequence about the present; that this life is a burden, and the next, only, worth possessing. Such would not be the reasoning of a grateful, humble heart. He loves this life because God gave it; and he seeks to make it a profitable, pleasant, and happy one. He loves the future by faith—and cheerfully awaits the moment when his Father shall call upon him to enter into its joys. This is the Christian's Gospel view of life and death; and so he has said,

"Who, who would live away, away from his God,
Away from bright heaven, that blissful abode,
Where the anthems of pleasure roll o'er the bright plains,
And the noon tide of glory eternally reigns."

MAN THE AUTHOR OF THE DOCTRINE OF NEVER-ENDING PAIN.

In the Spring of the year 1838, I attended a Methodist meeting in Mount Vernon, Ohio, and heard the presiding Elder deliver a discourse on the origin of the doctrine of endless punishment, not in the ordinary way of a "Thus saith the Lord," but offering his own ipse dixit, and as he would have the audience to understand, by the principles of Logic. "It is affirmed," said he, "by infidels, that man was the author of the doctrine of endless punishment. If he were, then he must have been either a bad man, or a good man; a bad man would not invent such an awful doctrine, for it would be a terror to himself, involving himself in the same fearful doom; and a good man could not consistent with his goodness; therefore, God must have been the author of the doctrine of endless pain."

Who could reverence and love such a God? He can not be the living God who giveth life and breath to all—giving them freely all things richly to enjoy. What! the kind Father who giveth us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with gladness, causing his sun to shine on all, both the thankful and the unthankful, his rain also to fall equally on the just and on the unjust—represented to be worse than the worst of bad men? "A bad man would not be the inventor of the doctrine of endless pain," but God would!! Horrible to tell! A Being of infinite goodness represented by his professed ministers as possessing a character more detestable than enmity's imagination can conceive! How long shall such shepherds have the care of the flock of thy pasture, O Lord, how long? "A good man could not, consistent with his goodness." Happy, thrice happy thought! A truly good man can never willingly be the cause of positive evil to any being. Very truly; but is he better than the God who gave him this benevolence? Is his compassion more easily moved from knowing in part the wants of suffering humanity, than His who knoweth them in full—who openeth his hand and satisfieth the wants and laudable desires of every living thing? Let virtue hide her blushing face and secretly retire.

But who art thou, O man, that maketh thyself better than God? Art thou wiser than he! Behold, he taketh the wise in their own craftiness. But suppose I apply the rule. You must either be a good man, a bad man, both, or neither. A bad man would not be the inventor of such a doctrine as that of endless pain—much less believe and teach it, for it would be a trap to catch his own heels. A good man could not, consistently with his goodness, advocate such a doctrine. A man that is both good and bad, both could not, and would not teach such a hope-blighting doctrine. You do profess to believe and teach said doctrine; therefore you must be neither good nor bad. Pray, Sir, what sort of a man are you?

ANOTHER CONVERSION FROM PARTIALISM.

BR. GROSH—Believing "that there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth"—and knowing that "there is joy" among the sincere believers in God's changeless and impartial love, whenever they hear of another individual who has broken the fetters of bigotry and prejudice—discarded those errors in which he had been daily instructed, from his earliest infancy—and received in their stead, that doctrine which teaches the certain destruction of sin, and the ultimate reconciliation and purification of all intelligences; I have taken the responsibility of sending you the following extract from a letter lately received from a young gentleman who has been, for the last ten years, a regular member in good standing in the Congregational Church.

The letter was written without the most distant expectation of its ever being perused by any one except myself—and I am induced to make the following extract, by a desire to aid in advancing the cause of impartial truth; and furnish our Partialist friends with another good offset against their "thousand and one" stories of "converted Universalists." The name and residence of this convert to the truth, will be given to the world whenever the cause of "pure and undefiled religion" can be promoted by its publication.

Respectfully yours.

Champion, April 1st, 1840. H. L. HAYWARD.

—, March 22d, 1840.

Br. H— . . . . "I address you at the present time with emotions altogether different from any that I have ever before felt. Since my last letter, my religious views have undergone a very material change—I may say a total change—which has given me access to joys, and pleasures, and consolations before unknown. Yes, Br. H—, the subject of religion now appears to me in a far more lovely and inviting dress than it has ever before done.

Perhaps you will be somewhat surprised to hear me declare that I am a believer in the final "restitution of all things, which has been spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began." Yet, as strange as it may appear to you, such is the fact. I can disbelieve it no longer. The doctrine is too good and too glorious to be any thing but the truth—and is indeed worthy of a God of love.

I have now come to the conclusion, that no person can read the Bible candidly and prayerfully, setting aside all prejudice upon the subject, without becoming fully convinced that "God will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth." But I must acknowledge that, for a long time, I have perused the Bible with feelings so strongly prejudiced, that it was in the fullest sense of the word, "a dead letter" to me. But now, as I peruse page after page of its treasured contents, it appears like a new book—rich in most precious promises, inspiring in the heart most glorious hopes, and displaying beauties and excellences which I had never before discovered in it. In short, "old things have passed away; behold, all have become new!"

It has long been my sincere prayer to God that he would show me the right way, and make known to me "what is truth." And I do believe, that he has answered my prayer. Now, as with a glowing heart I open my Bible, I behold the love of God upon every page, written as it were in blazing capitals. And when I gaze upon the wide-spread volume of nature, and contemplate God's "wonderful works to the children of men;" I behold goodness, wisdom, benevolence and love manifested in every part. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth forth his handy work—day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge." Now I believe with the Psalmist, that "The Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works"—that with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption; yea, and "his mercy endureth forever."

Our Saviour says, "The Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hands." "All that the Father hath given me shall come unto me, and he that cometh to me shall in no wise be cast out." "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me; and this is the will of him that sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day." What more conclusive testimony can we ask than is here furnished, of a world's salvation from sin and consequent misery? And who that admits this testimony, does not find himself driven to the conclusion, that if any portion of the human family are finally and irrecoverably lost, it will be in direct opposition to the revealed will of God, and the clearly defined object of Christ's mission?

We read in the Bible, that "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord"—and we also learn from the same blessed book, that God is no respecter of persons. Why then may not the "free gift" be bestowed upon all as well as a part; for "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." We must admit that all will be saved, or else charge God with partiality.

You, Br. H—, are aware, that I have been taught from infancy to look upon Universalism as the most dangerous doctrine imaginable—and that all who believed and advocated it, were the most wicked of mankind. It is not very surprising that such an education should have strongly prejudiced my mind, and deterred me from holding any intercourse with them or examining their doctrine "to see whether these things were so." I freely acknowledge, that I have been so completely governed by prejudice, that if by accident I took up a book in favor of Universalism, I would cast it from me immediately, as "forbidden fruit." But now, "the Lord hath taught me to call no man common or unclean." Now I can call any man my brother, let him belong to whatever sect or denomination he may, provided he lives in accordance with the rule laid down in the Bible—that is, if he "fears God and keeps his commandments, which is the whole duty of man." May the Lord strengthen you for the faithful discharge of the arduous and important duties of your profession, and enable you to proclaim successfully to a listening world, "the unspeakable riches of Christ."

Yours in the Gospel of Christ.

Thus you will see, Br. Grosh, that we have gained another convert, whose feelings are warm, ardent, and deeply imbued with the spirit of the Gospel. That he may be endued with courage and fortitude, to bear up under the fierce storm of persecution which will certainly burst upon him, is the prayer of

"CHILDREN, OBEY YOUR PARENTS."

The above is not a mere piece of advice; it is a positive injunction of an inspired apostle. For children thus to obey, is an imperative duty. One of the ten commandments is, "Honor thy Father and mother;" and the text "Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right," may be regarded as Paul's commentary on that part of the decalogue. See Eph. vi: 1-3. When children come to years of understanding, if they willfully disobey their parents, at least in ordinary cases, it is doubtless a sin against God. But here is an important consideration. Habit exerts a powerful influence upon the mind and conduct. Suppose I allow my child to disobey my laws with impunity, and that I thus bring it up in habitual disobedience, until at length its intellect and conscience become so matured that it becomes sensible that disobedience to its parents is morally wrong. The child is now aware of his duty, and resolves to do it; but having been so long accustomed to disobey, he still continues so to do, seemingly through the influence of sheer habit. Now where lies the sin of my child's disobedience? at his door, or at mine? Evidently at mine, in a very great measure. We wish parents would consider this. We fear that it is seldom thought of. There are very many ungoverned families. In the most of these cases the parents are greatly blamable. If when children come to years of understanding, it is their duty to be obedient to their parents, it can not but be the duty of parents to observe the direction of Solomon, "Train up a child in the way he should go;" or as Paul has it, "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." #### QUESTIONS ON PRAYER.

BRO. GROSH—Do you imagine that Deity can be affected in any manner whatever by the prayers of his children? Will God grant us that for which we petition him, and which we could not otherwise obtain?—If you answer these questions in the negative, I then wish you to harmonize with your answer, the sentiment expressed in Luke xi: 5-8.

And he said unto them, which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; for a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him? And he from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I can not rise and give thee. I say unto you, though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend; yet because of his importunity, he will rise and give him as many as he needeth."

Jesus Christ was here teaching his disciples not only how to pray, but the effect of prayer. And now, is it not certain that he intended to represent God by the man in bed? It seems that the man was not inclined at first to grant the request, but in order to get rid of the trouble of being importuned, he finally complied. It was not because the suppliant was a friend, that he gave him the bread, but "because of his importunity." He was in bed—the door was shut—and it was with great reluctance that he arose to grant the request of his friend, for it was so much trouble!

Now, Bro. Grosh, is this a just representation of the character of God? Is it possible that he can be troubled? Is he indifferent to the wants of his children, or reluctant to supply them? Does he say, "Trouble me not," and turn a deaf ear to the cries of his helpless offspring? Would not this sentiment argue against the immutability of Jehovah? What think you of these things?

By presenting your views upon this subject through the medium of the Magazine and Advocate, you will much oblige Yours, etc.

H. T.

REPLY.

I am much obliged to Br. T. for the candid and strong manner in which he has presented the subject for our consideration. It is confessedly an important one, and deemed by many a difficult one—one involving contradictions irreconcilable. But such as it is, I will endeavor to answer the questions presented, candidly, frankly, and as fully as my humble abilities will permit me to do.

I do not believe that the Deity can be induced to change his designs, purposes, or ways by our supplications. I do not suppose that our prayers can induce him to grant us any thing in reply to them, which he would not have granted otherwise—save, the effect and influence which those prayers may have on our own feelings, affections, and dispositions. Of course, then, the duty falls to my lot of endeavoring to reconcile and harmonize the passage quoted from Luke, with my views.

1. For what object was that parable spoken? Br. T. says, to teach "his disciples not only how to pray, but the effect of prayer." In this I think him in error.—The main, if not the only object of that parable, was to teach the disciples the necessity and importance of perseverance in prayer. This is evident from what follows: "And I say unto you, 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.'" (See also verses 10 to 13 inclusive.) Drs. Campbell and Clarke so consider it—the former inserts in verse 8, "If the other continue knocking," and the latter says that though not authorized by the Greek text, yet this phrase is clearly implied in it. Continuance, then, in prayer is the main object to be learned from this parable—or, if Br. T. prefers, continued importunity in prayer.

Is it right, then, to construe the parable from its main object? as Br. T. evidently does, when he asks—"Is this a just representation of the character of God?" etc. No—for Jesus did not utter the parable as a representation of God's character—or to show that God can be troubled—or that he is indifferent to the cries and wants of his children, etc., etc.—I should as soon think of quoting the parable in Luke xviii: 2-5, to prove that God was a reckless, unjust and unfeeling judge. The truth is, people are too apt to force the meaning of parables, by seeking a meaning in all their minute details, which details were only added to fill up the blanks—to finish the picture—not to teach any particular doctrine connected or unconnected with the main object for which the parable was spoken. In Luke xi: 5-13, Jesus teaches the importance of continued earnestness or importunity in prayer, by showing the effect of such supplication on human beings, whose goodness is often smothered by their love of ease, their dislike of trouble, and their selfishness and cruelty. Having shown that importunate prayer will even overcome such coldness and selfishness in man, he argues that much more will God, whose goodness is ever active ever ready to bless, ever free from selfishness or evil, grant the prayers of those who ask for his holy spirit—who pray for the things he has commanded them to ask. In Luke xviii: 2-6, Jesus teaches that if even a reckless, unjust and cruel judge will heed the prayer of an unwearied petitioner—if even his weak mercy can be roused to avenge wrongs presented in the unfainting prayers of a poor widow, much more will the all just, the careful and the pitying Judge of heaven and earth, avenge the sufferings of the saints, by duly punishing their oppressors. These I conceive to be the entire lessons of these two parables—and that any lessons drawn from them, inconsistent with the main object Jesus had in uttering them, is a perversion of their meaning.

But though I have thus answered all Br. T.'s questions as relating to the particular case presented for consideration, I have not answered the difficulty which many minds find in the two subjects of the efficacy of prayer, and the immutability of God. Permit, then, a few remarks on this difficulty, by way of closing this article.

No Christian can doubt the efficacy of prayer—that God commands it to be made—and that he promises to answer it, and does frequently answer prayer. But what kind of prayer does he command us to make, and what prayers does he answer? Does he command us to pray for the accomplishment of every wild wish and every fanciful desire that springs up in our fancies? Does he command us to importune him by presenting for his accomplishment, every selfish view, every narrow aim, every unhallowed purpose which self-aggrandizement creates in our hearts! Does he require that we shall pray solely in reference to our own sovereign wills and desires, in even our best and purest petitions? Far—far from it—exactly the reverse of all this he commands. We must pray in accordance with the doctrine, spirit and precepts of the Gospel, and we must submit all our petitions to God, to do as he wills and not as we will. If we pray thus, our prayers will be answered sooner or later. Even where the special petition proves not to be according to God's purpose in the matter, by resigning it to his disposal, we shall receive an immediate answer to the prayer, in the influence which our prayers will diffuse over our minds, our affections, and our tempers—in the calm serenity and peace of confidence in Him to whom we have submitted the result, which the act of prayer rightly performed, never fails to yield to the sincere worshipper. In this respect prayer has aptly been compared to the rope which connects a boat with the shore. Those in the boat, by drawing at the rope as if they would pull the shore to the boat, find themselves drawn to the shore. The praying man moves not God to any change, but draws himself toward God—assimilates his soul to God, by the change which resigned prayer effects in his own feelings and desires.

To pray God to save all men, believing that He never will do it, may seem like asking God to cause the sun to rise in the West and set in the East—a species of blasphemy, were the intention evil—but, nevertheless, I would encourage such prayers, 1st, because God has commanded them to be made—2d, because the Christian spirit in every true worshipper, dictates such prayers—3d, because they are according to God's will, though the petitioner does not believe God will answer them—4th, because God hears and will answer them, unbelief to the contrary notwithstanding—and 5th, because if truly, feelingly, and unceasingly made, the petitioner will ultimately grow more and more into their spirit, until his faith will no longer contradict his charity, nor his hope be less than his Christian desires—and then he will know, and rejoice exceedingly in knowing, that God is a prayer hearing and a prayer answering God. And yet, the change will not be in God, but in himself, although on his looking back to his offering of such petitions, the whole process will look very much as if God had changed because of the creature's importunity and unflinchingness. A. B. G.

P. S.—Since I commenced this article, a ministering brother referred me to James v: 13-19, to see how I could reconcile it with the foregoing views. I answer here, (as I did to his satisfaction,) that it refers to the well known miraculous powers of the early Christians, and to the miracle wrought in reply to the prayer of a prophet. They were specially endowed, and specially moved to pray, knowing that God would hear them, and restore the sick, or withhold and give the rain—and therefore prayed in accordance with God's will. No modern Christians (save the Catholics) pretend to anoint the sick with oil, and pray over them thus—and all unite in condemning the Roman Catholics for presuming to do so, and ridicule their want of success in restoring the sick when they thus anoint the patient. Take the whole case into consideration, and I can not see that the passage is binding upon us as an injunction—or that the effect described would follow, were we to obey it ever so fervently and faithfully. If the fervent, effectual prayer of the righteous man availeth much in the present day of natural causes and effects, it is, because he prays for no violation of the laws of God in the moral or natural world, and because his prayer breathes such a spirit of resignation to the divine will, that the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, is shed abroad through his soul, and his whole mind, and spirit, and body are brought into subjection to the Gospel faith, and into communion with the all-benevolent spirit of the Saviour of the whole world. This is the greatest, highest, best effect of all prayer. A. B. G.

THE POWER OF THE ENEMY.

It is to be expected that whosoever is opposed to the doctrine of the restitution will endeavor to satisfy his mind for the rejection of it by some kind of argument or objection which to him may appear plausible. But it does not follow, that an argument which appears plausible is therefore a sound one. Men have been most wofully mistaken on this point. Calvin may have deemed that a spirit of persecution was justifiable on the ground of a supposed imitation of God's character, or of doing God service by exterminating heretics; but his argument could only satisfy a bloody heart, or a most depraved state of morals. That may be supposed to be a plausible plea in extenuation of dishonesty, which is built upon the misfortunes of the honest. It has almost become a universal phrase among that class which most need it, that the only way to prosper, is to shut the ear against all the appeals of mercy and justice, and so take care of number one. We say even this is called a plausible excuse for dishonesty, by some. But it is too unsound to meet with the approbation of any who wish to stand above the level of meanness. It is unnecessary to follow out this point. Though the enemies of the restitution may use apparently plausible arguments instead of sound ones, we are by no means disposed to charge them generally with dishonesty in so doing. We have a better opinion of human nature than to believe that a majority of enlightened Christians are contending for the very worst of all sentiments, the doctrine of eternal damnation, and against the very best of all sentiments, the doctrine of universal holiness and salvation, merely to satisfy the desire of acting out the hypocrite. Indeed as unreasonable as are many of their arguments, one-half of these opposers to the doctrine of impartial grace may be allowed sincerity in making them—perhaps we shall not dispute about the number if a far greater is contended for. Some of these arguments will be mentioned before we close.

Some of the opposers of Universalism are willing to inquire more fully than all are, and consequently their arguments or objections against us are reduced to a very few in number, but few as they are, they prefer to rest content with them rather than to increase the number by wilful misrepresentation—at least so long as they can persuade themselves of the plausibility of those which they have. The wonder is that they should continue to draw so much satisfaction from the few weak arguments which are left to them, for they too would vanish like dew before the sun, when properly brought to the test of truth. We can only explain it by saying that they overrate their strength. Sterne, we think it is, in one of his works, introduces the character of Uncle Toby, as having been in his younger days a redoubtable warrior. Of course Uncle Toby had imbibed and carried with him down to his old age, a strong martial spirit. He loved to recount his wonderful exploits, and draw profiles of the situation and movements of hostile armies, as arguments in proof that he had been a warrior. And every time he repeated his arguments, he loved them the more, because he thought them more conclusive. But simply relating over what he had seen and heard, was not enough, and drawing maps of fortifications and armies was not quite tangible enough for Uncle Toby, however satisfactory it might have been to his auditors. He must force his descriptions even into the minutiae of forts and fort building. To do this he must build him a small fort, and to work he goes until he has satisfied his ambition, by standing upon his mud bulwark and in the midst of his own miniature cannon. But as he stands and contemplates his at first imaginary defence, it loses its puny appearance, and the more he gazes upon it the larger and more impregnable it appears. Imagination invests him with all the panoply of a conqueror, enthusiasm changes his mud bank and fire crackers into massy walls and death dealing cannon, and surrounds him with tried and invincible followers; and he looks up as if in proud defiance of the world. And yet, poor man, his strength and his pride, and his defence, are as powerless as the straw that is borne upon the gale! His desolated refuge, and his visionary hopes must be abandoned, and he must return to his station among the children of God before he can perceive the substantial foundation upon which it is the privilege of the Christian warrior to rear the breastwork of faith.

But when the motives, which govern the opposer to Universalism, originate in wilful prejudice, he is to be pitied for his ignorance rather than for his infatuation. Some are determined not to know any thing about the doctrine of impartial grace; others can not know because they pay more attention to their spiritual guides than to observation and reflection. One of these opposers, once, on bringing his artillery to bear against a species of counter Universalism that has been invented and preached by limitarian preachers as a sort of revival tactics, was informed that he was aiming at the wrong mark entirely, and advised to inquire further before he should lose his Westminster catechism, by throwing it at the bug-bear of his own fancy. His reply was, that he knew "enough about Universalism already, and never knew any good of it." And, reader, he knew no evil of it; but then, his know nothing argument was undoubtedly weighty with him. Uncle Toby's fire crackers would make a noise, and though they could not kill any body they might scare children. Another opposer, travelling on board a stage coach, kindly volunteered to enlighten her fellow-passengers, (for she was a lady, and we will therefore appease her wrath by being as merciful as possible) as to the peculiar qualities of Universalism and its advocates. According to her story, Universalism was a mere bundle of nonsense and viciousness. Universalists were not only dishonest, but so weak, so puny, compared with the fiery ambassadors which they had to encounter, and so conscious of their weakness, that they would abandon their ground the moment an antagonist presented himself to their sight. She was asked if she had ever heard a Universalist speak at large of his sentiments, and her reply was that she had not. "How then," was the natural query, "do you know that what you have said of Universalists is true?" "O," said she, "our minister says so, and he knows." To do this lady justice, and if possible to prevent her from being angry at us, we must acknowledge that she advanced one original objection to Universalists. That was that they ridiculed the idea of spooks and goblins. We can not avoid mentioning in connection with the above, which we heard, another argument which, as related to us, was employed against universal salvation by a gentleman of this city. He said that Universalists were a kind of a harmless set of beings. He did not think God would notice them so much as to damn, and as to their being saved, that was impossible—they did not know enough to be either miserable or happy. What a pity that Uncle Toby could not have got a peep into this age of inventions; he would have witnessed the demolishing of his little fort without a single tear!

But we must close. The reader is not ignorant of the many exploits that are used by prejudiced opposers to kick Universalism out of their way. It is only necessary to bring these exploits together in order to see how completely they stultify each other. For instance. Your religious opponent will tell you at one time that Universalism is too strictly a system of good morals, and at another that it is decidedly licentious. At one time that Universalists are a corrupt and debased set of beings, at another that they depend too much upon their good works, and yet at another that they believe too much in the grace of God. At one time Universalism is said to be infidelity, at another its worst feature is that it advocates the notion of one self-existent and eternal God, instead of three. At one time it is so gratifying to the feelings and wishes of the saint, as to be a dangerous allurements to him; at another it is said to be only pleasing to the carnal heart. At one time it is the will of God, successfully opposed by the will of man; at another it is the devil's doctrine. At one time it can not be true because it is but a very little known; at another, it must be false because it is the delusion which sinners so fatally hug to their bosoms, and sinners have always been a majority of the world. At one time it is feared that it would dethrone the Deity; and at another that it ascribes to him more power and goodness than he will ever exercise. At one time it is said to be a new doctrine that has sprung up within sixty years; at another, to be an old doctrine—one that was preached to mother Eve, by the serpent, in the garden of Eden, about six thousand years ago. All these arguments form the strength of the enemy, and are very convenient, and no doubt seem very profound when put into different mouths, and scattered from one end of the United States to the other. We have, however, brought them together, that we might fairly see their strength, and estimate their good qualities. We see the contrast, and have only to cast up the separate items, in order to come at the sum total. This we can do best in the language which Christ applied to the wicked and adulterous generation which opposed him. "But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented. For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners." A. R. B.

ENGLISH GRAMMAR.

"A Grammar of the English language, explained according to the principles of truth and common sense, and adapted to the capacities of all who think. Designed for the use of Schools, Academies, and private learners. By Wm. S. Balch. Boston; B. B. Mussey, 29 Cornhill. 1839."—140 pp., 18 mo.—Retail price, 37 1-2 cents.

"Lectures on Language, as particularly connected with English Grammar. Designed for the use of teachers and advanced learners. By Wm S. Balch. Providence: B. Cranston and Co. 1838."—252 pp., 12mo.—Retail price 63 cents.

The first attempt to reduce English Grammar to a system, was, to make it conform to the Latin—about as correct a mode, as for a farmer to compel his widely spreading oaks to grow up in the form of the prim Lombardy poplar! Nearly every succeeding Grammarian, adopting the great, Latin frame-work of Wallis, Lowth and Murray, has pointed out increased exceptions to, and deviations from the general rules—or added new technical terms and subdivided the numerous division, all fanciful enough already—until perplexity impeded the progress of the learner, and damped the delight which the youthful mind naturally feels in the acquisition of real knowledge. He wanted things, and they gave him technical words—facts, and they gave him finely spun theories—reasons, and they furnished him with arbitrary rules, to which there were as many exceptions as agreements. Is it any wonder that the disgusted student, when arrived at manhood, forgot faster and easier than he learned—that, in the daily practice of reading, speaking, writing and hearing the English language, he forgot all about the art and science of reading, speaking, writing, and understanding? If our Latinized English Grammars are in accordance with the genius and structure of the language, and with the laws of thought, why should the art and science be forgotten by nine out of ten who daily practice speaking and reading the language? It is not so in other things, but the reverse.

But, enough—"more than enough," the lover of the cumbrous and mystical old system will say—and more than I intended as an introduction to a recommendation of the works whose titles are placed above. The Rev. Mr. Balch is a pupil of the late Wm. S. Cardell, and in his Grammar has improved considerably on the work of his predecessor—rendering it more practical, more simple, and less controversial. His Lectures on Language, are intended to supply the place of Mr. Cardell's Essay on Language, now out of print. Though Mr. Balch is more simple and clear, yet I can not say that I prefer the Lectures to the Essay. Notwithstanding, I hesitate not to declare it as my belief, that three months study of Mr. Balch's works, by a thinking student, will give him a better and more practical knowledge of the English language, than a year's hard study of the old system—of Murray, or any of his improvers (!). I therefore cordially recommend them to the attention and adoption of parents, teachers and students.

It is but justice to say, (though I say it reluctantly,) that the Reverend grammarian has laid himself open to the attacks of critics, by his inexcusable grammatical errors in these works. For the Lectures he pleads haste—but neither haste or carelessness is excusable in text books. If grammatical accuracy is necessary in any case, it is in school books—especially in works on Grammar. I hope that future editions will be freed from these and typographical errors, of which there are some also.

HYMNS OF ZION.

Mr. Hutchinson is about receiving a new and large supply of this work. It has in it as many hymns, (and as good hymns, to say the least,) as Streeter's Hymn Book; and has, beside, a large and good collection of hymn tunes arranged for two or three voices. It is therefore the cheapest collection, on the whole, that can be procured by country societies, where the choir seldom uses more than air and bass; inasmuch as it saves nearly the entire cost of the music books. To this it need hardly be added that it is as good a collection as they can get for nearly double the money. For social meetings, and family circles, it is by far the best thing of the kind that has ever been issued from the press. The following certificate will show what our brethren at the East think of the work. I wish it could be generally circulated and used in our families in this region.

HYMNS OF ZION, with appropriate music, designed as an aid to devotion in families, social circles, and meetings of public worship. By Abel C. Thomas, 578 Hymns, and 178 pieces of Music.

The undersigned having examined this work, deem it worthy the attention of the Universalist public; and take pleasure in recommending it to their brethren of like precious faith. The hymns are of a superior order; and the music is adapted to the sentiments expressed. And we are persuaded that the introduction of this book into our families, social circles, conference meetings, etc., would tend to increase among us true feelings of devotion to God and of good will to man.

We may add, that the book is so arranged as to present the music in connection with the hymns, thus facilitating the performance of singing as an important part of religious worship.

SABBATH SCHOOL CONTRIBUTOR.

The second volume of this useful semi-monthly periodical will pass from Br. E. N. Harris, of Lyun, into the hands of our enterprising and judicious brother, Abel Tompkins, of Boston, Mass. Br. Tompkins is the publisher of the most of our Sunday school books—takes a lively interest in all pertaining to those schools, and is not only well qualified, but will undoubtedly much improve the character of the paper. We wish him and it abundant success, and will be very happy to receive subscribers for it, send on their orders, etc. Parents will find in the Contributor a great amount of valuable matter for their own perusal, and much more that will be profitable and interesting to their children. Will they not subscribe for it? The new volume commences in June next. Terms—one dollar per annum in advance. Size—nearly the size of this paper—26 numbers per annum.

STAR IN THE WEST.

This faithful and excellent coadjutor in the cause of impartial grace has just entered its eleventh volume, (third, new series,) under the care of Br. Garley as editor, assisted by Br. Pingree, and a good corps of correspondents. Long may it beam brightly in the Western horizon, shedding its mild but powerful rays over the regions that are yet in darkness, and be a beacon to the weary and heavy laden sons of error and transgression which shall lead them to Gospel rest and peace. Let but our Western brethren be true to the Star, by supporting it, and it will shine more and more brightly leading thousands to the perfect day.

MAILING EARLY.—We often receive requests from subscribers to mail their papers early, that they may receive them on, or soon after, the day of publication. Our paper goes to press as early (and some may say too early) as is consistent with the convenience of those who wish to give notices and information to the public through it, week by week. It is mailed as rapidly as the pressman can supply the printed sheets to the mailer. The mailer puts them up in as convenient order as we can devise, for furnishing the greatest number of subscribers with them, at the earliest day to render the notices, etc., most useful to those concerned. Consequently, it is but seldom that we can make any changes to accommodate a few, without greatly incommoding the many. We might issue the paper as we now do, and date it two or three days later, and thus enable our distant subscribers to receive it on or even before the day of its date; but this would not give them any later news than they now receive—nor would they get the paper one hour sooner than the time now required to send it to them. If they will but reflect that the paper can not be mailed before it is printed, nor sent to them in less time than the mail can carry it, they will see the propriety of our present arrangements generally. And if they will suggest any change which we can make for the better, so far as all are concerned, we will prove our gratitude by adopting the change at once.

A. B. G.

Br. McCune's remarks on publishing extracts from copy right books—particularly the offer—are satisfactory to Br. Hutchinson. I supposed it a very long extract he was making, in which case the sale of the book might be injured. Giving credit does not obviate the difficulty. In copying copy right books, the injury sustained by the proprietor in consequence, is all that is to be considered by the jury or court, in making up its verdict. I mention this fact, not because any dissatisfaction exists, but because from Br. McCune's remarks I am led to suppose he is of opinion that giving credit is all that is required by law—and lest he may be led to copy entire or to make more copious extracts, from some other copy right works.

APOLOGY.—I should have stated some time ago, that for six or seven weeks past I have been unable to devote more than a very few hours each day to writing, in consequence of a pain in the side and breast. Consequently I have been obliged to leave undone many things which should have received my attention. I have been getting better for a few weeks past, and hope soon to be entirely over the difficulty. My health otherwise is good.

The notice for the meeting of the Pennsylvania Convention was delayed, by seeing a public proposal to change its place of meeting, and a belief that it might be thus changed. We waited for the change, until we almost forgot the notice.

POETRY.

MY HOME.

BY MARY EMILY JACKSON.

They say my home, my gentle home,
Is where rude mountains rise;
The sunbeams shed a cheerless ray,
From these cold Northern skies;
They say, though sweet the song it gives,
My harp is rude, and wild;
And though I speak the notes of Joy,
Yet I am sorrow's child.

They say I'm friendless and alone,
In some secluded dell,
With not a ray to light my path,
And none to love me well;
That I have never known the world,
And its all glorious things,
Nor felt the ray which knowledge bears,
On its mysterious wings.

And they all pity me! they feel
How transient is my stay,
Unless some hidden light should gleam
Upon my troubled way;
They fear that 'mid those darksome wilds,
The lonely flower may die,
Unheeded by the world's cold frown,
And Pleasure's tearless eye.

They know not that, though rude the path,
With wild and untamed glee,
As when in Childhood's happy days,
My feet can wander free,
High over hill and mountain side,
By green wood fount and bower,
Light as the wild deer's artless leap,
In Summer's gayest hour.

They know not that, though rude and dark,
Those mountain haunts may seem,
That friendship sheds her genial ray,
On every sunny stream;
And though the flowers which deck my path,
Are hueless all and wild,
Yet Summer's warm and glad some beam,
Has o'er them kindly smiled.

They know not that the gentle air
Which kisses off my brow,
And whispers me of holy things,
Through every leafy bough;
The calm and misty twilight hour,
The greenwood wild and free,
And that the friends I love too well,
Are all the world to me.

SINGULAR EFFECT OF DRUNKENNESS.—Capt Marryatt gives the following account of a scene which was enacted, by himself and a man who appears to have been a good deal "worse for liquor," at the table of a public house in Upper Canada:

He sat down opposite to me, at the same table. It appeared as if his vision was inverted by the quantity of liquor which he had taken; every thing close to him on the table he considered to be out of his reach, whilst every thing at a distance he attempted to lay hold of. He sat up as erect as he could, balancing so as not to appear corned, and fixing his eyes upon me, said, "Sir I'll trouble you—for some fried ham." Now the ham was in the dish next to him, and altogether out of my reach: I told him so.—"Sir," said he again, "as a gentleman, I ask you to give me some of that fried ham." Amused with the curious demand, I rose from my chair, went round to him, and helped him. "Shall I give you a potatoe," said I, the potatoes being at my end of the table, and I not wishing to rise again. "No, Sir," replied he, "I can help myself to them." He made a dash at them, but did not reach them; then made another till he lost his balance, and lay down upon his plate: this time he gained the potatoes, helped himself, and commenced eating. After a few minutes he again fixed his eyes upon me. "Sir, I'll trouble you for the pickles." They were actually under his nose, and I pointed them out to him. "I believe, Sir, I asked you for the pickles," repeated he after a time.—"Well, there they are," replied I, wishing to see what he would do. "Sir, are you a gentleman—as a gentleman—I ask you as a gentleman, for them 'ere pickles." It was impossible to resist his appeal, so I rose and helped him. I was now convinced that his vision was somehow or another inverted, and to prove it, when he asked me for the salt, which was within his reach, I removed it further off. "Thank you, Sir," said he, sprawling over the table after it. The circumstance, absurd as it was, was really a subject for the investigation of Dr. Brewster.

INDIAN MARRIAGE PROMISE.—A young Indian failed in his attention to a young squaw. She made complaint to an old chief, who appointed a hearing or trial. The lady laid the case before the judge, and explained the nature of the promise made to her. It consisted of sundry visits to her wigwam, "many little undefinable attentions," and presents, a bunch of feathers, and several yards of red flannel. This was the charge. The faithless swain denied the "undefinable attentions" in toto. He had visited her father's wigwam for the purpose of passing away time, when it was not convenient to hunt; and had given the feathers and flannel from friendly motives, and nothing further. During the latter part of the defence, the young squaw fainted. The plea was considered invalid, and the offender sentenced to give the lady "a yellow feather, a brooch that was then dangling from his nose, and a dozen of coon-skins." The sentence was no sooner concluded, then the squaw sprung upon her feet, and clapping her hands, exclaimed with joy, "Now me ready to be courted again."

NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS.—"The Yankee of pure race," says M. Chevalier, "is discovered by the desire of locomotion; he can not rest quiet in one position; he is under a necessity of coming and going—of agitating his limbs, and keeping his muscles in action. If his feet are still, he must move his fingers—with his inseparable knife he must notch the back of a chair or score a table. He is fit for every kind of labor except that which requires minute action and slow progress." On the Pocahontas steamboat, M. Chevalier was surprised that the passengers should one and all leave their beds on a foggy morning, at four o'clock, to watch till eight for the appearance of Norfolk, their place of destination. "If," said an American fellow-traveller, "you knew my countrymen, you would think it but a matter of course, that, in order to arrive at nine, they should rise at four. It is the nature of an American to be always in fear lest his neighbor should arrive before him. If one hundred Americans were about to be shot, they would fight for precedence, such are their habits of competition."

EARLY DISADVANTAGES.—"I learned grammar," says William Cobbet, "when I was a private soldier on the pay of sixpence a day. The edge of my berth or that of my guard bed, was my seat to study in; my knapsack was my book case, and a bit of board lying in my lap was a writing table. I had no money to purchase candles or oil; in winter time it was rarely that I could get any light but that of the fire, and only my turn of that. To buy a pen or a sheet of paper, I was compelled to forego some portion of my food, though in a state of starvation. I had no moment that I could call my own; and I had to read and write amidst the talking, laughing, singing, whistling and bawling of at least half a score of the most thoughtless of men; and that too in the hours of their freedom from all control. And I say, if I, under circumstances like these, could encounter and overcome the task, is there, can there be, in the whole world a youth who can find an excuse for the non-performance?"

TOO LATE AT MEETING.—In Mr. Dean's History of Scituate, there is the life and character of Rev. Mr. Witherell, who died there in 1684. The following anecdote is given to "illustrate the prevailing manners in those times." Mr. Bryant entered the church after the services had commenced, and Mr. Witherell, at the close of his prayer, thus addressed him: "Neighbor Bryant, it is to your reproach that you have disturbed the worship by entering late, living as you do within a mile of this place; and especially so since here is Goody Barstow, who has milked seven cows, made a cheese, and walked to the house of God in good season."

DEPEND UPON YOURSELF.—At an inn in Sweden there was the following inscription, in English, on the wall:—"You will find at Trohate excellent bread, meat and wine, provided you bring them with you!" And this will almost serve for a description of human life—so much depends upon the temper that events are met with, and on the prudence that foresees end provides against them.

TWO SHARPS.—On Saturday an old man picked up a half a dollar in the Park. "Old man, that's mine," said a keen looking rascal, "so hand it over." "Did your's have a hole in it?" asked the finder. "Yes, it had," said the other smartly. "Then it isn't thine," mildly replied the old man, "thee must learn to be a little sharper next time."—New-York Times.

A NOTORIOUS SIN.—In this day, when particular sins are made a matter of church legislation, and offenders are dealt with on account of it, it is said that honest church members of several sects are beginning to have serious scruples of conscience against communing with, or retaining in the church, persons who are guilty of the sin of taking and reading a newspaper which they have not paid for. Doubtless this is a sin—and an aggravating one—especially to publishers—and should be made a matter of anxious concern amongst brethren; for he who would cheat a printer out of his pay must have much more fellowship with Belial than Christ, whose religion expressly enjoins—"owe no man"—which being amplified means, take a newspaper and pay for it.—Gospel Banner.

WIT OUT-WITTED.—A well-dressed fellow came to the shop of a pork-butcher, and asked for a yard of pork, when the pork-butcher, without hesitation cut him off three feet (pigs' feet.)

MARRIAGES.

In Royalton, March 9th, by Rev C. Hammond, Mr. N. B. PHELPS of Darien, to Miss PAMELA MARIA WATSON of the former place. Also, by the same, April 23d, Mr. JACOB TAYLOR to Miss EMELINE ODELL both of Royalton.

In Boonville, Sabbath afternoon the 26th of April, by Rev. Geo. W. Gage, Mr. THOMAS TRAFFARN to Miss HANNAH SNOW, both of that place.

In New-Hartford, on the 27th ult. by Rev. A. B. Grosh Mr. ALLEN HINDS, Merchant, of Hume, Allegany county, to Miss ELIZABETH P. RICHARDSON, daughter of the late Jonathan Richardson, Esq., of the former place.

In Carthage, March 19, by Rev. J. French, Mr. AUGUSTE NAPOLEON SALTZMAN, to Miss MINERVA AUBURN, daughter of Mr Calvin Auburn, all of Carthage.

DEATHS.

In Orwell, O., February 17, Mrs LAURA BATES, wife of Daniel Bates, Esq., in the forty sixth year of her age. Mrs. Bates had drank deep of the cup of affliction, so much so that the last eight years of her life were one unbroken chain of sickness, and for the last three years before her death, she was almost entirely confined to her bed.—During her long and protracted illness, she bore her afflictions with Christian patience and submission, saying, as did the patient man of old, "though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him." And with the confidence of the Apostle, she could say that, "If the earthly house of his tabernacle be dissolved, she had a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." It might be said of her, that she lived the life of the righteous, and her last days were like his. She possessed the hope that is an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast; not for herself alone, but for the whole ransomed world of mankind. She has left a kind and affectionate husband, together with six children to mourn their loss. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners by the writer of this article. B. H.

April 14th, Capt. TRUMAN SPENCER, aged 76 years. Old age, and hereditary melancholy, producing paroxysms of indescribable agony and distress, referable to the nervous system morbidly excited. His faith triumphed over the disease, and he met death with a perfectly sane and composed mind, trusting and rejoicing in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men. Rev. O. Ackley tendered the consolations of the Gospel to an attentive audience.

In Henderson on the 14th of April, JOHN S. PORTER, Esq., in the 68th year of his age. P. M.

In Canesuda, February 27th, MORGAN, son of Olive and Elijah Vary, aged 6 years, 6 months and 25 days. This little child was for about 3 years, a constant sufferer from the rickets. For the last three months it rendered his limbs entirely useless. May the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men, enable the afflicted father and mother to be reconciled to the will of God. ## ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered at the funeral of Mrs. HANNAH CHIPMAN, of Pavilion, N. Y., March 19, 1840.

BY REV. A. KELSEY.

[Published by request.]

"Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets," Matt. vii: 12

This instruction of the blessed Saviour—of him who was "kind to the unthankful and the evil," is profitable at all times, and under all circumstances of life. And obedience to this direction can not be yielded in any particular, without advancing in some degree the sum of human happiness. And the nearer we come to rendering perfect obedience to this divine injunction, the greater will be the amount of happiness enjoyed. This instruction, however, is thought by many to be too pure for man—too elevated for his attainment, and above or beyond his powers; and therefore they do not strive to render obedience to its requirements. Your speaker once felt this same objection, and was in a measure discouraged in view of so perfect a law. But he became convinced that no reasonable excuse was furnished him for a neglect of this instruction, from the fact, that the law was perfect. And his conviction was obtained in the following manner. By an examination of his feelings, conduct, and powers of improvement, he was fully satisfied that with a proper strife, he could come nearer to this principle than he had yet done. And perhaps an examination of the same kind, would produce a similar conviction in the minds of others. And if such would prove to be the case, then it is rather unbecoming for us to stand still and find fault with the purity of a law, which we can, if we will, come nearer obeying than we do. We ought not to say we can not obey a law, while we confess that we can come nearer to it than we have done. But we will pass from this particular, by saying there are many respects in which the text can be fulfilled. And wherever we can render obedience, it is important for us to begin.

The text was introduced in the following manner. A contrast was drawn by our Saviour, between the goodness of an earthly parent and the Father of our spirits. "Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is heaven give good things to them that ask him?" And then in the application of the superior goodness of God, for the instruction of his disciples, Jesus adds the language of the text. "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." The disciples were not to imitate a hard-hearted and cruel parent, who would give his famishing son a stone when he asked for bread—or a viper instead of a fish. This was not the way God was represented as dealing with his children, and the disciples were to imitate God's goodness, who is represented, by Jesus, as being more willing to confer favors than an earthly parent.—And the instruction therefore contained in the text for us, is as follows. Since we should not like to have a stone given to us when we stand in need of and ask for bread, so we must not give a stone to others, when they ask for bread, or a serpent, instead of a fish. We are to observe the instruction of the text in all the social and religious duties of life. We are to strive for the practice required by our Saviour, in all our intercourse with the world. If a fellow being ask for bread at our hand, we must remember that under the same circumstances, we should not wish to receive a stone, and then we must bestow the favor accordingly. This is certainly possible. It is not beyond our power. It is not too pure for humanity to practice. And as professed Christians we ought to keep this principle in view, and strive to render obedience with all our ability.

And we are not only to observe this direction in the bestowment of literal bread, but we are to observe it in our religious and social intercourse with the world. The Saviour is called "the bread of life," and his Gospel is represented in the figure, by bread and water of life. It is religious food adapted to the wants of mortal man. And when our fellow-beings stand in need of this provision, and call for it at our hands; are we then to give them the deadly serpent and the frozen rock?

Here are now assembled before us, those on whom the hand of affliction has fallen with its sorrowful power. The hand of death has removed one from their midst, who was a wife, and a mother, and they are left to feel and mourn their loss, and sorrow for her departure. And they have said to us, while feeling their loneliness in this fleeting and transitory world, and while their hearts are filled with pain and anguish, "come; give us the consolation which the Gospel is designed to impart, for nothing of an earthly nature can reach our wants, or cure our sorrow." They ask of us by their falling tears to break to them "the bread of life." The language of the heart—the sorrowing heart—is asking for a healing balm to mitigate its sorrow, and ease its pain. And shall we give them a scorpion? Shall we offer them a stone? Shall we offer them a doctrine, which, if realized and believed, would add a thousand sorrows to their present affliction? and send a thousand daggers to the heart? Shall we add to their present afflictions a thousand stings, by carrying the idea, that it is probable, or even barely possible, that the departed has gone to a place of "endless despair?" What saith the Saviour? "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." If we were called to part with a companion, or a mother, by the hand of death, should we wish to have others give us for "the bread of life," the scorpion of endless pain? If we should not wish to have our fellow-beings pierce our hearts with the doctrine of endless pain, when the hand of affliction rests upon us, then we have no right to treat others in that manner.

But there is no possible good to be derived from the presentation of such a doctrine. It will not melt the heart of the mourners, and make them love God more, or serve him better. The mourner is in want of greater confidence in God, to mitigate his sorrow; and that confidence can never be increased by the fear of utter woe. It can only be increased by receiving evidence, that God is good in all his ways, and that the afflictions which we are called to endure, taken in connection with the ultimate object and final end of his government, are for the best. And such is the view we are permitted to take of the ways of God. All the dispensations of his providence are tending, though perhaps unseen by us, towards the completion of that object for which a Saviour died. God's goodness presides over all worlds, and is intermixed with all his dealings with his dependent creatures. The great object of his government—the salvation of the world—is never lost sight of while chastisements and afflictions are permitted to fall upon us.

And since we would not wish, while calling for this "bread of life" under the sorrow of bereavement, to have our fellow-men join in giving us a deadly serpent, to add a thousand pangs to our grief; so, under the like circumstances, we ought not to do this by others. And your speaker, therefore, must in the fear of God, offer to this mourning circle what he would wish to receive at the hand of his dying fellow-men under the same circumstances. And blessed be God, we are furnished with "the bread of life" in the revelation of his grace—with that food which the mourner craves. And we are devoutly thankful to the author of all good that he has not made it necessary, by the revelation of his will, for us to give our fellow-mourners a stone when they ask for the bread of life. I dare not, with the word of God before me, tell the mourner that the departed object of affection was ever in danger of "endless punishment," or that there is the bare possibility of such a doom. For such a punishment is not revealed in the Bible, and can not be proved by it. The terms by which this doctrine is supposed to be proved, do not prove it. "Everlasting punishment" in the Bible acceptation of the term, does not mean "endless punishment." The terms everlasting and forever, when connected with punishment are expressly limited by God himself. See Isaiah lvi: 16. "For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." Again, Lam. iii: 31, "For the Lord will not cast off forever." Therefore, that "everlasting punishment," which God does inflict, and which the Bible teaches, must be a shorter period than the forever through which he says he will not contend, or cast off his creatures.

And this is further confirmed by the revealed object of punishment. Punishment inflicted by a good being must be designed to correct the transgressor. It must have the good of the punished in view. And this is the nature and design of divine punishment as revealed to us. See Heb. xii: 9, 10, 11. "Furthermore, we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and live? For they, verily, for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure, but he [God] for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now, no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." This is conclusive.

But, we are not only assured, that God "will not cast off forever," and that he "will not contend forever," and that his punishment is designed to yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness; but we are also assured that "though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies;" and "his mercy endureth forever." Therefore we have not the stone of "endless misery" to give to the mourner, when he asks for "the bread of life." And the Lord knows that none of us would wish for such a doctrine in the hour of bereavement.

But our gratitude to God, stops not here. We not only thank and praise our Father in heaven because he has delivered us from the cruel task of rending still more the wound of the mourner's heart which bleeds under the present afflictions—and from the necessity of breaking "the bruised reed" already tottering, by opening a scene of after and hopeless misery beyond the sorrows of death; but we offer unfeigned gratitude and thanks to God, for the light of his truth, for the life of the Gospel, and for the "bread of God which giveth life to the world."

He has given us a hope that reaches beyond the vale of death, and this hope is set before us in the Gospel of his Son. And the truth, upon which this hope is made to rest, is confirmed by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. And it embraces within its ample folds, the final reconciliation of all intelligent beings to God. "For God is in (or by) Christ, reconciling all things unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them."

This hope embraces the fulfilment of the promise of God to ancient Abraham, that in his seed, (which Paul affirms is Christ,) "all the families of the earth shall be blessed." Or as Peter expresses it, Acts iii: 25, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed."—Therefore if God's promise fail not, every individual who is a kindred of the earth—every one who is of the earth, earthly, must, in the fulness of times, be blessed in Christ. And Paul says expressly, "As we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly"—and the connexion plainly teaches us, that the heavenly image will be put on at the resurrection. Therefore, when all are "made alive in Christ," then the blessing promised to ancient Abraham will be fulfilled. For then "all the kindreds of the earth," will be blessed in Christ. Then, too, God's will concerning man will be done; for he "will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth." And then also, will the declaration of the Psalmist be accomplished—"all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall come and worship before him." Then also will the testimony of the prophet, Isaiah xlv: 23, and 24, be proved true. "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength—to him shall come, and all that are incensed against him shall be ashamed." (We leave out the supplied words.)

The apostle Paul has borne witness to the truth of this prophecy, and its sentiments, by giving the same, substantially, in his letter to the Philippians, chapter ii: 9–11. "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, (Jesus,) and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Thus it is perceived, that in performing the services of the Christian ministry, and the offices of Christian benevolence, we can come to the mourner and the sorrow stricken of our race, and do unto them as we would wish others to do unto us. We can obey the apparent design of Heaven, "to comfort all that mourn," guided by the Revelation which God hath given us. We can come to the mourners in the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel of Christ, and point them to the hope which is set before them, as the true fountain of consolation, and the bread of life. We can instruct them to look away from the sorrows of a fleeting world, to Jesus, the "resurrection and the life," and there, with the eye of faith, behold "death destroyed," and life and immortality brought to light, for a dying world. We can assure them, that God is good in all his dispensations, even if we are unable to see clearly the reason for all his ways. We even, by the light of those truths which we have brought to view, look forward to the time when the object of the Redeemer's mission shall be accomplished, when all things shall be subdued unto him, and God shall be "all in all." This faith gives life to the desponding soul, and joy to the sorrowing spirit. It teaches us to contemplate the departed as the object of God's unfailling love, and an heir through grace, unpurchased grace, to an "inheritance incorruptible and undefiled."

"Tis here the Lord indulgent sheds
His kindest gifts, a heavenly store;
With life immortal crowns their heads,
When earth's frail comforts please no more"— and O what kindness, what unspeakable love, is thus revealed, to console our hearts. Through that love which was commended to us in Jesus Christ, we are permitted to believe with Paul, that when this "earthly house" is dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

"Wide it unveils celestial worlds,
Where deathless pleasures reign;
And bids us seek our portion there,
Nor bids us seek in vain."

This is the happy privilege afforded to the mourner, in the Gospel of the Son of God; and this hope rests on the word of God, the immutable promise of Jehovah, who is able to perform. And it was for our benefit that "life and immortality" were brought to light, and their truth confirmed by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is through this medium, that we are blessed with a light which dispels the darkness of the tomb, and points to "fairer worlds on high." By the resurrection of Jesus, we are assured of a future being, immortal, incorruptible and glorious. This is to be received by faith in the testimony of Jesus and his apostles. And besides this hope of immortality, we are taught our duty to ourselves, our God, and to our fellow men. And we are further instructed that our happiness on earth depends upon our obedience. Not that our future being depends upon our works here. Obedience to the directions of Heaven, is essential, however, to the enjoyment of a Gospel faith in this world. If we do not give attention to "add to our faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity;" our faith will grow weak and sickly, and hope will languish in our bosoms, and barrenness will be the consequence. Therefore if we would receive the faith of the Gospel, and enjoy a lively hope in the doctrine of life and immortality, and be prepared for the hour of adversity and death, we must purify ourselves by obeying the truth. A salvation in the present life, by hope of one to come, is what we need. A salvation from the powers of darkness and error in this world, is what we are to strive for, and duty requires of us, not to lose the salvation which is within our reach, in a vain struggle after a future one which we can not merit or render more secure.

We are to work out our own salvation, (which must be a present one,) "with fear and trembling," by the light and direction of God's truth which is given us. And in order to secure and enjoy this salvation which is opened to us in this world, we must make the language of our text a rule of life. Therefore permit me to say, an conclusion, that the highest of all blessings granted to us on earth, are accumulated or enjoyed, by a "patient continuance in well doing." And in order to the enjoyment of the bread of life, we must arise to the faith and the practice of the Gospel of salvation. We must cultivate a meek and quiet spirit, and walk in obedience to the light which is given us. For we are informed by the word of truth, that "if our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God." And this is a truth felt by every believer, and may be witnessed in every mind. Our confidence is increased, and our hope purified, by obedience and righteousness; while, on the contrary, disobedience and sin will, by attendant condemnation, cast a shade around our hope, and prevent us from seeing "afar off," as expressed by Peter.—

Therefore, your speaker can but point out the way of righteousness, as the only way to secure the enjoyment of that elevating faith which is given us in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. "Light is sown for the righteous, and peace for the upright in heart;" and "the way of the just shineth brighter and brighter unto the perfect day."

Here are presented noble inducements to lead us all onward in knowledge and virtue. For by this advancement in the way of truth, our hope will arise in its purified activity—our faith will become lively and strong; and we shall be enabled to "comprehend with all saints, the height and depth of the love of God, and be filled with that peace which passeth knowledge." Such improvement will prepare us more fully to rejoice in the heavenly truth, that "Jesus is the Son of God," and "Saviour of the world." It will cause us to behold more clearly the light of immortality shed around the silence of the tomb, and to feel the truth that Jesus is possessor of the dead and living. Our faith will soar above and beyond the power of death, and there behold a universe of intelligent beings, made immortal by the powers of the resurrection—partaking of the image of Jesus—having on the garment of perfect righteousness, and encircled in the arms of God's unfailling love.

Such is the bread of life!—such the Gospel food, which our Father in heaven hath graciously given us, to enjoy. And in the sincerity of my soul, I now tender the same to my dying fellow-men. We would offer the same food to this mourning circle, and give our assurance that it is good. But we can not receive it for you. We can neither believe or practice the Gospel for another; this is an individual work. And we can only offer it to you as we have received it, and beseech you to receive the same, and be reconciled to God. Then receive this truth in the love of it, and you will find a "soul-reviving feast"—a support in the hour of darkness, and a present help in every time of need. Let us all cherish this principle of Gospel grace in our hearts, and and render thanks to God for his "unspeakable gift," and rise higher and still higher in the scale of human perfection, until the time of our departure is at hand. And then we can look away, by the influence of a heavenly hope, to the meeting of an assembled universe in heaven, there to enter upon that "inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." There we shall be like the "angels of God in heaven." Death will be destroyed and swallowed up in victory—"tears wiped from off all faces," and God be all in all.

O, for his grace to aid us on,
And arm with fortitude the breast;
Till life's vain dreams and tumult's o'er,
We reach the realms of endless rest.

AMEN.

AN ANECDOTE.

Some years since, when, as was the custom, one of our Partialist brethren, a clergyman had occasion during a discourse to speak of his favorite tenet, embracing a rigid adherence to the doctrines of the trinity, he made use of nearly the following words!—"My hearers, I am about to speak upon a point which no finite mind can comprehend. Yet it being revealed in God's written word, duty demands that both you and your speaker should assent to it. Obey this solemn warning then, and attend to what follows.—The Bible teaches us the existence of three distinct Beings; the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: all of which constitute the moral Governor of the universe. Yet notwithstanding they all possess but infinite power and perfections, each one, separately, is infinite in all his attributes. True, it is mysterious how one can be made equal to three, and vice versa, but we are commanded to believe it, by that Power that made us, and if we do not, destruction will come upon us."

Shortly after, one of those to whom the above was addressed, called upon the Rev. parson to pay him his subscription for preaching, three dollars being the sum subscribed, he drew from his pocket one dollar and presented it as a sufficient amount to cancel the debt. "What," says the venerable parson, "three dollars is the sum you owe me." "Very well," said the gentleman in return "You have received it: for no longer ago than last Sabbath you publicly stated in your pulpit that three is one, and that one is three, and added that it was a "hidden mystery." Now Sir, this being the case, the dollar that I have just handed you cancels the debt I owe you." The Parson made no reply, but received the one dollar, and immediately left his friend, to seek some other employment, and never was he heard again to preach concerning "mysteries." P. J. J.

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

THE EXPOSITOR—for May, 1840.

The number before us has been read with pleasure and profit, though not as interesting to me as some of the previous numbers. The first article, by the Editor, on the "Opinions of the Christians before the Council of Nice, concerning the nature and method of redemption," is principally taken from the Manual of Christian Dogmatic History, by Muenscher. It is valuable, as showing that modern is not "ancient orthodoxy on that subject." "Ministerial relations and duties," by Br. S. R. Smith, is a well written article seconding the effort of Br. Thayer, in a previous number, to place our profession and its members on their proper and most useful ground in society. "Universalism in Great Britain and Ireland," by Br. T. J. Sawyer, is a clear exhibition of the manner in which the great salvation is presented by those bearing our denominational name over the great water—also, the manner in which it is held and presented by the Unitarians of that country. "The apostolical churches, and the apostolical administration of the Lord's Supper," by the Editor, would be more entitled to the consideration of those holding views opposed to those of Br. H. B. 2d, if he had furnished some testimony—especially Scripture testimony—in favor of some of his statements. The "Literary Notices," by some person or persons unknown, are good. The Layman's Legacy, Vol. 1, is severely handled for its biting, bitter sarcasm, and more so, for its blunders in Greek criticism.* The other work reviewed is Universalism illustrated and defended, by Br. O. A. Skinner. It is justly praised, and a few omissions, kindly pointed out.

The Expositor is doing much good, and would do more, had it a larger circulation. Why can not a copy be put into the hand of each of our preachers, and two or three copies at least, be circulated in each society in our order? This would more than double its support and treble its usefulness. A. B. G.

*Another writer in the last Christian Freeman, almost vies with Br. Fitz in the severity with which he condemns the severity of the Legacy. The poor "Layman" is hardly allowed the "benefit of the clergy." G.

THE LADIES' BOOK.

The publisher and Editors of this monthly, seem determined that it shall not be equalled by any similar publication. Of its numerous colored plates of the fashions, and patterns of lace work, I am not qualified to speak, save to say that the ladies admire them greatly; but of the articles published, I think it may be said that they are nearly all very excellent of their kind. It is wholly original in its contents, and numbers among its contributors, many of the ablest American and English authors of the day. Its essays on domestic economy, cookery, etc., by Mrs. Hale are remarkably well written—combining the interesting and the useful—and were needed to perfect the character of the work. Ladies who wish to procure a good literary monthly, will undoubtedly be pleased with the Ladies Book. L. Godey

Philadelphia, Publisher. Br. Hutchinson acts as Agent, at his bookstore, Genesee street, Utica. A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST PULPIT.

I am very anxious, for particular reasons, to ascertain early what encouragement we may expect for this publication. The approaching State Convention will afford a good opportunity for our friends to inform us what we may expect in their respective neighborhoods. Will they please stir themselves in getting names, and let us know the result by that time?

If encouragement is then given, sufficient to warrant our going on, we will issue the first number as soon as we can get it ready. If not, we will wait until July, and then either go on, or abandon the project altogether—though reluctantly. A. B. G.

DEFORMED FEET.

Our sympathies are frequently excited by beholding persons otherwise well formed and active, suffering from the misfortune above noticed—a deformity far more common than need be, were parents but aware that, in many cases, their own care, aided by a little ingenuity, might greatly lessen the defect, by attending to it in early infancy, while the parts are soft and yielding. But, happily for mankind, the improvements which have taken place in surgery are reaching this evil also. For some time past we have heard of some marvellous, yet well attested cures, by Dr. Detmold, of New York.—Dr. Simon Z. Haven, of this city, having been led to pay attention to the subject, by having a son afflicted with a club foot, visited Dr. Detmold, made himself master of the mode of operation and treatment in such cases, operated with great success upon his son, and is now ready to operate upon others. From my acquaintance with Dr. Haven, and especially from his success in the present case, I would recommend him to all who have children, or who are themselves, thus afflicted. Dr. Haven's son was five years of age. Up to April 14th, he had always walked on the side of the foot. He now walks upon the sole, with the toes turned in the natural direction. Dr. Haven may be consulted at his office (and residence) No. 6, Bleeker street, Utica. A. B. G.

NOTICES.

Br. Goodrich's letter (supposed to contain the notices alluded to by him in his last,) was received by Br. H. in due time, and attended to by Br. H., but was not put into our container, and was mislaid—or, at least has not been found. We regret the unintentional neglect to place it in our hands, but know no way to remedy it, but for him to send on the notices again.

Permit us to suggest to persons writing on business, to put their business articles on a part of the sheet that can be torn off, without injuring the parts of the letter containing matter for the paper. Also do the same with all religious and obituary, or marriage notices, as, from the nature of the case, they must often be disposed of before other communications can be attended to. Attention to these requests will save us considerable trouble, and often prevent delay in publishing such notices. A. B. G.

DESTITUTE SOCIETIES.

It is particularly desirable to many, that all the destitute societies should be represented at our associational meetings, and their delegates be prepared to state definitely what is their present condition, and what they are able to do toward supporting the preached word, stately or occasionally. In cases where the societies are too drowsy to hold a meeting to choose delegates, perhaps some individual may be wakeful enough to put down the statement on paper, and send it to the Association by some neighbor who will attend—or by mail to the Standing Clerk, previous to the session—and in this way some information may be obtained by the council, that may lead to beneficial results to the soci-ty itself. It is a fact, that there are many places that need, and might be supplied with preaching, if the facts of their case were only generally known. Let us try to arouse to our several duties. A. B. G.

My thanks are due to Dr. Trowbridge of the H. of R. of this State, for a copy of the Report of the Superintendent of Common Schools, on District visitations and Common School Libraries. A. B. G.

Br. Bazin—Rev. S. J. Gibson, Norwich, Chenango county, is a new subscriber, and wishes the volume for 1840 entire: Also send number 5, vol. 3, to Rev. J. T. Goodrich, and Z. S. Cary, Oxford. It was never received by them. Credit S. Goff, Mendon, Monroe county, and G. H. Patrick, Kanawha C H, Va., each $2. Credit also M. W. Jenkins, Marengo, Wayne county, volumes 2, 3, and 4, $5. Send Expositor to Rev. J. M. Cook, Churchville, Monroe county, credit him $2. charge us.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository to R. D. Murray Rutland, Jefferson county, and credit him $2. Credit G. H. Patrick, Kanawha C H, Va. and Rev. Wm. Rounseville, St. Charles, (Ills.) each $2. charge us. Transfer Eliza Arnold's Repository to Rev J. M. Cook, Churchville. Send January number to Julia Ranney, and Miss S. Murdock, Le Roy, N. Y. and discontinue the latter. G. and H.

Br. Tompkins.—Please send the October number of the Universalist and Ladies Repository, present volume, to Henry Balcom, Oxford, Chenango county, N. Y. It was never received.

Br. Bazin.—Please send the 6th number of the 3d volume of the Universalist Expositor, to Zalman S. Cary, and J. T. Goodrich, Oxford, Chenango county, N. Y. Neither ever received it.

ONONDAGA BOOKSTORE

Mr. L. H. Redfield of the Onondaga Bookstore, Syracuse, will hereafter keep a supply of Universalist Books. We hope our friends will encourage such Booksellers as are not too bigoted to keep our works.

NEW AGENTS—L. D. Briggs, Pillar Point—John Wells, Benton Town, Pa.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. H. GREEN, in Parker's Settlement, Virgil, at 11 o'clock A. M.—Br. WHITAKER, in Vernon—Br. GROSH, Bridge-water.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. GREEN, in Dresserville, Sempronius, at 11 o'clock A. M.—Br. WHITAKER in Marshall.—Br. GROSH in Lee, and Delta, at 5 P. M.—Br. BARTLETT in Mohawk village.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH, at Black River, (Lockport,) and at Felis Mills at 5 o'clock P. M. and the same once in four weeks thereafter—Br. CHAMBERLAIN in Collinsville.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in June, by Br. CHAMBERLAIN, in Leyden—Br. GREEN, in Smithville, in the stone school house near Br. Beedles, at 11 o'clock A. M.

A Quarterly conference of the Hudson River Association will be held in the Presbyterian meeting house in Stephentown, to commence Wednesday May 20, and continue two days. The services will commence Wednesday at 3 o'clock P. M. at which time an appropriate discourse will be delivered by Br. S. R. Smith, on the occasion of the removal of the remains of the lately deceased companion of Br. Wm. Wilcox. Ministering brethren are earnestly invited to attend.

J. A. ASPINWALL, Standing Clerk

The Central Association of Michigan will be held, as per adjournment, in Ann Arbor, Mich., on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June next.

The Central Association of Universalists, will meet at Hamilton Centre on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June next (3d and 4th). Occasional Sermon by the writer. Societies and churches will be careful to select and send two delegates each, with statements of their condition and prospects. T. D. Cook, Standing Clerk.

The Central Association of Universalists in Michigan, will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, on the first Wednesday and Thursday, third and fourth of June next. It is desirable that preachers and delegates should be present the evening before, or by 8 o'clock, Wednesday morning, as the council will be opened at 9 o'clock, A. M., on Wednesday, at the Universalist Church. N. STACY, Standing Clerk,

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION—No IX.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

It is held by some, that a part of our race will finally and eternally be annihilated, or struck out of existence. Of those who hold this doctrine, some believe that the wicked, as they call them, will be struck out of existence at death; others, that they will be in existence awhile, and then cease to be; others, that after being raised, they will be tormented to death.

Those passages of Scripture in which the terms death and destruction have the sense of punishment, are by the advocates of annihilation applied to that subject. I shall present in this place two principal reasons against the truth of the doctrine, and the correctness of such applications of Scripture.

1. I can not receive the doctrine that some of our race have no existence after the death of the body, because Jesus affirms, Luke xx: 38, that "all live unto" God. And Paul declares, in 1 Cor. xv: 22, "As in Adam all die, even in Christ shall all be made alive."

2. The doctrine of annihilation in any or all of its forms and modifications, I conceive to be negated by the apostle in 1 Cor. xv: 25, 26, where, speaking of Christ, he says, "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

The expression "put under his feet," is evidently not to be taken in a literal sense—its meaning must, then, be learned from the next verse, where we read of one of his enemies being "destroyed." To put them under his feet, and to destroy them, are here convertible expressions, and the latter gives the sense of the former.*

But what is meant in this place by being destroyed? In some passages of Scripture, to destroy is to punish; but this can not be its meaning here, since one of the enemies is death, which can not be punished. It must then mean to be annihilated, which is just the meaning that annihilationists are wont to affix to the word in many other passages. We have it, then, that Christ must reign till he hath annihilated all enemies, and that the last one to be annihilated is death.

Now what is meant here by the enemies? Are they some of Christ's subjects that are disloyal and inimical? Paul says that the last enemy is death; and it would seem that the others are something analogous to this, not human beings, but such things as are inimical to the prosperity of his kingdom, the happiness of his subjects, etc.; as for example, "the carnal mind," which this same apostle says, "is enmity against God, for it is not subject to his law, neither indeed can be." Rom. viii: 7. But to render the case perfectly clear, let us for a few moments suppose otherwise. The enemies, then, are human beings. Jesus declares, Luke ix: 56, that he came not "to destroy men's lives, but to save them." But notwithstanding this, he commences and carries on among them the work of destruction, adding death to death, till all inimical human beings are annihilated. The "enmity" that was in them, alias "the carnal mind," as also every thing of that nature, is of course gone. Now there is but one enemy left, and that is death. But where now is death to be found, or over whom does it reign? Evidently in and over those, and those only, whom the Saviour has just finished putting to death. Shall they eternally remain under the power of death? The annihilationist answers, yes. But can death reign, or exert any power after itself is destroyed? Evidently not. But death "shall be destroyed"—so says the book—and will not its victims then escape? In other words when death comes to be destroyed, must it not be a fact that there will be nobody dead? (I speak exclusively of human beings, and so did Paul.) When darkness is destroyed, light succeeds, because the former is merely the absence of the latter. In like manner, death is the absence of life; and when death is destroyed, will not "all live?" I think the response of the intelligent reader must be yes. Is not, then, the doctrine of the annihilation of some of mankind disproved by 1 Cor. xv: 26?

If now the reader is anxious to know who or what the enemies are, let him consult Heb. ii: 14, and John iii: 8, where he will learn that our Lord is to destroy the devil, as also his works. We thus discover that, according to these passages, destructiveness, as manifested by our Lord, is under the guidance of benevolence; a strong indication that he will never annihilate any of mankind.

There are, indeed, certain passages of Scripture, in which destruction is set forth as the doom of some of mankind; but we believe that on an examination of them, it will be found that far the greater share of them relate to the destinies of mankind in an associated capacity, as nations, cities, etc.; of which Acts xiii: 19, is an example: "And when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot." So in Ps. ix: 5, we read, "Thou hast destroyed the wicked, thou hast put out their name for ever and ever." This would be a capital text to prove annihilation by, were it not for the next verse, which thus explains it, "Thou hast destroyed cities, their memorial is perished with them." A city may be demolished, and there may be none of its inhabitants left; and yet they may be far from being annihilated.

In Deut. xxviii: 48, 51, Moses tells the Israelites that in case they should transgress to a certain extent, they would be "destroyed." In 2 Kings xiii: 23, it is said that "the Lord was gracious unto them, . . . and would not destroy them, neither cast he them from his presence as yet," that is, as it is afterwards explained, he did not yet cast them out of their land. But in chapter xxiv: 20, it is declared that he did at last "cast them out from his presence," that is, as it is said in the next chapter, they were "carried away out of their land" to Babylon. In 2 Thes. i: 9, Paul speaks of those who troubled the Thessalonians by persecuting them; and he declared that they should "be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord." This passage is often adduced by the advocates both of endless misery and of annihilation, in proof of their respective doctrines. But creeds aside, it would seem that as this language of Paul is evidently borrowed from the Old Testament, it is most likely that it has the sense which the same expressions have there, and that therefore the meaning is, that those persecutors were to be destroyed as a nation, and totally ejected from the land of Judea.

In a few instances, destruction is spoken of as the destiny of individuals. It then means either the death of the body, as it does in most of the cases; or else it is synonymous with death used in a figurative sense.

As for those passages in which mention is made of "the second death," I remark that they seem to import misery, rather than a cessation of life, and therefore can not mean annihilation. Besides, as we have already seen, Christ is to destroy death; and the Revelator in chap. xxi: 4, speaks of a time when, as he declares, "there shall be no more death." At that time even the second death will be no more.

A FRAGMENT.

O death! Thou art the destined fate of every human being, brought upon a world of mankind, by the transgression of our first parents. Thou art ever ready with the bended bow, to hurl the terrific dart, and pierce the heart of some hapless victim. The happiness of man has been destroyed by thy ghastly form, which has ever exhibited itself with all its formidable horrors, since thou wert appointed as the destiny of every son and daughter of Adam, for the violation of the law of God. Riches, youth, beauty, and virtue, are insufficient to soften thy adamant heart, and appease thy ever-cruel voracity for human prey; and the blood of nations is not sufficient to slake thy everlasting thirst. The very virals of the helpless infant, swathed in innocence, snatched from the fond embrace of the tender and affectionate parent, seem precious to thy taste; and the mother, by thee bereft of all her earthly joys, moirns, and pines away in solitude, and sinks into thy devouring jaws, which are ever ready to sacrifice the offered victim, and her name and memory, by thy withering touch are plunged into forgetfulness. The rich and poor, the philosopher and statesman, the prince and peasant, and even the proud king sitting upon his lofty throne, bearing a crown of gold upon his head and swaying the sceptre over the mighty nations of the earth, must all be laid equally low by thy destructive hand. Thus men of every grade, whether high or low, great or small, are doomed to plod their way through the rugged scenes of life, and at thy approach, appalled they fall into thy arms, and are crushed within thy iron grasp. But how consoling is the thought, that we shall live again—that we shall be enabled to burst asunder the chains of death and rise triumphant o'er the grave.

REVIEW OF A SERMON.

In Justice to myself and to others, I offer for the consideration of the public, and for the particular benefit of Rev. Mr. Wilcot, of Whitehall, Washington Co. N. Y., a brief sketch of a sermon delivered last Sabbath in Hebron by that gentleman. His text was Heb. x: 31, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." The preacher said it was a fearful thing to fall into the hands of God only in the sense in which the term was used in the text; namely, for punishment; and that this was an obvious fact from the nature of things, for when one fell into hands of God for punishment, "the day of grace was past of course, and there was no hope for him. It was not fearful to fall into the hands of God as a convert; (though a wiser than he has said that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom;) neither at birth, for existence is a blessing; nor yet for chastisement, as Job and David did, and this must be obvious to every thinking mind, for blessings followed those chastisements; therefore it was only fearful to fall into the hands of God to be punished, which was the same as falling into hell; and when you once get a man into hell you can never get him out again on any principle whatever, (the declarations of David and Jonah to the contrary, notwithstanding.)—Directly after this argument he assigned as another reason why it was fearful to fall into the hands of God, that he was a living God; therefore the conclusion became inevitable, that as God lived forever, the punishments which he inflicted must be absolutely endless. The preacher dwelt upon this argument to a considerable length, and pretended that it was conclusive." Admit it for a moment and see how soon it will annihilate its own existence. Adam and Eve, according to the account, came into existence from the hand of God spotless as Christ himself. And as the existence of God is eternal, this spotless pair must always remain in their primeval state. But they did not, but made it necessary for a day of grace to be given them, at the hand of God: and as God lives forever so his day of grace must never end.

No, says Mr. Wilcot, that argument would prove your Universalism. Men have sinned away

* The phrase "put under his feet," occurs in both the 25th and 27th verses of 1 Cor. 15th chapter; and in each case an equivalent expression follows it, and shows its meaning. This method of determining the import of an obviously figurative expression, must, we think, commend itself to the good sense of every intelligent reader; and according to this, the phrase in question signifies in the one case, "destroyed," in the other, "subdued."

the day of grace, one by one, and many more will sin away this day ere the adversary has ceased his work. Thus stands the doctrine of Mr. Wilcot! Reader, think of this! can a man sin away the day of grace? "Where sin abounded grace did much more abound." And tell me not that man has sinned away the day of grace so long as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob continues to rule this earthly ball. Tell me not that there is no hope for man so long as the sun shall shine, or the refreshing showers descend upon the just and upon the unjust.

But perhaps Mr. Wilcot will feel himself constrained to acknowledge that God preaches Universalism to man here on earth, especially when he reads where Christ has proved the doctrine to the opposing Pharisees, from nature as a text book. But he may contend that it is a strong delusion sent to deceive the hardened Universalists, and that the moment we enter the unseen future, the whole will be changed. You may tell the child that there are bears in the cellar, and make him believe your story, but never suppose that you can beat such consummate folly into the head of a Universalist who deserves the name, as to make him believe that subtleties like these will ever be practised upon man by his maker.

Mr. Wilcot came to the conclusion that his case was made out in favor of his doctrine, if he could prove that the text meant falling into the hands of God to be punished. And to prove that fact he read the 28th and 29th verses of the chapter in which his text was found. "He that despised Moses' law," etc. which any candid mind might see with a glance of the eye, would take his text entirely out of his hands as meaning endless misery, and apply it to its proper place, the punishment of the Jews, which falls far short of miseries like those described by Mr. Wilcot. I hope that the good sense of the reader will supply that which brevity forbids me to publish.

Mr. Wilcot contends that falling into the hands of God to be punished, is falling into hell, and he says that if you once get a man into hell you can not get him out on any principle whatever; (what a pity the wisdom of this man had not been known to Jonah and David;) but he must remain in hell to all eternity, (whether this hell, here spoken of is Hades or Gehenna, I should be pleased that the learned Mr. Wilcot should inform me,) sinning and suffering for the purpose of satisfying the demands of goodness, justice, and omnipotence.—He stated the fact that man had sinned, and argued from thence, that because man had become unjust and unholy, justice and holiness required that he should be taken into the hand of God for punishment; that he might continue to grow worse to all eternity—and this too for the purpose of supporting the moral government of God, which according to the speaker's estimation was always in favor of holiness and happiness. One pang of punishment, (and punishment in his scale was measured only by pangs,) would call forth many sins and blasphemies against the inflictor, and justice, the old cross landlord, determined to let his pay of his debtor to the full, would require for such blasphemies many pangs of punishment. Thus this inflexible tyrant justice gets his pay at most famishing rate. He had better have let his culprit alone in the first place, for it is impossible that the culprit should receive any measurable share of his punishment at this rate; and it must be a woful pity that God should ever have been confederate with such a miserable justice—justice that requires God at the peril of his dignity and character, to forfeit every principle of consistency.

How will the policy of Christ, comport with Mr. Wilcot's theory for building up the house and kingdom of Pluto? He said to the woman taken in sin, "go thy way and sin no more." Not so our advocate for justice. Go thy way and sin forever. This is what perfection requires, and justice and other perfect principles must be obeyed. No, says the woman, I repent, receive me as a lost sheep to thy fold. No, silly woman, you have sinned away the day of grace, and God has determined to take you into his custody for punishment; and when once a being is taken into the hands of God for punishment, that punishment can never terminate. So you see that we who are to be saved, God does not punish at all. But you are of the non elect, therefore a subject of punishment. You have sinned away the day of grace—there is no hope for you. Thus we see the issue between Christ and Limitarianism.

But one argument in favor of the perpetuity of sin, was, that God was opposed to it. And the following was quoted to prove it. God will not look upon sin with the least allowance or approbation. He seemed to think that the Universalists were perfect ignoramuses for not viewing the matter in the same light that he did. He spoke of their being extremely ignorant of the scriptures in particular. But he found another philosophical reason for their not believing with him concerning the character of God, the nature of justice, and the other doctrines which he taught on that occasion. It was extreme depravity and wickedness, and it appeared to be the endeavor of the speaker to represent them in the worst light that his ingenuity could invent. This in a great measure was no doubt intended as a shot at me, who was a stranger in the place, and at whom he had, as it appears, a few Sabbaths before, become somewhat incensed from seeing me take notes. Near the close of his discourse he bid us a triumphant defiance, from his little safety fort. He said, "Where is the Universalist who dares to dispute these doctrines?" Then followed some defamatory language. And now to satisfy his inquiry, I will invite him to discuss with me in public, at some convenient time and place near at hand, the merits of that eloquent discourse. If he accepts my invitation he has only to appoint his time and place. LUTHER M. GORE.

MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF CREATION—No. 1.

BR. GROSH—The design of the following numbers is to vindicate the mosaic account of the creation, and formation of the solar system, and thereby take out of the hands of the rejectors of the Bible, an objection which doubtless by them is esteemed unanswerable, viz: that the earth, with its strata of rocks, minerals, coals, earths; its mountains, seas, volcanic eruptions; its fossils, shells, and the various remains of extinct genera of animals deeply imbedded in rocks, etc., all, refute the notion that the earth and the heavens were brought into existence, or into form, about 6000 years ago. And we confess the full force of the objection, if the six days work of God does not extend beyond so recent a period. But only understand these days to mean indefinite periods, and the mosaic account is the only one that is or can be supported by geological facts. On this hypothesis, all the objections raised from the earth's phenomena, or from pagan chronology, become of no force. We, alike avoid Scylla, and Charybdis, or the absurd notion that there has been no creation, but, "all things are eternal"; or the still more ridiculous notion that they sprung into existence by chance. Either of these theories denies that intelligence had any thing to do with the existence of the present system of things; whereas, Moses' account traces their origin to an infinitely wise, powerful and good designer and Creator. The sacred historian fixes no date when the work of creation was commenced, or when it was completed. He only affirms that "the heavens and the earth" were created "in the beginning." The term "beginning," signifies the "original of the world," or of creation. Millions of ages may have elapsed since the work of creation began. Indeed the words in Gen. ii: 4, "These are the generations of the heavens and the earth," seem to imply that Moses had travelled over immeasurable periods in his brief history of the creation and formation of the solar system.

All these stupendous events are condensed in about one short chapter. Now we shall understand the term generations to mean the same as formations, and, consequently, shall use Gen. ii: 4, as a key to unlock the arcana of creation. As we have a vast field before us for speculation, it will be necessary that we observe great brevity in our intended illustrations. We shall follow no writers on Geology, only so far as their views tend to harmonize and illustrate the mosaic statements relative to the creation.

Let us begin with Gen. i: 1. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This embraces the creation of the matter of the solar system. Yea, the verse would seem to embrace the creation, in all its periods or generations, from its commencement to its completion. Viewed in this light, all the remaining verses in the chapter contain an explanation of the modus operandi of the creation. Thus we read, "And the earth was without form and void." Mark, it does not say, the heavens were without form. Should it be said, "The reason they are not alluded to in verse 2, is because they were not formed until indefinite ages had elapsed after matter was created," we reply, both are said to be created "in the beginning." It is difficult to conceive of our earth, covered with "the deep" or with "waters," for ages before our sun and planets were brought into "form," or separate existences. We see no necessity for such a lapse of time between the creation of matter and the commencement of the formation of the solar system. We are aware that we are dissenting from the views of Br. "G. W. M.," as expressed in the Expositor, Vol. iv, No. 1, New Series, in an article, entitled, "The Mosaic account of the Creation." Although there is much in that article which we do fully approve, yet there are some points on which we are constrained to differ in opinion from its author. We do not however attach infallibility to our opinion. That esteemed brother may be right, and we wrong. To point out therefore wherein we differ, we trust will not be construed into a fault-finding spirit. Speaking of the second verse, he says, "In the second, he (Moses) must have had reference to the time when God gave to the solar system its present order and arrangement. Between these two periods long and indefinite ages elapsed." He adds, "It is evident that those indefinite ages must have embraced a great duration of time, as existing facts on the surface of the earth prove." Now what are the facts on "the surface of the earth" that it must have existed, as a sphere, having a surface, and undergoing a forming process, for ages before the solar system received its present order and arrangement? Do these facts consist in the evident ages required for the formation of the strata on the earth's surface, from the lower or diluvial, to the upper or alluvial soil; from the remains of "extinct genera" in the "transition rocks," or diluvial strata? These evidently were formed more than 6000 years ago. But how could the earth have existed as a sphere, covered with strata of rocks, coals, earths, etc., in which are deposited the remains of shell fish and animals that existed before the solar system was arranged? Could these changes take place on the earth's surface, and animals exist, without the solar and atmospheric influences, which could not begin to operate until the arrangement of the solar system? Again, it may be said that the state of matter on the earth's surface was such that it could not be brought into form, nor the solar system created out of it, until it had gone through a cooling process, which required the lapse of ages. This I know would be the result of Dr. Buckland's theory, which Br. G. W. M. adapts. But matter, in this state, could not be congenial to the existence of genera now extinct. True, the Dr. supposes that "when God created the matter of the earth, it was a mere melted mass of metals and metalloids bases of the earths and alkalis."—"Over this melted mass, he thinks, granite was formed," which, by volcanic eruptions, was subsequently broken. "and disposed at unequal levels," etc. Now if this mass became thus crusted and then broken and disposed in unequal levels, so as to form mountains, and vallies, and seas, then it must have been originally spherical, when in a melted state. We have then to learn how the waters could have existed on its surface, and have penetrated the fissures of this crust of granite, and produced volcanic eruptions; before the solar system was arranged, or the firmament divided the waters above and below. We have also to inquire whether the sun and the other planets were formed out of our earth, or out of other melted masses of matter. Indeed we find much difficulty in supposing that the earth was originally, and is now centrally a mass of melted lava or metals. We can not harmonize the hypothesis with Br. M.'s idea that fire and heat were not formed until the first day, "in the arrangement of the solar system." There must have been fire and heat for ages before. Neither do we think that boiling springs, or volcanic eruptions, demonstrate the correctness of the theory. May not these springs take their rise near some burning mines, which mines may be the source of these eruptions? Now from such localities we can conceive how explosions could take place, through the power of generated steam, or compressed air; whereas, if the earth is centrally one entire mass of lava, we can not account for its periodical convulsions. We should also think that if the earth has gone through a cooling process for ages, there would be great danger of its becoming too cold for the purposes of vegetation or of animal existence.

Now we confess that the abstract question, whether the earth is a mass of melted metals, or a rock, does not at all affect Br. M.'s or my general views. He has fully shown, from the earth's surface, that it must have existed for indefinite ages. Our only query has been, how vegetable and animal remains could have been deposited before the solar system was arranged. Perhaps we do not comprehend his meaning in the words, "The solar system was arranged in six days.—These events, according to chronology, occurred about six thousand years ago." K. H. Shoreham, Vt.

OMNISCIENCE.

Let the unbeliever doubt, if he must, the reality of a spiritual and superintending providence; it is not alone against the evidences which materiality throws around him, or the testimony of "the book," that he has to contend, but he must even take a stand against the native feelings of the human heart. The child, when he first begins to feel the power that is within him, and to understand the station which he occupies among thinking, reasoning beings, trusts his life in the hands of those who love him, and as he grows up he comes into their presence with happy smiles, and holy confidence.—How many blissful hours has he passed in the enjoyment of their society. And when he has gone forth into the world, with his soul beating with holy integrity, how has the guidance of parents strengthened him—how has the watchfulness of those dear to him and to whom he was dear, and the consciousness that, in his hopes of usefulness, he was not alone in the world, urged him to surmount difficulties that the friendless would not dare to provoke. And when a false or an irresolute step would have prostrated him and his hopes together, how has he stepped firmly over the chasm, under the high consciousness that the eyes of parents and friends were upon him. O, if the world could understand how many links have, by its sneers and its unfeeling arrogance, been broken in that chain of sym-thy which binds man to the interests of his fellow man; if they could see how the heart's smile, and the cheerful look, and the encouraging word, and the act of friendship which offers to do good without ostentation, have kindled the flame of gratitude in the youthful mind, and fired him with the determination to be worthy of the favors bestowed upon him, methinks they would not see so many treading the thorny paths of human degradation! The heart, too frequently from the necessity of the case, has struggled against its dying throes, after the world has ignorantly declared that it is determined to drive its unfortunate victim to the desperation of moral abandonment! And when it has lifted its last look of supplication to those who should have lent the helping hand, it has been chilled with the cold repulse, "Stand by thyself, for I am holier," or richer, or mightier "than thou." And thus that heart which might have bid defiance to the tempests of time had it been touched by the offers of love, has been palsied and death stricken by the voices that should have soothed and comforted and saved!

And yet there is a higher power, and a holier love, and a more penetrating eye, than man's. Hagar when she went out into the wilderness, felt and acknowledged the truth of this, when she named the place where she had received the words of instruction and comfort from the Almighty, "Thou God, seest me." And if mankind could realize this truth as they should do, it would be to them a theme of rejoicing and a hiding place from the shafts of iniquity. Good men have realized it, and passed through, and finished their pilgrimage here with thanksgiving and praise. They have felt that in consequence of this sentiment, they were in the society of heaven. They were not alone, though forsaken by every earthly friend they ever had. And if their friends were not mere butterflies, playing in the sunshine and vanishing before the shade, the hours would come, when the passing thought would rest upon the mutation, and the perishability of even friends, and this consideration would leave a sadness and a desolation in the heart, which nothing but the consciousness that God is present, could prevent reaching there. And so it is with every individual upon whom this truth has its proper influence. He may even feel that he is "troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." Fortune may frown upon him, and the riches of earth take to themselves wings and fly away, but his trust has not been in them, but in the God who seeth him in all his reverses. Earth may look dark, and her sons may frown upon him, but his hope<sup>s</sup> are anchored in heaven, and from thence his God looks upon him with complacency and love. He may have wandered from the path of rectitude, but when he returns, he again feels that the same eye that watched the prodigal in his wanderings, is beholding him penitent and humbled as he flies to his Father. Loved ones may be cut down by the relentless hand of death; but though they are snatched away from his sight, they can not go where God's presence is not. Thus is the Christian's purest desire gratified, in the consciousness that he is not friendless and alone in the world. He knows that God has watched him with a Father's eye, in prosperity and adversity, in health and in sickness; and having thus tried and witnessed the faithfulness of his God, insured to him by what is passed, he stands upon the borders of the grave, firm and unmoved by the prospect of death, and launches upon its cold stream, exclaiming in the fulness of his soul, "yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." A. R. B.

OUR CAUSE IN MICHIGAN.

An esteemed correspondent in Ionia, Michigan, writes to us:—

"Our friends here are very much in want of a preacher. Although we have a healthy, pleasant and fertile country, possessing every natural advantage, with a number of flourishing villages, and a rapidly increasing population, yet there has never to my knowledge, a preacher of the Gospel in its purity, visited this part of Michigan; while we have multitudes of Partialists of almost every denomination, who are making use of every means to establish and perpetuate their cheerless and soul-withering doctrines.

"There is a large number of intelligent, practical and zealous Universalists in this town and vicinity, who are anxious to have a preacher located here, and have taken considerable pains to procure one but without success. A meeting was held here last fall for that purpose, and a subscription was drafted and circulated, to which about one hundred and fifty dollars were subscribed, and probably considerably more could have been obtained. Our friends in the town of Maple, adjoining this, say they will raise one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars; and I am informed that our friends in the town of Portland have now subscribed nearly one hundred dollars, and will raise more, if necessary. I have no doubt, therefore, that by preaching in the above named places, and perhaps delivering occasional lectures in other places, a minister would receive a handsome compensation without going out of the county, and would be the means of doing much good. We want a man of good character, good natural talents, and well qualified to preach and defend the doctrine. Respectfully Yours, OSMOND TOWER."

Some months ago we were delighted to hear that our well known and able correspondent, "Philo Paidon," "Author of notes on Sacred Subjects," "A. S." "S. S." etc., had entered the ministry of reconciliation. He is known also, to the readers of the Expositor, as "T. C. A." Br. Stacy who is personally, and by report, well acquainted with him, wrote to us that his first sermons were of a high order, and delivered in superior manner, to the great delight of the congregation at Ann Arbor, with which church he has connected himself as a communicant. Dr. T. C. Adam is a native of Scotland, was educated in the University of Edinburgh, and resigns the medical profession, in which he is an able practitioner, for the ministry, for which he is well qualified by a long course of theological reading and study. He has, (by the urgent persuasions of Father Stacy, addressed to both parties, with a disinterested zeal for the cause which knows no obstacles as invincible,) received and accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the church and society in Ann Arbor, the seat of the University of Michigan, where his talents and education will have full scope for usefulness in the spread of Universalism. May God make him, indeed, "a burning and a shining light" in our Zion, and abundantly reward and support the "good old man, eloquent" who has been the means of locating him there, by casting his lot in his declining years in another circle of as warm and admiring friends as that which he is now about leaving.

Br. Stacy in his last letter mentions the following accessions to the ministry in that region—D. K. Lee, Ann Arbor, (known to our readers by some excellent poetic articles furnished for our columns,) and John S. Porter, of Richland. May God cause their bow to abide in strength, and make them useful instruments in winning many to truth and righteousness. A. B. G.

REPROACH ON THE DEAD REMOVED.

CONCORD, Erie Co., Pa., April 4, 1840.

BR. BEEBE.—We have noticed in the Universalist Magazine and Advocate, of the 15th Nov. 1839, the death of our beloved brother, Ichabod Blakeslee, which stated in part as follows:

"Towards the close of his life, his faith in God's love supplied the deficiency in his narrow creed, although he was not an avowed Universalist."

We understand, from the language made use of by the writer, that Br. Blakeslee believed the doctrine of Universalism to be true, yet would not confess it publicly. This, therefore, is to certify, that he was not such a character as above represented, but was greatly opposed to the doctrine, and would not let any of it have a place within his heart; for, previous to his death, he said that the Lord had made a Baptist of him, and the Devil could not make a Universalist of him; and also, when he was breathing his last, he said, No Universalist could feel as he did. He would often, at this time, exhort his brethren and friends to shun every appearance of the deadly poison and snare, that would tend to draw them into the iron grasp of the enemy. His daily walk and conversation showed that he was not tinged in the least with the doctrine of Universalism, but his firmness in the profession he had made.—During the summer, the joy and happiness he manifested in the religion of Jesus was great, and still increased to the last. Although his sickness was short and painful, he bore it with Christian patience, and often said he was going home; until, we hope and trust, he fell asleep in the arms of Jesus. By the request of his family, and for the cause of Christ and the church of God, we present this for publication, which we would humbly ask, and desire you to give it a place in your columns.

Done by order and in behalf of the church.

SILAS GRAY, Clerk.

REMARKS.—We copy the foregoing from the Baptist Register of this city. Of course, we know nothing concerning the deceased, or of his last moments, save what was communicated to us in the Obituary notice referred to. That notice was written by Br I. B. Sharp at the request of the widow of the deceased, who, it must be admitted, is as likely to know what Mr. Blakeslee's dying words and views were, as the Clerk of the church can be.

As to the "reproach" of believing in God's universal love, Paul and Timothy rejoiced to bear it, though our partialist brethren would remove it if in their power. "For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe." 1 Tim. iv: 10. And if they thus suffered reproach, we are willing to bear the same reproach at this day. And when all men "know even as they are known," we believe Mr. Blakeslee will hardly consider it a reproach to have thus believed, if he did not so believe—a reproach still greater.

In the very paper from which we copy the above notice, there are a number of sayings and anecdotes of Robert Hall, the great Baptist preacher, of England, lately deceased. Among them is his remark in favor of the Episcopal Liturgy, as follows. "One petition it involves, embracing to my mind the very essence of Christ's teaching, and breathing the impress of Christ's spirit—that it may please God to have mercy upon all men." This is very good for our Baptist brethren, as a prayer; but to say that one of them died with an increasing faith in the doctrine here prayed for, is a "reproach on the dead," which they endeavor to remove! Oh, consistency, where shall we find thee? Now let the reader look at the notice of the Baptist Clerk—what does it say of the deceased? Any thing that manifests his belief in endless sin and wo? Any thing that shows a decrease of faith in the love of God, or the salvation of Jesus? Any expression proving that his narrow creed was rendered still narrower in his mind? I tell you, Nay. His dying hopes, and consolations, and joys, prove that he must have been sustained by something else than a belief in the endless sin and endless misery of a great portion of the human family. True, they represent him as denying that a Universalist could die thus; but we know that real Universalists do thus die.

But enough—we give their statement for what it is worth; if false, the widow of the deceased may deem it her duty to correct the corrector, and fasten on him a worse "reproach" than that of believing in God's universal goodness—if correct, it is but fair that our readers, who have seen the original notice, should also see the correction, however insulting the ignorance of its writer respecting Universalists and Universalism, may have led him to make its insinuations. WOMAN VS. LADIES.—Upon this text the Bangor Whig thus discourses:

"We enter our protest against calling any female, high or low born, thrumming a piano, or frying doughnuts, married or single, a lady. If, however, any females are known as ladies, let them be such as are useless, and vain, and silly.

"Who are praised in scripture for the blessings and comforts they confer upon men? Women. Who bathed the feet of Jesus and dried them with her hair? Woman. Who was first at the sepulchre of the Son of God? Women. "Ladies," if such things then existed, never engaged in such high and holy duties. It was the women thus honorably noticed, and the term is, and must forever be, an honorable one in point of character, and a rich one in point of language."

The foregoing has been going the rounds, about long enough—it is time it was nailed to the counter—so we have cut it out of an exchange paper, and pasted it on this sheet with a wafer, and will proceed to show that some people who undertake to meddle with Scripture for all kinds of purposes, only expose their ignorance in doing so. Ladies are ranked among the wise, in Judges v: 29, "Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she answered herself." The word ladies occurs in no despicable sense, in Esther i: 18. When the "daughter of the Chaldeans" was degraded and deposed from her high and honorable estate, Isaiah said, "Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called, the lady of kingdoms . . . . And thou saidest, I shall be a lady forever," etc. Isa. xlviii: 5, 7. And who, I ask the editor of the Bangor Whig—who is named in the Scriptures with more respect and affection, than she, whom the beloved disciple calls the "elect lady?" Hear him—"The elder unto the elect lady and her children, whom I love in the truth, and not I only, but also all they that have known the truth . . . . And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another." 2d John i: 5.

The truth is, ladies are women—and all well behaved, intelligent females are ladies, in our day, and probably were so considered in Scripture times. But most particularly are they ladies whose practice is in accordance with the origin of the word. In good old Anglo-Saxon times, the mistress of the palace, castle, mansion, or hut, prepared and dealt out with her own fair hands the provisions of her household and guests. The manufacture and division of the loaf, or leff, was particularly her province—and the breaking and dealing of it around, day by day, led to her being called the leff-day, from whence our modern English term, LADY. May every wife and mother, and every female head of a household, in our beloved country, richly merit, and proudly wear the title of lady by her daily deeds, the Bangor Editor to the contrary, notwithstanding. #### NEWS DEPARTMENT.

At a Conference held in Waterville, Maine, April 22d, a society was formed "to aid in the promotion of religious and general knowledge"—"to exercise a careful watch over the educational movements of the country, so as to counteract the influences of sectarianism," and encourage the liberal schools in our country. It is called "The Universalist Educational Association." W. C. George, of Dresden, Secretary.

A new society of Universalists was formed last month in Annsville, Oucida county. Considerable attention to the cause has been excited in that town and vicinity, and meetings are sustained once a month, at present, at Taberg in that town. If the friends in Lee would awake properly, they could settle a preacher in that neighborhood.

Br. Abram Paige was ordained to the pastoral charge of the Society in West Brattleboro', Vermont. Sermon by Br. J. W. Bailey. The neat brick meeting-house, owned by our friends there, was completely filled during this and the other services of the day.

A Protestant Methodist preacher, named Atkinson, in Cincinnati, Ohio, has embraced and commenced preaching Universalism. He was highly prized by his denomination, and his conversion has occasioned considerable excitement there. Two young preachers in that vicinity have also just commenced their labors in the ministry—Br. J. C. Miller, and Br. W. Dean, lately of this State, and a graduate of Union College.—May they prosper the good cause, and be prospered.

Br. S. Brimblecom, late of Danvers, has agreed to settle with the society in Barre, Massachusetts.

Br. Jerome Harris has removed from Danville, Vermont, to Lebanon, New Hampshire.

THE UNIVERSALISTS GUIDE.

Will Br. Whittemore accept my thanks for a copy of the Universalist's Guide, which he sent me? I acknowledge the book is worth more than thanks, but "I'll owe him" the rest, and make good use of the book for interest. It is not often—this was not expected—that publishers have the means, or the memory, to search up an obscure laborer in this way, and hence Br. W's. favor is most gratefully received.

A word to the reader. I have read the above work through carefully, and I am certain that if your judgment and mine, are any where within gun shot of each other, you will like it. It contains a clear and well sustained statement of our faith and the duties connected therewith. Some may dissent from Br. W's. views on some points, though I have found nothing essentially at variance with my own feelings. To the student and preacher, it will be an excellent reference book, while all kinds of readers will find it careful to state all objections in their strongest light, and powerful in sustaining the truth. Reader, buy it, read it, and lend it to your opposing neighbors. It will do you and them good. A. R. B.

THE N. Y. STATE CONVENTION.

We should have stated earlier, that Br. K. Townsend, of Newark, was appointed to deliver the occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute. The ministers and delegates, on their arrival, will call at Br. Hutchinson's book-store, 41 Genesee street, where they will be directed to places provided for their reception. A. B. G.

P. S. I have been so unfortunate as to mislay my copy of the rules for business adopted at the last session, and may not be able to find it in time. Any person having a copy, will much oblige me by sending it to me by mail, immediately. A. B. G.

GRACE.

BY T. C. WORDEN,

"For by grace are ye saved." Eph ii: 8th.

'Twas grace that moved the Fathers love,
To send the Saviour from above,
To heal the maladies of sin,
And nations to his glory win.

'Tis grace that heals the aching breast,
And gives the weary pilgrim rest;
Which bids the streams of mercy flow,
And sheds a balm for every wo.

And grace proclaims in tones of peace,
That sin and sorrow yet must cease,
And man enjoy an endless rest,
In the bright regions of the blest.

'Tis grace reveals to fallen man,
The fulness of the gospel plan;
Assures him that the world will share,
God's kind provisions and his care.

And grace unveils the ample field,
Where heaven her choicest blessings yield;
Where glory sheds its cheering rays,
And angels sing their Maker's praise.

Grace will present the human race
Before Jehovah's smiling face,
Where they will mingle round his throne,
And Christ the friend of sinners own.

We have long wished to give our readers some of the beauties, some of the excellent things which are to be found in the works composing the Massachusetts School Library, published by Marsh, Capen, Lyon, and Webb. The extract which follows is a part (all we have room for) of the Sunday reflections commencing the sixth week of Summer, volume three of "The Seasons," and ninth volume of the series. We believe it will please our readers, and perhaps it may induce them to examine the Library as fast as it shall be published.

THE INVISIBLE ARCHITECT.

Let us suppose that a skillful navigator, who ploughed the deep five hundred years ago, had taken soundings, and laid down accurate charts of the Southern Pacific, so that no islet, no shoal, no dangerous sunken rock, had failed to be noted by him. Let us farther suppose him returned now to his ancient occupation, and afloat on his familiar waters. It would not be the new inventions about his modern-rigged vessel, the skill in taking observations from the heavens, not even the occasional apparition of a ship propelled by steam, and rolling its wheels upon the unstable floor, that would most amaze him. He would gaze around on leagues, where wave succeeding wave was all that ere while met his vision, and behold islands in which active tribes now dwell under the shade of full grown palms, and around whose swelling headlands the many peopled canoes dart in all the activity of commerce; islets where the young cocoanut already unfolds its leaves, and groups uncounted of flat green spots just emerging from the waters; and in places over which his ancient bark had sailed in safety, he might see and hear the foaming breaker, indicating that some new obstacle has arisen to impede the long roll of ocean, and to warn the mariners of the reef that lurks below. "Whence come all these?" cries the astonished sailor. "Has some star been shivered, and dropped its beautiful fragments into the sea, that was once so unbroken in its solitude? Have volcanic fires been at work to heave up these blooming islands? Has some genius of mischief built these leagues of submarine dike, to work the doom of many a gallant vessel?"

Thou mayest inquire, thou ancient man, but the architect of all these fair islets will give thee no reply. Thou mayest resume thy plummetline, and take anew thy bearings, and again form an accurate chart for the guidance of thy fellows, and then go sleep again; and when again five centuries have come and gone, thou mayest return; and then peradventure these islands will be formed into one vast continent, of which these dangerous reefs will constitute the noble promontories, and still around its coasts will have arisen new islets and new reefs; and smiling dwelling places, thronged with human beings, shall arise where now the white waves curl upon the briny waters. "But" says the incredulous man of the seas, "will God descend and resume the work of creation, that all this may be brought to pass?" No: the Creator will not resume his creation work. He will only continue to exercise his preserving power, and his architects will accomplish all this. "Still the architect appears not: who and where is he?" He is a mason who not only uses stone for his building, but produces them. He knows nothing of mortar or of cement, and yet his walls are as adamant. He has neither plane, nor chissel, nor trowel; there is no sound of hammer in his city. He erects edifices loftier than the Pyramids, yet has no mechanical power by which to raise his rocks to their summits. He can answer thee nothing;—no tongue, no eyes, no hands, no brains, has he, yet from the caves of old ocean has he raised that, which fills you with admiration. Let me describe him, that you may admire with me the wonderful work of God.

He is a being scarcely belonging to the animal creation, a minute pouch of organized matter, with no organs, save a few tentacles surrounding his mouth; yet with these he is able to secrete calcareous particles from food collected amid the waters, and to transpire or re-gurgitate them so as to construct a limestone house. He is also empowered perpetually to send forth germs that repeat the same action; and thus in process of time, by the combined efforts of millions, are groups of islands built up in the midst of the fluctuating ocean, which eventually arrive at the climax of their purpose, by becoming the abode of man himself.

Here is indeed a marvellous edifice and an invisible architect,—a process continually advancing unaided and unnoticed by the world. But there is a more mysterious edifice, which has been in progress for six thousand years—an edifice permanent and beautiful, of which the world takes no account, would you see it? It is but in fragments here. Its chief, its foundation stone was long since cut out of the mountain, without hands. The living stones with which its walls are built, are hewn and fitted in the quarry: all their irregularities being there smoothed away, all their rough places broken off, they are polished and rendered beautiful before they are removed to be placed in the walls of that living temple of which Solomon's was but a feeble type.

But what, ask you, is this noble temple? And where is the busy quarry out of which its stones are hewn? Reader, it is "God's building!" The world is the quarry; you are, perhaps, yourself, or at all events you may, if you will, become, one of those living stones, built up into a spiritual house. Have you ever been moulder under the warnings or invitations of the word of life? It is because the Master Builder has shed an effusion over the stone of your hard heart, and thus prepared, it has yielded to the hand of the Workman. Has conscience become quickened by the power of conviction and rent off some darling sin? Then was a visible alteration produced in the surface of the stone. Has calamity broken away some inveterate evil, and left you suffering, but ductile and praying, "Lord what wilt thou have me to do?" Then may you well believe that you are in the hands of the Workman, and that the process of fitting you for the spiritual building is going on in earnest. Take heed to it, watch over it, pray over it, lest the work be impeded, and the master Builder cease to apply his forming hand to you. Muse much upon that living temple. Its foundation is laid in atoning blood—blood shed for many; and why not for you? Salvation it has for walls and bulwarks; and there all the saved shall find their appropriate place. But if the builders of the temple on Mount Zion would have rejected a stone, whose proportions or whose polish failed to suit the designed place, how much more will the Holy One reject from among his living stones, any one whose dispositions and whose delights are unsuited to the heavenly edifice! In Christ Jesus, himself being the chief corner stone, is all the building fully framed together, and growth unto a holy temple in the Lord; in whom all who love him are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit.

The work is silent, the world heeds it not; or if it hear, believes not in its reality; or again, if its reality is forced upon its conviction, it puts forth impious hands to pluck it down. But the building grows apace. The eye of God is not withdrawn from his designed and glorious habitation. If each stone of that wondrous work is "living," each instinct with the conscious presence and approbation of the Deity, each a temple for the Holy Spirit to inhabit, what must the grand, united and completed temple be? Let not your heart die within you at the thought, as if you never could have an assigned place there. The scarcely living coral insect erects many a palace in the fathomless deep, because his Creator aids him; he applies his powers to that for which they are designed, and prospers; and will not God prosper you, when you apply yourself to do that for which you were bought with a price, namely, to glorify Him in your body and in your spirit which are his?"

A SEA-STORM—BY T. S. FAY.

A tornado at sea! It struck us in the afternoon abruptly as we were speeding on, luckily with all our sails close reefed, through a warm but gloomy rain, at nine knots. We were on the edge of the Gulf stream, and took the full benefit of what the sailors called the butt-end of a north-wester. The rise of this whirlwind was instantaneous. It had been blowing pretty stiff all day, when suddenly I saw the fore and main top-sail carried away, and a wave burst into the round-house and rolled backward and forward, there leaving us all nearly knee-deep in water. In an instant the wind was—not blowing—but bursting over the vessel in a rapid series of explosions, each one like water forced violently from the spout of an engine. The sea and air were foam to the top-mast. The ship lying over low, her gunwale under water, her deck scattered with pieces of broken bulwarks and great fragments of sail, ropes, spars, and entire blocks flying off and up upon the gale. The sounds exceeded all I had ever imagined; a mingled and fierce crash; thunder, whirl and tumult almost beyond conception. The masts bent like willow wands. The noise resembled those of some tremendous conflagration, the roar of broad flames and the crash of beams, roofs, walls and timber. There is, indeed, a similitude between the extreme fury of fire and water when those elements attain mastery. Above our heads sail, blocks, and cables loosened and rent, were hurled up and down again upon the roof of the round-house. It is not possible for one unacquainted with the sea to conceive fully the phenomena of such a scene. The wind is there a new and appalling power, or rather a fiend omnipotent and infernal. It breaks in volumes and audible billows over your head; producing sounds which seem like the conflict of unseen demons in the air. Each separate part of the rigging in motion, the huge fabric strained to its utmost tension; ropes, waves, sails, spars, cables, chains, blocks, doors, beams instinct with the phrensy of nature. We were deafened with the slamming, banging, cracking, crashing, snapping, splitting, flouting, roaring, thundering. It seemed impossible that such fearful noises could be produced except from the crushing to pieces of planks and timber. Each moment as I turned my eyes from the masts I thought I heard them go, and could scarcely credit my sight that they were not yet gone. The prominent feature of this hour is the noises. In addition to the full thunder of the sea and wind, a thousand whips cracking, a thousand masts breaking, a thousand doors banging, a thousand planks splitting—all together—all with the most incessant, persistent, intense violence and rapidity. It was a madness, a delirium of the elements, a paroxysm, an ecstasy of rage and ruin.

If the surrounding scene was appalling, its horrors were not decreased by that more near us. The round-house continued to be swept by the deep surges which rolled to and fro across the floor. We had in vain endeavored to persuade the ladies to go below. Every heart quailed before the gigantic madness of nature. Most of the females abandoned hope utterly. One was terrified to a calmness that made me shudder. Poor Sophia was sometimes on her knees in prayer and sometimes in actual convulsions. Cries of "Oh heavens! what's gone now? There go the masts. Is there any hope?" were all that was said. Of us gentlemen, I can only say we were all decently still and most thoroughly frightened. It was terrible to behold the sailors aloft on the yard endeavoring to furl the fragments of a sail, the mast bent frightfully, and each moment I looked to see the men whirled off upon the air. After raging for two hours, the tornado subsided to such a gale as would have of itself alarmed us at any other time. I went into the cabin. Every thing was overturned, broken, drenched, desolate. Tired, sleepy, sick, hungry; my eyeballs burn; I am beaten out and exhausted. Ah, people ashore how faintly you feel your blessings! —Mirror.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION—No X.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"For all live unto Him."

There are some who hold that the spirit of man dies with the body, so that all which constitutes man what he is, dies at death; and that all mankind thus die, and will remain dead till some period yet future, when all shall be brought to life, and each furnished with a body. This doctrine I deem erroneous, and that for many reasons; one only of which will be particularly insisted upon in this place.

In Exodus, 3d chapter, we read that the Lord appeared to Moses, and a voice came to him, saying, "I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." In the New Testament, we are told that Jesus, in conversation with the Sadducees, made use of this incident to show them the falsity of their doctrine, which, according to Josephus, was, that the souls of men die with their bodies.* "Have ye not," said the Saviour, "read in the book of Moses, how in the bush, God spake unto him, saying, 'I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?'" He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err." Mark xii: 26, 27. The doctrine of our Lord here, is obviously this, that at the time God spoke to Moses, the three patriarchs mentioned, though their bodies had been dead for years, were as truly in existence as they were while living among men on the earth, else it would not have continued to be a fact that God was their God; since it is a perfectly plain case, that a being which does not exist, is incapable of having a God, or indeed anything else. It is proved then, from the Scriptures, that three individuals of mankind, (and probably four, for Moses's father is also mentioned,) were alive a long time after the death of the body; we claim, therefore, that the doctrine under examination is disproved by facts.

I know of but few passages of Scripture which can be brought in proof of this doctrine with any show of applicancy. It is indeed said, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die;" but I presume this text will not be cited, for it is obvious that the word soul here means person, and that the death which is here denounced is that which is the wages of sin. The person that sins will surely "die in his sins," and of course be "dead in sins," and that too "in the day that he sinneth," as the Scriptures abundantly teach.

It is also said in the Scriptures, that "man dieth;" and as the word man may include in its meaning both body and mind, it may be thought that this passage teaches the doctrine of total death. But it is proper to observe, that the passage reads, "man dieth, and wasteth away." Job xiv: 10. Now does the writer here mean that the mind or spirit dies with the body? If so, he must mean also, that the mind, after it is dead, wasteth away with the body—that the body and mind both die, and that both are afterwards gradually dissolved. A strange doctrine this. Yet the literal death of the mind, soul, or spirit, is no more certainly taught here, than is its gradual dissolution after such death. And to believe that the mind is susceptible of such a dissolution, in such circumstances, is to believe that the mind is in philosophical reality, a compound of organized matter, like the body, a dogma which few are prepared to swallow. I therefore conclude that man is here spoken of only so far as he is visible and tangible—that the passage affirms only the death of the body, and its subsequent dissolution—that it relates to death and its effects, only so far as these are cognizable by the senses.

But the latter half of the verse claims a moment's attention, both on the account that it has been quoted in proof of the doctrine of total death, and because that, according to the parallelism of Hebrew poetry, the two members of the sentence explain each other. The whole reads thus:

"But man dieth, and wasteth away:

Yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?"

To die, in the first line, is the same as giving up the ghost or spirit in the second; and as that which yields up the spirit, is evidently not the spirit, therefore, that which "dieth" is not the spirit. The question in the second line, "where is he?" is not a call for information, but is equivalent to the affirmation, He is not, and corresponds to the phrase in the first line, "wasteth away;" and as it is evidently the body that wastes away, so it is the body, or in other words, the man so far as he is visible and tangible, respecting which it is asked "where is he?"—the implied answer to which, is, He is gone, he is wasted away, he is not.

Job continues: "As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised up out of their sleep." If in this passage he has reference to an hereafter mode of being, then he certainly affirms, in opposition to the Christian Scriptures, that there is not, and will not be any resurrection at all. But I do not so understand him—I think he merely affirms, in opposition to the doctrine of transmigration, that when a man is dead, he lives no more here—that death is a perpetual sleep, so far as concerns living again in this world. And that this is really his meaning appears also from the manner in which he introduces the subject: "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again. . . . But man dieth and wasteth away: . . . [he adds in conclusion] man lieth down, and riseth not up." Job xiv: 7—12.

It is freely admitted that the Scriptures nowhere say that the soul or spirit of man is immortal; and it is also a fact that it is not said in that book, that the soul or spirit is incorruptible. But as no one would infer from the latter fact that the spirit may have a "fever sore;" so I, for one, do not infer from the former fact that the spirit may literally die.

Our next number will be on another point of doctrine; but a weighty objection will be therein presented against the doctrine examined in this.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED

BY REV W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION V.

The Shepherd's visit the Infant Saviour.

LUKE II: 8 And there were in the same country, shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night.

9 And lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid.

10 And the angel said unto them, Fear not; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

11 For unto you is born, this day, in the city of David, a Saviour which is Christ the Lord

12 And this shall be a sign unto you, ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

13 And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, 14 Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men.

15 And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us.

16 And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger.

17 And when they had seen it they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child.

18 And all they that heard it wondered at those things, which were told them by the shepherds.

19 But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart.

20 And the shepherds returned glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

LUKE II: 8. Keeping watch. This was intended to protect the flock either from the wild beasts that infested the country, (John x: 12,) or from the more dangerous banditti that lived by theft and plunder. See Josephus Ant. B. 14, ch. 15, sec. 5, and also Job i: 15—17, and John x: 10.

10. Fear not. As human beings, it was natural that the shepherds should be agitated by fearful emotions, though, in reality, there was no just occasion for alarm. In the same manner, "it is a fearful (though not, as some suppose, dangerous) thing to fall into the hands of the living God." Heb. x: 31. Good men may fear, when there is, in truth, no danger; so may all men.

11. City of David. Bethlehem was called the city of David, because David was born, and spent the early part of his life there.

14. In the highest. Among the Highest Beings, would express the sense of the original more accurately; for two classes of beings were evidently intended to be included in this verse. The language "and on earth," contains a clear intimation that beings not on earth were previously referred to, by the expression in the highest (Greek, en apsisiois.) The birth of the Saviour was an occasion of glory among the angels in heaven, and of peace and good will, among men on earth.

Jesus circumcised and named.

LUKE II: 21 And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, his name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb.

LUKE II: 21 Circumcision. The Jews circumcised their children at the age of eight days.—See Gen. xvii: 2, they named them at the same time. See Luke i: 57.

The Magians visit the infant Saviour.

MATT. ii: 1 Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod, the king, behold there came wise men from the East to Jerusalem.

2 Saying, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the East, and are come to worship him.

3 When Herod, the king, heard these things he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.

4 And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born.

5 And they said unto him, in Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet,

6 And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Judea, art not the least among the princes of Judea: for out of thee shall come a governor that shall rule my people, Israel.

7 Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently, what time the star appeared.

* See Antiquities of the Jews, B. XVIII, chap. i: sec. 3.

8 And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, go and search diligently for the young child and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also.

9 When they had heard the king, they departed, and lo, the star which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.

10 When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.

11 And when they had come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts, gold, frankincense and myrrh.

12 And being warned of God in a dream, that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

REMARKS.—We have placed the visit of the shepherds to the Saviour, and also the Saviour's circumcision, before the visit of the Magians, because to the careful student of the Bible, it will be obvious that such was the order of time in which these events occurred. For the benefit of others to whom this may not be at first obvious, I will state the reasons for supposing that the events occurred in the order of time that we have represented them. First. The shepherds were in the same country where Jesus was born, (Luke ii: 8,) whereas the Magians (or wise men, which should have been rendered Magians) were from the east, that is, from some country east of Judea: and the former went immediately to Bethlehem, after the Saviour's birth was announced; while the Magians had a long journey to perform, and were hindered by Herod for an indefinite period before they came to Bethlehem. Again: the shepherds found the Saviour in the manger, (Luke ii: 16,) before he had been removed to any house; but the Magians found him in a house. (Matt. ii: 11.) That his circumcision, as well as the visit of the shepherds, also took place before the Magians reached Bethlehem, is probable from the length of the journey they had to perform, and the preparation to perform it, and their stay at Jerusalem while Herod could assemble and consult the chief priests and scribes, which would be likely to employ as many as eight days. We will now proceed with our comments.

Matt. ii: 1. Bethlehem of Judea. This designation was necessary to distinguish the place of the Saviour's birth, from another Bethlehem that belonged to the Philistines. Respecting both these places, see Judges xvii: 7. Gen. xlviii: 7. Micah v: 2. Ruth i: 2. 1 Sam. xvii: 12. Josh. xix: 15.

Herod the king. See the notes on Luke i: 5. Wise men. The original (Magoi) more properly denotes the name of a certain religious sect which we commonly call the Magians. By rendering the term wise men, the idea is conveyed that the persons designated were men of superior wisdom, whereas there is no certainty that such was the fact. The sect denoted by this title, embraced many that were far from being remarkably wise. As the Gnostic sect, at a subsequent date, (whose name means knowing) had among them as much ignorance as any other sect, so the Magians embraced as much foolishness as many others that assumed a less pompous title. The Magians mentioned in this verse, might have been wise men, and they might not; as God more often employs the foolish things of the world to accomplish his purposes, than he does those that are more excellent. Among the Magians were many Jews, some of whom retained a knowledge of the true God, and of the Jewish Scriptures, and who, like Simeon, waited for the promised Messiah. To these a miraculous appearance, resembling a star, would be an indication of the Messiah's advent, and would naturally lead them to Judea in search of that illustrious personage.

3. Troubled. The term here rendered troubled, denotes excited feelings, connected either with hope or fear. Herod was doubtless really troubled; but the Jews were influenced by very different feelings. See Parkhurst on the word tarrasso.

4. He demanded of them. Herod was a professor of the Jewish religion, but was too ignorant of the Jewish Scriptures, to know where the Saviour was to be born. Hence he gathers the chief priests and scribes together to obtain of them the desired information.

Chief priests. "That is not only the high priest for the time being, and his deputy, with those who had formerly borne the high priest's office; but also the chiefs or heads of the twenty four sacerdotal families, which David distributed into as many courses. 1 Chron. xxiv."—Parkhurst.

Scribes. These were doubtless the public teachers of the people, and were supposed to be well acquainted with the Scriptures. The word may also denote men of learning in general.

6. And thou Bethlehem etc. The prophecy here referred to is found in Micah v: 2, and reads quite differently from the language of this verse; from which (and numerous other instances) we discover that the writers of the New Testament, in quoting from the Old, do not always quote verbatim. They merely express what they understood to be the sense of the passage quoted.

7. Diligently. Accurately would be more correct.

9. It came and stood over, etc. It is thought by some that the star or luminous appearance encircled the brow of the child—but this is mere conjecture.

11. They presented unto him gifts. This was done to show respect for the infant king of the Jews; and not because the child could be essentially benefited by the gifts presented. It is a common practice even at the present day in those countries, for persons, visiting kings or other distinguished men, to carry with them some present, as a token of respect to the person visited.

Frankincense. "A resinous substance produced from a tree growing in the east, particularly in Arabia."—Parkhurst. Myrrh. "A vegetable production of the gum or resin kind, issuing by incision, and sometimes spontaneously, from the trunk and larger branches of a tree growing in Egypt, Arabia and Abyssinia."—Parkhurst.

HEARING OF THE WORD.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.

"Take heed therefore how ye hear." Luke viii: 18.

CHAPTER I.

That there is much depending on the state of mind and feeling with which we listen to the divine word, and the object we have in view in hearing; a moment's reflection will make evident. Though there are many, undoubtedly, who make the Bible a careful study at home, and who devote other periods than that of the Sabbath to devout religious meditation; yet, those who are thus true to their duty, and especially those who neglect it, receive a great share of the religious influences that may affect them, through the medium of public religious exercises. These, as the apostle said of faith, "come by hearing;" and hence the importance of the injunction quoted at the head of this chapter, "take heed, therefore, how ye hear."

After delivering to the multitude, the parable of the sower, in which the Saviour evidently designed to set forth the effects which the hearing of his Gospel would produce upon different individuals, according as they were more or less prepared to receive it; he unfolds more fully his meaning to his disciples, and closes with this emphatic requisition; which I view as affording a suitable theme for serious and candid reflection at the present time. I am satisfied that there are some considerations connected with it, which, could I succeed in setting them forth in their proper light, would, were they realized, serve to correct some deplorable evils, into which, if I do not greatly err, many hearers of the present day have fallen. There are undoubtedly, many objects that induce individuals to attend meetings, the nature of which they never perhaps think of inquiring into, or make the subject of a moment's reflection; and which, could they be prevailed on to carefully consider, they would at once pronounce utterly unworthy a follower of Christ. Some of the more prominent, I propose to notice briefly in the few following chapters. Let me premise, however, that my remarks will be designed for readers as well as hearers, and I respectfully request all who may give them a perusal, to enquire carefully of their own consciences whether their practical application can regard themselves.

Among the various classes into which they may be appropriately divided, I wish to call attention to that which I shall denominate,

I. Literary hearers.—I do not mean to include by this term, literary characters, or persons of a literary reputation; for many such are far from being of that kind to which we have reference. I mean simply, those whose great object in hearing, is the gratification of a literary taste. Such must have a preacher of a liberal education to begin with. No other could answer their purpose, however excellent he might be in other particulars. And then, too, he must preach literary sermons—he must select for his themes of discourse, chiefly, literary, scientific or philosophical subjects, and set the Gospel entirely aside. He must not attempt to preach any thing like religious doctrine, for that would be decidedly out of taste; it having become an old story. In short, to suit this class of hearers, his sermons must display much learning; his style must be polished and poetic; his periods rounded according to the most approved rules of rhetoric, and the whole must come off with a literary air and manner. Let it not be supposed that I look upon the literary qualifications of a preacher as a matter of indifference. Talents and education are essential aids to the public speaker, and unless he possesses them to some considerable extent, he ought by no means to enter upon the duties of that high office: but let it be distinctly understood, that they are essential as instruments only. They are to be used as aids in setting forth the Gospel, and not to be preached themselves. If the object of education is to assist the preacher in presenting clearly and forcibly the truths of Christ's doctrine and morality, the hearer may be justified in requiring that his teacher possess it; but if desired simply that he may make a display of it on other subjects, and show himself off as a learned man, or to enable him to preach literary, scientific, or philosophical discourses, it becomes an object utterly unworthy any Christian disciple. I would, by all means, have the truths of the Gospel illustrated, and enforced, by appropriate appeals to nature, science, or philosophy; but when these things become the object of discourse, and not the medium of conveying religious truths; the pulpit is desecrated, and its great design perverted. And those who attend meeting only to hear something of this kind, are certainly committing a most deplorable error. They might attend as profitably, in a religious point of view, attend a Lyceum, a debating club, a theatre, or sit down to the perusal of some literary journal. And I have no doubt that there are many in every community, who attend church on the Sabbath, with similar views and feelings to those which would actuate them in attending either of the places I have named, the gratification of a literary taste. But let all such remember that the sanctuary of worship is dedicated to a different object, and its exercises should have in view a far higher and holier purpose than this.

A THOUGHT ON THE JUDGMENT.

BY A FEMALE UNIVERSALIST.

I have observed that Paul said, "it is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the Judgment," and I learn from the 5th chapter of Romans, that death has passed upon all men, and judgment has come on all men unto condemnation. From the book of Genesis I learn that when Adam sinned, he died, and then came the judgment—the judgment was, that he must gain his bread by the sweat of his brow, and then return to dust. I think the serpent was cursed, by being doomed to live on the dust of the earth, and as the "carnal mind"—"or man of sin"—"is of the flesh," when the flesh, (which is the first Adam) returned to dust, will not our serpent nature return there also? When man is extracted from the flesh, will he not then be free from the dominion of the serpent, or satan? I think we need not look for the serpent nature (or devil) in any other place but in the dust or earthly nature, because to that he is confined by the power of Heaven, and will in due time be overcome and destroyed by Him—who has the power of LIFE, and the keys of the New Jerusalem.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXVI.

MATTHEW IV: 1. "Then was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil."

This transaction appears to have taken place immediately after Christ's baptism, and this bringing up of Christ was through the influence of the Spirit of God—that spirit which had rested upon him in his baptism. See Clark on the Gospels.

There have been various opinions respecting this transaction. Some have supposed that Jesus was tempted by a real personal being called the devil; but unless we admit that this being has the power of working miracles, this opinion can not be true. Others have supposed this to have been a vision, but it certainly appears to be a relation of fact.

If we allow that Jesus was tempted in all points like as we are, which the Scriptures declare, (see Hebrews, iv: 15,) then it will appear evident that all these temptations passed in the mind of Christ, and that this was only a trial of his faith, and virtue, and to put him on his guard against all temptations in future. The devil, or adversary here spoken of, is a personification of all kinds of evil desires, but Christ was without sin—sin consisting in giving way to temptation, not in being tempted. Christ resisted the devil, or temptation, and it or he fled from him. See James iv: 7.

It appears from reading this whole account that Jesus was tempted, 1st. To distrust God: "Command these stones to become bread," see verse 3. 2d. To presumption: "Cast thyself down," see verse 6. 3d. To worldly ambition: "All these will I give," see verse 9. 4thly. To Idolatry: "Fall down and worship me," see verse 9.

Chap. v: 22. "But whosoever shall say to his brother, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire," see the whole verse.

There are three kinds of offences here, which exceed each other in guilt. 1. Anger against a man. 2. Contempt expressed by the opprobrious epithet, Raca, or shallow brains. 3. Hatred and enmity, expressed by the term Moreh, or apostate.

Now proportioned to these three offences were three different degrees of punishment, viz:

1. The Judgment—the council of twenty three, which could inflict the punishment of strangling. 2. The Council—the Sanhedrin or great council, which could inflict the punishment of stoning. 3. The being burnt alive in the valley of the son of Hinnon, or Gehenna, translated hell. "This," says Dr. Adam Clarke, "was the meaning of our Lord."

Chap. xxiii: 5. "They make broad their phylacteries," etc., etc.

These were small slips of parchment or vellum, on which certain portions of the law were written. The Jews tied these about their foreheads and arms.

Verse 15. "Ye make him two fold more the child of hell than yourselves."

This was a Hebraism for an excessively wicked person. Justin Martyr observes that "the Jewish proselytes were abundantly more blasphemous, and greater persecutors of Christ and his followers, than themselves."

Chap. xxiii: 39. "For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

The light of the Gospel shall be hid from you until the fulness of the Gentiles is brought in, and so all Israel shall be saved. See Romans xi: 25, 26.

Chap. xxvii: 51. "And behold the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom."

That is, the vail which separated the holy place, where the priests ministered, from the holy of holies, into which the high priest alone entered once a year, to make a grand expiation for the sins of the people. This rending of the vail was emblematical, and pointed out that the separation between Jews and Gentiles was now abolished, and that the privilege of the high priest was now communicated to all mankind. All might henceforth have access to the throne of Grace.

INFANTS.

"Their natural unregenerate state is a state of alienation from God."

MOSES STUART.

"But what if a human being dies, before his moral nature is in any degree developed? I answer; if he exists in another state, he will doubtless act out his disposition there. As soon he has an opportunity, he will, if unrenowned, show himself to be a sinner, and will thus make it manifest, that his character was stamped for eternity by his descent from apostate Adam. The disposition certainly leading to sin, existed in him from the first; and it would have acted itself out in the present life, had opportunity been given. But the want of opportunity does not alter the disposition."

LEONARD WOODS, D. D.

"Infants are contaminated in their moral nature, and born in the likeness of apostate Adam."

DR. DWIGHT.

Corollary 1. If infants die, "alienated from God," they will remain so to all eternity unless some change takes place at or after death.

Corollary 2. If they die with a disposition "morally corrupt," some moral change must take place either in leaving, or when having left this world; else infants must ever remain with a disposition, or "propensity, morally corrupt."

Corollary 3. If they die as they are said to be born, "contaminated in their moral nature," and "in the likeness of apostate Adam," (and they must die so if they die at all,) then a renewing of the spirit—a moral renovation in the eternal world, is indispensable to infant salvation.

The question now arises, will there be a change morally at or after death?

I suppose it is useless to appeal to the Scriptures on this point, because the enquiry of the nineteenth century is not, what saith the Scriptures? but what says Professor such an one? St. Paul is thought to be of no great importance compared with "orthodox divines of all ages;" and I presume that if he had uttered the following sentences, they would not have half the weight they now will. These learned and great men have led us into the mire up to our necks. Let us now see how they will manage to get us out.

Prof. Stuart hopes all infants will be saved; but says, "if," (mark that) "if they are saved, they must have a taste" or "relish for the joys of heaven implanted in their souls." He then asks: "Is there nothing then which Christ by his Spirit can do for infants, in implanting such a taste?" This question relates to eternity, and it is impossible to mistake its meaning; for the same author maintains that they die "destitute of holiness," and need a "new heart."

But hear another oracle. I quote from Prof. Woods: "If regeneration takes place, which Professor Stuart, in common with all orthodox divines, represents as indispensable to salvation even in infancy; then the new-born child, dying before there is any opportunity to develop his renewed nature in moral exercises, will doubtless have a speedy opportunity to develop them after death, and will spontaneously love what is holy, and hate what is sinful." This language also has reference to an after death change. Verily, light is a dawning—learned men are in trouble; their hearts are at war with their heads, their heads are at war with their creeds, and their creeds are at war with their Bibles; and should a coalition be formed by the first and the last powers, I do predict that the time is not far distant when infants, at least, will be permitted to walk the sapphire courts of heaven in peace; and when learned men will dare speak what they think, not under a hypothesis or an interrogative shield; but in a plain honest and categorical manner. When this shall be, the Bible will be taken as the only rule of faith and practice, and self-styled "orthodox divines of all ages" will not be permitted to assume the infallibility of a "thus saith the Lord." Then, whether all men are born sinners or not, heretics will not be the only class who believe that St. Paul uttered the truth when he said they are raised, "immortal," "incorruptible," "glorious," and "spiritual" beings, not in the "image" of the earthly, but of the "heavenly" Adam. I make no pretensions to learning, but I do claim to be in possession of common sense, whether such has been the opinion of orthodox divines of all ages or not.

DIALOGUE,

Universalist, agreeably with his promise, visits his neighbor Partialist; is met at the door of the latter with a friendly shake of the hand, and a cordial reception; is invited into the parlour; both become seated and their previous conversation is resumed.

P.—I have been thinking much, the past week, of the conversation which we had last Monday at your house. And although you have accounted in some measure for those moral and social evils that have long deranged and oppressed human society, yet I am not fully convinced that a period will ever arrive, in time or eternity, when all evils will be entirely done away, and the whole human family "dwell together in unity." Such a consummation is certainly very desirable to every good and philanthropic heart; but there seem to be several declarations of holy writ which forbid the indulgence of such hope.

U.—Neighbor P., I admire that goodness of heart which prompts you to desire the happy and glorious result of the divine administration for which I am contending; and I think that desire may be enlarged and improved into a true Gospel hope, by a little careful and unprejudiced investigation of the Scriptures. Your heart is evidently right, and if there is any thing wrong in your religious views, I think it must be attributed to a difficulty in your head; and with your consent and co-operation, I stand ready to exert my feeble powers in administering to the removal of the obstructions that seem to block up your path to that conclusion which, you admit, is very desirable to all good hearts.

P.—Whether it be a disease of the heart, or head, or whether it be a disease at all, I am not certain; but I am certain, notwithstanding the desirableness of the conclusion at which you have arrived, relative to the ultimate and final condition of mankind universally, that I have strong doubts in relation to the truth of your conclusion. I do not, however, doubt the benevolence of your heart, or the sincerity of your belief in this matter.

U.—Well neighbor, I think you will admit that I have one advantage of a very valuable nature, of which you are deprived; which is this—of enjoying both the desire and the expectation of ultimately "Beholding how good and how pleasant it is for" all the "brethren" of the human family "to dwell together in unity;" whereas, you have the desire without the expectation. Those doubts of which you speak, being directly opposed to your benevolent desire, must constitute a very serious draw-back upon that moral happiness which you would evidently enjoy, were your doubts removed. And, as your benevolent desire, and your serious doubts, stand in diametrical opposition to each other, I think you will agree with me, that both can not be justified by the principles of the Gospel, and either your desire, or your doubts, should be at once dispensed with. Now which would you relinquish in order to increase your virtue, usefulness and happiness?

P.—I will be frank, and admit that you have "surrounded me," as an Indian said to a soldier on a certain occasion. But I am not much surprised; I have conversed with your sort of people before, and I believe they are quite celebrated for setting traps and drawing their opponents into them. But I am by no means angry. I would indulge no anxiety to maintain and perpetuate error. I am resolved on throwing aside all educational prejudice, and striving to ascertain the truth of God. But as I told you during our first interview, it is not so much my wish to answer questions as to hear them answered; for I am fully satisfied that a manly defence of my creed, requires talents much superior to mine.

U.—Brother, I can but admire the commendable spirit which you manifest, and it rejoices my heart to be informed of the excellent resolutions you have formed. But really, I think you have fallen into a mistake, though a very prevalent one, in charging us with "setting traps, and drawing our opponents into them." The fact is this—our opponents furnish and set the "traps" you speak of, and in spite of all we can say and do to prevent it, they will, blindly and heedlessly, get into them! And be assured neighbors, that there is no possible way of getting out, only by acknowledging the deformity of error, and embracing and glorying in heaven's eternal truth. I will not dwell upon this subject, but hear, if you please, some "question" which you wish to propose.

P.—Well Sir, leaving minor considerations, I would wish, as I remarked at the close of our former conversation, to learn on what authority you predicate your belief in the ultimate reconciliation, and unity, and happiness of the human race.

U.—In answer to this fair and important question, I would say that the authority upon which I predicate my belief, on the subject in question, is found in the principles of reason, and the declarations of Divine Revelation. Reason teaches her pupils that man did not create himself—that he derived his existence from a superior intelligence and power—that all mankind, possessing the same physical, intellectual and moral nature, derived their existence from the same source—that, as all came into the world without their own agency, or consent, and are removed from the world without being consulted at all in relation to the matter, they are dependent alone on their Creator—that man, being a rational, moral being, is susceptible of extensive mental and moral improvement—human happiness is graduated by knowledge and virtue; that intellectual beings bear the impress of the origin from which they spring; and though like streams issuing from a pure fountain, and becoming contaminated by the filth through which they progress, they have degenerated, and lost in a degree, the moral image of their Creator, they shall ultimately be restored and perfected in holiness, bliss and peace eternal.

P.—I admit that human reason would seem to teach that, as all men possess the same nature—are governed by similar moral laws—are all imperfect and sinful here, and wholly dependent on the grace of God for all moral as well as literal blessings, our eternal Creator will bring all at last to the same destination. But I have been taught to reject human reason in matters of religion, as being opposed to the truth of God's holy word.

U.—I am aware that you have been thus taught, and that, unfortunately, such is the prevalent opinion. But a more delusive error was never palmed upon a credulous world. The truth is, when, by the exercise of reason, we are led to the consistent conclusion which you have stated, and in which we perfectly agree, and are unable to progress any further, in obtaining a true knowledge of the nature, attributes, and perfections, of our unknown Creator, divine revelation steps in to our aid, and becomes a friendly guide through life's uneven journey. This heavenly instructor informs us that there is a God, who is the Almighty and affectionate Father of the spirits of all flesh—that he is eternally the same gracious and all-perfect as well as all-powerful Being—that he is infinitely and immutably wise, good, just and true—that "he is good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works." It also gives us the happy intelligence, that "there is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus," who "is the head of every man," the "the propitiation for the sins of the whole world," and "the Saviour of the world," who "tasted death for every man," and who "shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." Thus we are enabled to learn most clearly, our origin, our moral condition here, our relation to God, the object of a Saviour's mission, the high, and holy, and happy destiny which in the future world awaits us, and the efficient process by which we shall arrive at our final destination.

P.—This, then, is the authority on which you establish your belief in the final unity, peace, and joy of the world of mankind? Well, if it were not for some few things which I find in the Bible, that seem to contradict your conclusion, I might be induced to agree with you. But at present I am under the strong impression that the joyful result which you contemplate will never be realized. We know that there is much sin in the world, and we have some reason to conclude that moral evil will eternally continue to exist; for the time is coming when it shall be said, "He that is unclean and filthy, let him be unclean and filthy still; and he that is righteous and holy, let him be righteous and holy still." I do not suppose that unreconciliation, hatred, wrath and contention, will continue any longer than iniquity continues, for they are identically the same. Prove to me that there shall be an end of moral evil—iniquity—sin, and I will then be constrained to look more favorably upon your sentiments.

U.—Well, brother, I will endeavor to comply with your request. I have not given you a hundredth part of the direct testimony of Scripture that might be given, in proof of my faith. But for the present I will attend to the subject in the manner you require.

David says, "Let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end; but establish the just." Again he says, "Yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be." Again, the angel of God said unto Joseph, concerning the approaching Messiah, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." Again, John the Baptist said, "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world;" thus verifying the prediction, that he should save his people—the world of mankind, from their sins. Thus, it is proved that wickedness shall come to an end—that the wicked shall not be—that Jesus shall save his people from their sins, by taking away the sin of the world. Now sir, by your own agreement, you are bound to look something favorably upon my sentiments. But it is time we adjourned, though I should be happy to have you call again on me, and pursue the subject still further.

P.—I shall certainly avail myself of the privilege you have politely given me; for there are several threatenings in the Bible, which, notwithstanding your plausible arguments and apparent evidences, still forbid my embracing your views. There is a devil and a hell, and a judgment day, spoken of in the word of God, and if your doctrine be true, these must all be considered as useless things; and therefore I am anxious to hear what you have to offer upon these subjects. I must acknowledge that I am pleased with the conversation we have had, and think I may have received some benefit from it; but I am yet some distance from being a convert to your creed. I shall however, hold myself open to convictions of truth.

U.—Any time, neighbor P., that you can make it in your way, I should be happy to see you, and will do all I can to convince you of what I honestly consider as truth. As soon as it is convenient, we will attend particularly to the subjects you have mentioned. Perhaps I can dispose of them to your satisfaction. Exit U. J. C.

AFFAIRS IN NEWVILLE.

Bz. Grosh.—In the Lutheran Herald, a paper published at Fort Plain, an article appeared on the 16th of March past, by the Rev. S. Otman, giving an account of the successful result of a protracted meeting held at Newville, commencing on the last of January, and continued, or protracted, to near the middle of February last. And here I would say, that were it not for the erroneous, nay, false impressions to be made abroad by the article in question, I should have treated it with the contempt it merits, and received in this community, and left it to sleep in silence.

After informing his readers that he had been often and earnestly solicited to make a protracted effort, and getting one started, Br. Ottman says that "Amidst the tempestuous scenes that have surrounded our brethren and sisters in that place," (Newville,) they "sighed, and, prayed, and supplicated God for the conversion of sinners." And he further says "the enemy's camp was considerably disturbed; the greatest rage and fury was evinced in the immediate neighborhood of what I once heard a certain brother call 'the breathing hole of hell.'" He says "The greatest opposing influence we had, was that of Universalism." And then he tells us that notwithstanding the opposition of this trained band, "about forty-eight publicly manifested a desire for, and with the exception of perhaps six or eight," found religion and "are now rejoicing in the Lord, among whom are a number who once professed the soul-withering doctrine of specious infidelity, and some too, who, had experienced religion once before."

It is obvious, from the few brief quotations, that I have made from Br. Ottman's article, that the natural, and only inference to be drawn from it, is, that the Universalists of Newville, organized themselves in some form and were repeatedly guilty of some gross wickedness, or some atrocious plotting for the purpose of defeating the objects of their meeting, which he pleases to characterize as tempestuous scenes. Yet, notwithstanding all these high-handed measures in wickedness, in what I suppose he characterizes our village to be, the breathing hole of hell, some who once professed the soul-withering doctrine of specious infidelity, experienced religion too!—Was it not a miracle!

Now for the information of our friends abroad, I will barely say, that we have a little Universalist society in this place, numbering between twenty and twenty-five. We have a union meeting-house, in which the Universalists own a very generous share of the stock, about one half of the time the house has been appropriated to the use of the Universalists by the trustees for 1840. We have regular preaching every second and fourth Sabbaths in every month by Br. J. D. Hicks, and we think our cause is advancing, that it is gaining favor with the people. A spirit of enquiry is abroad in the land, the truth is sought for, and when found, will be embraced, all the protracted efforts to the contrary notwithstanding.—And now kind reader, is not this cause sufficient for our Orthodox brethren and sisters to be solicitous, yea, very solicitous, for a protracted effort? Surely it is, and they have had it, and re-converted their old converts, with some half-dozen new ones, and thus endeth a more than two weeks protracted effort.

It is now, something like eight or nine years since the preaching of God's impartial grace was first introduced in this place. It was first preached by Br. Britton. An occasional sermon, followed by another, and so growing more frequent, until for the last three or four years past, we have had regular preaching, teaching that "soul-withering" doctrine, that God will have all men to be saved, and come to a knowledge of the truth!—When the doctrine was first introduced and preached here, few would allow themselves to hear it, but the prejudices of the people are in a great degree removed and wearing entirely away, and the result is of a very happy character. Hence the cause and the pressing necessity, with our orthodox friends, for a "protracted effort," and not only one effort, but repeated efforts.

For within the last six or seven years, we have had no less than four protracted meetings in this place, and from six to ten more within the same time, within the limits of from four to six miles from our village, on the East, West, North and South. So that our Orthodox brethren in our district of country, will never have cause, I think, for reproaching themselves, for not having made protracted efforts enough, for sustaining their dearest sentiment, endless misery—a sentiment which they have so long hugged and cherished, as the main pillar upon which, it would seem, their whole hope of future happiness, has long been, and still continues to be resting.

I have only to say, in relation to Br. Ottman's converts, that out of the forty or forty-two, with some six or eight exceptions, I believe they were of the class that had been converted once before. And the six or eight exceptions, were some staunch advocates of the dear doctrine of endless misery, and some very respectable young ladies, belonging to Orthodox families. I am perhaps not so well informed in relation to those converts, as Br. Ottman, there being but few in our village and neighborhood; so that I may not be perfectly correct. As to the converts from infidelity, I can say nothing, but I can say that if it is designed to make the impression, (and no doubt can be entertained on that point,) that they had converted some of the members of our society, the statement is false, for we have all passed through the last February effort, without having a single hair of our heads scorched—our society remains unhurt.

One word as to the organized opposition to the meeting in question. And here I am pleased in being able to say, that there was none on the part of Universalists. This I know to be so. But many of us attended the meeting a good part of the time while it was in progress. Indeed there could be no necessity for hostile opposition to such a meeting, for the people only need to attend, to see and hear the many ridiculous manoeuvres and relations there made, and the meeting defeats itself. And here, good reader, let me ask, is there not generally enough of the ridiculous in all protracted meetings, to defeat the object for which they are got up? Is there not an antidote in the poison itself? methinks I hear the affirmative, yea.

Br. Ottman I think, has got his great opposition, twisted a little, and that the thing may be the better understood, I will give the facts as they occurred. On the second Sabbath of the "effort" meeting, Br. Hicks had an appointment, that being a day appropriated to us, in the house. Br. O. and many of his congregation with him assumed nerve enough to hear Br. Hicks, but his sermon (for he preached an excellent discourse) I thought, disturbed "the camp" of our Orthodox friends very much, for they, or many of them, immediately on its delivery, stepped out into the aisle, champion-like, attacking the sermon, giving rise to general discussion through the house, the first during the whole protracted effort. And here let me ask, does not this look like organizing a force, to bully down Universalism? To me, it seems something like it. But it failed.—And I will say in relation to the forty or forty-two converts, that were converted and re-converted, that if most of them do not need another re-conversion, ere a twelve-month pass away, they will certainly wear better, than those who have been converted in former meetings of the kind in Newville.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE.

Think not, kind reader, that my subject is altogether an unimportant one. Closely connected with it is the well-being and happiness of man, while on the journey of human existence. Duty to consider it, rewards one with many great and lasting benefits. And it was in view of the momentous truth, upon which our minds are led to reflect, from a consideration of this all-important subject, that the wise man of old, declared, "it is better to go to the house of mourning, than unto the house of feasting."

Surrounded as we are, by those whom we love and esteem, and whose tender regard, is oftentimes exercised over us, is the thought void of interest, that they, and even we ourselves are mortal, and must at God's appointed time, be separated from earth, with all her various charms and allurements? Impossible. Too well we love our friends, and too strong is the regard we have for our private, individual happiness in this world, for such reflections to pass over our minds, unaccompanied with a corresponding effect upon our conduct. Having a deep and realizing sense of the truth, that our lives are not prolonged to the extent of our wishes—that man has no power to control the messenger of death, surely, none will deny the propriety of often reflecting upon the great truth, that man is wholly ignorant of what may take place in future—that he hath not the power or ability to know what a day, or even an hour may bring forth. We are prone to look upon the bright countenances and sprightly movements of those yet in early life, and hastily form the idea that nothing can prevent their enjoying the pleasures of earth for many years yet to come. But alas! how often are we disappointed in our expectations! The tender youth, like those in advanced life, is often summoned to the silent tomb. How many, ere they have reached the age of manhood, have since our remembrance been numbered with the dead? Methinks I hear a voice responding from the tomb, Alas! how many!

Neither is usefulness a sure safeguard against the assaults of man's last enemy—death. Perhaps the reader may, even now, have in distinct recollection, some one who has passed from earth to heaven, who left this world in the very midst of his usefulness to himself, and those by whom he was surrounded. If so, such a circumstance strikingly illustrates the truth, that however useful one may be to himself and others, he has no reason to conclude that earth is to be his everlasting abiding place—his eternal home.

Indeed, I know of no situation, in which an individual can be placed, wherein he is not, at all times, subject to immediate death. How important it is, then, that we think seriously upon this momentous subject, and carefully examine our hearts and feelings, in order to ascertain whether we are prepared to meet the change of our earthly existence—whether we could at the hour of dissolving nature, look back upon a life spent in the service of God!

LOOK HERE.

Perhaps there is as much consistent zeal manifested by Universalists, in regard to some of the subjects which concern the welfare of our cause in the earth, as by any other denomination for theirs. But we certainly ought to show more on all subjects. Instead of remaining in that condition, where we could be benefited by copying after our opposers, we should take the lead in devotion to the truth, in engagedness in the cause of humanity—and, if necessary, in sacrifices for the defence of the principles of Christianity. What! shall we fold our arms and look coldly on the efforts of our enemies to put down the doctrine of the grace of God which hath appeared unto all men, without making an effort for its vindication—without even bending our whole powers to sustain it? Shall we see men going to and fro through the earth, disseminating the seeds of despair and suicide, sealing up the fountains of human sympathy, and human love, shutting out the light of God's truth, and the balmy influences of his immutable and unconditional promises, by enshrouding the soul in the dark folds of error and superstition, and perverting the declared purposes of the Eternal, and not feel that there is something for us to do in counteracting these influences? nothing to say for the hope of salvation? nothing to urge which shall rescue the name of our God from the unjust imputations which have been cast upon it by mistaken, impious man?

The hopes which have been created and sustained by the Gospel, have been precious to our souls. They have given us peace that passeth understanding. They have tuned our hearts to lively praise, and strengthened us against the insinuations of corrupt teachers, and the anathemas of infatuated men. Reason, experience, and revelation, have taught us that faith in the doctrine of impartial salvation, and implicit reliance on God as the author of that doctrine, are necessary to enjoyment in life, as the ultimate holiness revealed by, and connected with them, is to happiness in the eternal world. What is clearer, then, than the solemn obligations which rest upon us? Who can dispute that, proportioned to our superior motives for obedience to God, should be our faithfulness and zeal.

Some are awake and vigilantly at work. Some have buckled on the armor of living faith, and taken their stand among the armies of the living God. But where are the countless host, who have seen the Captain of our salvation, but who now stand back and withhold the acknowledgement of their allegiance? Where are those who ran the course joyfully for awhile, but fell fainting and cold, by the way side? Where are the lifeless societies, whose divided or indifferent members are now the laughing stock of Phariseism? Where are the houses of worship, whose closed doors have rusted upon their hinges, and whose altar, from whence have gone up praises to the living God, now echoes to the sound of the bat and the moaning wind? Where are the social meetings, the singing circles, the sabbath schools, and the Bible classes? I ask a redeemed world; let them answer—not me, but their God?

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS—No. 11.

There is one fact in regard to the Bible, which is very evident—viz.: any person of moderate capacity can discover the great principles of doctrine contained in the Scriptures by properly perusing them. This, indeed, can not be effected by merely catching up the bible at short and irregular intervals, and reading a verse here, and a chapter there, and a piece of an epistle at another place. Because, by pursuing such a course, the bible will be no better understood than any other book can be comprehended by reading a couple of pages in the middle of it. But if each of the books, gospels and epistles, which form the bible, are carefully examined from beginning to end, with reference to the general facts contained in them, and not only read once, but twice and repeatedly, with desire to obtain their great principles of truth, no person of common capacity need remain in ignorance of Christianity.

But though this fact is certain, yet there is another of equal certainty; viz., that there are many short passages, verses and paragraphs in the Bible, which are not understood by many readers, because they have no opportunity to search the books necessary to obtain the required information. There are multitudes of females burdened with the cares of a growing family, with all its wants and sicknesses—there are multitudes of men so absorbed in the business of life, with its anxieties and its demands upon their time that they can not make the research necessary to understand the references to physical facts and oriental customs and manners, which are found in the Bible. And for want of this knowledge, they lose the power and beauty of many passages; though, as has been remarked, enough, and more than enough, is as clear as the sun in imparting a knowledge of Christian truth and human duty. Some passages will be adduced in proof of this position.

When Moses was describing the blessings with which God visited Israel, he said, "He made him to suck honey out of the rock and oil out of the flinty rock." Deut. xxxii: 13. How much clearer this declaration is, when we understand what almost every traveller tells us, that even on hills of bare rock the Jews formed terraces, on which a thin soil was spread, that soon bore a luxurious crop of wild flowers, from which the innumerable wild bees gathered honey, and of olive-trees, from which olive oil is extracted. Thus giving origin to the declaration, that Israel should suck honey out of the rock, and oil from the flinty rock.

When Moses was describing the land of Palestine to the Jews, he said, "For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt from whence ye came out, where thou sowedest thy seed and wateredest it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs; but the land whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and vallies, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven." Deut. xi: 10, 11. This comparison between Egypt and Palestine, is clear to us, when we remember that they have no rain in Egypt—that they depend on the overflows of the Nile for all moisture—and when their gardens become dry, they have a machine worked by the foot, with which they draw up water from the river and pour it upon their gardens—so that they are literally watered with the foot. Not so in Palestine—it was a land of rain; and as it had hills and vallies, so it was a land of springs, brooks and rivers—and consequently the Jews were to have none of the toil in watering their lands, which the Egyptians had to endure.

When David was dwelling upon the superiority of the service of God over the results which the wicked gain, he said, "I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." Ps. lxxxiv: 10. By the phrase, "tents of wickedness," the Psalmist referred to the Arabs of the desert who never dwell in houses, but always in tents, which are easy of transport from place to place, made necessary because the Arabs are continually on the move. The Arabs are those of whom it is said in scripture, "Their hand shall be against every man, and every man's hand shall be against them,"—they are robbers of travellers and plunderers of caravans. In view of this fact, how clear is the declaration of the Psalmist! He loved the worship of God so well and enjoyed rightness so much, that he had rather be a door-keeper, in the house of the Lord, humble as was that station, than to dwell in Arab tents of wickedness filled with plunder.

The allusion very often occurs in the scriptures of leading sheep, and calling them by name. How much light these allusions receive, by knowing the fact, that it is customary in Eastern nations to lead but not to drive sheep, and also to give them names. The following extract is very much to this point. "A year or two since, I heard in Boston, that some person had imported a large flock of Saxony sheep, and that they had just arrived in the city. One morning I happened to look out of my window at the moment they were passing by. And I was delighted at the illustration of scripture, which the scene afforded. There were probably a hundred or a hundred and fifty in the flock. The shepherd who had come over to this country to take care of them, went before the flock. He held his right hand behind him, with the palm turned towards the sheep. A large buck followed close behind, almost touching with his forehead the palm of the shepherd's hand. The rest of the flock were arranged in very regular order, behind the leader, somewhat in the form of a wedge. * * * * Whenever the shepherd turned a corner, the leader of the flock obeyed the turn of his hand, and thus the whole number were led, without the least difficulty, through any part of the city." Abbott's Scripture Natural History, P. 29. How much beauty this fact gives to the declaration of Christ, when speaking of believers, he said, "And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him; for they know his voice." John x: 4. The Saviour always goes before the humble, contrite, and inquiring soul, and leads the way to truth, virtue and affection. And how touchingly tender and unspeakably excellent does this fact make the 23d Psalm appear to the mourning heart which wants consolation. "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Let the heart riven with anguish—the mind sorrowing for lost friends—the individual bowed down with affliction—let them come here for consolation—the Lord will lead them to truth so full of joy, salvation and anticipated good, that it will rob death of its sting and the grave of its victory. G. W. M.

CHANGE.

Men in this country are peculiarly fond of change. Perhaps it is well that it is so, and at the same time I fear it will be unfortunate in having been as much so. The earth changes, the planets, the atmosphere, the waters, all change, and why not man? And man does change. But as yesterday, he was a youth, his frame light and agile, his mind buoyant and happy with hope and his eye undimmed with the tears of disappointment. To day he has reached the meridian of life and his plans, are or should be characterized more by experience than anticipation. His frame has borrowed the strength of maturity without the decay of age, and his mind now feels how much it can bear of earthly responsibilities, how much it can resist of earthly importunities. But with all his advantages, a shade has come over him which has dimmed the dazzling brightness that he once fancied might last forever. The dark side of the picture has occasionally been turned towards him, and he has gazed upon it, perhaps too much. Yet it was necessary that this change should come over him, for he might have indulged in vanity had he not seen that sorrow lay beneath it. He has marked the fleeting joys of time, and felt that they alone are not enough to sustain him. Cares and responsibilities have gathered around him until he almost intuitively looks forward to the morrow as a day that may bring relief. But ere to-morrow comes, he will be standing upon the threshold of the tomb, and looking back at the few improvements he has made, or perhaps at the many which he might have made. Will he be happy then? He may be.

But this is not all. Man is not content to be a subject, he aims to be master of changes. The plans of yesterday may not be adapted to the circumstances of to-day. At least, because they answered his purpose yesterday is not always a sign that they should be adhered to to-day. Acting upon this rule, what are his ambitious aspirations! By his hand, mountains are levelled to the surface of the plain, and conveyed to the sunken and treacherous marsh; rocks are torn from their antediluvian beds, and by patient toil wrought into symmetrical proportion as art and taste may suggest; forests are shorn of their towering columns, and their solemn gloom opened to the sun-beam and the storm, that the city may find its deep foundations and rear its lofty spires; where the red man floated in his bark canoe, may be heard the busy hum of a thousand souls intermingled with the noise of hissing steam and giant engines; over hills and plains and valley streams rushes the still more modern car, in fleetness vying with the tempest storm. Man is engaged in all these, and still he looks forward for an opportunity to effect still mightier changes, as unprepared to cease now as he was a century since. All this is well if the change does not indicate a greater march of physical power than it does of mind.

The staid and contented husbandman, who has toiled upon the hard and sterile soil of the East until he has even subdued its natural sterility and ruggedness, and beautified the face of nature with the fertile pasture and the teeming corn, that he might enjoy the golden harvest which he has so richly earned; feels the spirit of change coming over him, and he yields the hearthstone and fireside, the homestead and farm, the through-ed house of prayer and the graves of his fathers, to the possession and keeping of another, and goes in search of new scenes, new incitements to industry, and new sources of wealth, in the forests of the west. And this too is well, for he carries along with him the business habits, and the stern integrity, and the love of order, and the pious devotion which is to give power, and respectability, and prosperity, to the countless host that ere long will people the shores of the Pacific.

These are some of the changes of the age. But even these are not all. The feeling has gained so deep a hold upon the heart, it has reached to so great an extreme, it has lost so much of higher principles, that a revulsion must take place; and it is to be feared that its effect will be paralyzing. If it goes on unchecked, we must feel ourselves highly favored if it does not blast the prospects of our happy country, in the destruction of patriotism, and enterprise, and virtue. It is to be hoped that it may not, but the signs are alarming.—When men make wealth the end of their existence, and anticipate and hope for riches which they can not honestly earn and do not deserve, and thus live upon dreams which are as unnatural as they are unreal; when strife and selfishness enter into every avenue of society and mark its emulation with grasping and envious cupidity; when men in the high places of power are corrupted by private ambition, gross and deliberate violations of propriety, abuse and slander which would stamp the less protected with merited disgrace—and conventional bribery, and a disregard for the feelings and interests of community which defies the exertions of their more honest colleagues, we may be sure that a change has taken place in the state of society, which is alarming, fearful in its aspect. Let us beware of these things.

MALFORMED FEET.

In last week's notice of the remedy for this misfortune, I should have included Dr. Hurlburt of this city, as a successful operator for the cure of deformed or club foot. The operation is described as a very brief and simple one to any skilful surgeon; and, in the case named by Dr. H., it will be seen that the little fellow was able to walk in three days after, by the aid of the "shoe," as the apparatus used, is termed. From a partial acquaintance with Dr. Hurlburt, and his success in this case, I think him capable of operating successfully in similar cases, and can recommend those who need his aid, to submit to so easy a mode of being set on their feet, in the proper position. Dr. H. says in his advertisement:—

"All the writers upon the cure of the different species of club-foot, assert that the operation is attended with but very little pain, that many of the worst deformities are perfectly removed and that within a very few days. Within the two last years the subscriber has paid much attention to this subject, has operated successfully for this deformity, and has now a little patient two years old, who on the 22d April, walked on the outer side and back of the foot, with the sole backward and the toes turned directly in towards the other foot; now, April 25th, walks on the sole of his foot with the toes naturally forward.

"The subscriber is prepared to operate, or to procure and apply such apparatus as the case presented may require."
